The Babe of Bethlehem.

The night crept cool o'er Bethlehem's plain
And lulled close the distant hill;
Along the weary shepherds watched
While all their drowsy flocks were still.
Above, the silent stars moved on,
Each in its own majestic way—
Who dreamed the King of men, heir to a throne
And in a Bethlehem manger lay!

No wondrous sign and filled the sky
When sank the flaming sun afar;
No ominous cloud with darkness came
To pale or hide the eastern star;
No tumult filled the town or inn
Where travelers tarried on their way.
Conceal'd alone that the Son of God
On near them in a manger lay.

Along the surging streets of Rome,
Through all the empire of the west,
Nor sound nor sign the hour made known
In which all nations should be blest;
That night Imperial Cæsar slept
On regal couch, his cares away,
And dreamed not that the King of kings
At Bethlehem lay in a manger lay.

Only where simple shepherds watched
In fields which Ruth of old did glean,
Was the rapt song of angels heard,
The sudden, mystic glory seen;
And when the heavenly song had ceased,
The heavenly light had passed away,
The shepherds entered Bethlehem
And found the place where Jesus lay.

No marvel that they spread abroad
The saying that to them was told—
"Lo, He is come!"—the Christ of God,
The Savior, promised them of old:
No marvel that with prayer or praise,
Back to their flocks they took their way!
The Shepherd of their soul had come—
At Bethlehem in a manger lay!

A Touching Incident.

A touching incident occurred at Gouverneur Hospital, New York city, recently. Little Annie Ashpurtis was sent by her parents, who live at No. 36 Hester street, to the cellar for some firewood. The child, who was but six years old, took a lighted lamp in her hand, and while descending the stairs, her foot slipped and she fell, breaking the lamp, and the flames of the burning fluid soon enveloped her entire body. As soon as the surgeon was called, the little sufferer was wrapped in what is known as a "Strike's prepared sheet," and driven in an ambulance to the hospital. The child was put on a sofa cot, and the surgeon did all he could to alleviate her suffering, but it was impossible to save her life. Under the influence of a narcotic she soon fell asleep. Thus she lay slowly breathing for some hours. Her face was so swollen she could not open her eyes. About half past two in the morning, she showed signs of returning consciousness. The watchful nurse asked her would she take a drink. She distinctly answered, "Yes."

In a moment the house surgeon, Aspel, was beside her cot. He felt the pulse, but shook his head and turned to go away. As he did so the little creature moved her body. She turned half around. The dim light of the candle shone on the blackened face. The swollen lips pursed out, and in a clear, sweet voice the dying child began to sing the hymn, "Nearer, my God, to Thee." The doctor and nurse stood transfixed. The other patients in the silent, darkened ward leaned on their elbows, and drank in the sweet melody. The first verse completed, she gradually sank back on her pillow. Her strength began to fail, and, with it, her voice, and only the humming like distant music of the air of the hymn could be heard. How sweet, yet weird that humming sounded. The candle lent its meager light, the big clock in the corner told out its seconds as the sweet little soul passed out to its Maker. The humming ceased. All was over. The doctor turned away; his handkerchief sought his eyes. The nurse gazed into the flame of the candle. She seemed to read the little one's death there. She heaved a sigh, and no doubt offered a prayer. The remains were buried from the hospital. The coffin was strewn with flowers, offerings of her little school-mates, with whom the dead child had been a great favorite.—The Evangelist.

Dear Children:

I am indulging the thought that perhaps some of you are looking for a line from grandma's pen, and as you all are interested in stories, I desire to give you one in this. Because of a famine, a dear family left the place of their nativity, and settled with those who were Israel's enemies. They had two sons, who married daughters of that place. The meaning of their mother's name was "Comely, or beautiful," but she was soon left a widow, after this her two sons died. Being crushed with deep sorrow, she resolved to return again to her own land. Her two daughters-in-law could not endure to see the sorrowing one go alone, and they went a short distance with her, but she said to them, "Go return each to your mother's house, the Lord deal kindly with you, as ye have dealt with the dead, and me, and when she had kissed them, they lifted up their voices and wept, saying, Surely we will return with thee, and again they wept aloud, and kissed their mother-in-law. But one whose name signifies, "A shall," went back to her people, and to her gods. The one whose name signifies, "Satisfied," followed the Comely one, saying, "Intreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee, for where thou goest I will go, and where thou lodgest I will lodge, thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God." So they journeyed until they came to a place which signifies, "The house of bread." The whole city went forth to greet them, and they said, Is this the comely and beautiful one? She said O call me not pleasant, but bitter, for I went out full, but the Lord hath brought me home again empty. It was the beginning of harvest, and the satisfied one said to her mother-in-law, let me go to the field, and glean, and she said, Go my daughter. As she went she happened to light on a part of a field belonging to a mighty man of wealth, whose name signifies, "Strength." When he entered the field he said to the reapers, The Lord be with you? they sweetly answered, The Lord bless thee. When his kind eye caught sight of the gleaner he said, Whose damsel is this? and when the reapers told him how she had left her father and mother, also her own land, the strong one said to her, Go not to glean in another field, but follow the reapers; and to the reapers he said, Let her glean among the sheaves, and reproach her not, and let fall also some of the handfuls of purpose for her, and leave them, that she may glean them. Then she fell on her face to the ground, and said, Why have I found such favor, that thou shouldst take knowledge of me, seeing I am a stranger? And the strong one said, I have heard how thou has forgotten thine own people, and thy father's house, and are come into a people thou knowest not. The Lord recompense thy work, and a full reward be given thee of the Lord God of Israel, under whose wings thou art come to trust. So she gleaned until the evening, and beat out what she had gleaned. When the Comely one saw her ladened with the pure grain she said, Where hast thou gleaned today? for according to the law given to Israel, the stranger could only glean the corners of the field, and the comely one said, Blessed be he of the Lord, who hath not left off his kindness to the living, and to the dead, the mighty man of wealth whose name signifies, "Strength," is one who hath right to redeem, and he in whose field thou hast gleaned is our kinsman. And the gleaner said, He bid me follow the reapers until the harvest was finished. After the gleaning was over, the Comely one said to her, Shall I seek rest for thee, my daughter, that it may be well with thee? and the gleaner answered, All that thou sayest unto me I will do. She did all the comely one bade her, and in the morning the strong one said unto her, bring the vail that I may fill it, and go not empty away. While the gleaner's husband lived, he owned a goodly portion of land, which none could redeem, or bring back to his wife but a near kinsman. The one whose right it was to redeem, said, I cannot, lest I mar mine own inheritance. The strong one said, I am after thee, but give me the right and I will redeem it, and raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance. The strong one not only bought her land back, but he purchased the Gentile stranger to be his wife, and in this way the name of the dead was not cut off.

Children beloved, God has unfolded wonderful wisdom in this history which I want to make plain to you. The Comely beautiful one, is a figure of Truth, two followed her, but only one clave unto her, and the one who went with her, forsaking all that was dear to her, found the house of bread, the mighty man of wealth whose name is strength, who is a figure of our Lord Jesus Christ, his fidelity to truth, drew from him his tenderest sympathy, giving her far more than the stranger's portion, telling the kind reapers to let handfuls of purpose drop for her, and when the harvest was ended, the strong one proved to be her redeemer, restorer, and loved her so dearly that he purchased her for his wife. Surely the name of such an one is famous in Israel, and has been proclaimed in Bethlehem. Could the gleaner have a more expressive name than Satisfied. Let us who are Gentiles from the land of the enemy, follow her steps.

Your affectionate Teacher,

E. COFFMAN.

Words of Comfort from the Scriptures.

"The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures; he leadeth me beside the still waters." "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble. Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea." "The Lord of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge." "He shall come down like rain upon the mown grass; as showers that water the earth." "He shall deliver the needy when he crieth; the poor also, and him that hath no helper." "He will never leave thee nor forsake thee. The Lord is my helper and I will not fear what man shall do to me."

Are you weak and without strength, remember "the Lord is my strength and song and is become my salvation." "God is my strength and power, and he maketh my way perfect." "I will love thee, O Lord, my strength. The Lord is my rock, and my fortress, and my deliverer; my God, my strength, in whom I will trust my buckler, and the horn of my salvation, and my high tower."

Are you alone in a cold world, surrounded by darkness and feel lost without a ray of hope, remember "the Lord will not forsake his people." He saith, "I will not leave thee comfortless; I will come to you." "The salvation of the righteous is of the Lord; he is their strength in the time of trouble."

Do you mourn over loved ones, that have fallen asleep, remember what Jesus said, "I am the resurrection and the life." "Thus saith the Lord; refrain thy voice from weeping and thine eyes from tears; for thy work shall be rewarded, saith the Lord; and they shall come again from the land of the enemy," (death). "Those sowing in tears, with singing do reap. When goeth on and weepeth, bearing the basket of seeds, surely cometh in with singing, bearing his sheaves." Are you a sinner, and wasted your days in idleness and ungodliness, and feel lost without any hope. Remember the Prodigal Son, and follow his example and a loving Father in heaven will meet you on the way and embrace you in his loving arms, and feel assured that there will be joy among the angels in heaven upon thy return.

Be patient Brother, Sister, in whatever condition you are. Be not of an avaricious disposition; be satisfied with present things, for he himself has said "No, I will not leave thee, No, no, I will not forsake thee," (E. V.) With such a solid foundation to build all of our hopes upon let us not get cold and despairing, but cling to him who loves us, and gave himself a ransom for us.

A Ruler's Lot is not a Happy One.

People sometimes wish they were kings or rulers, but a statistical historian figures out that of the 3,649 monarchs who have ruled seventy-four different nations, 800 were overthrown, sixty-four forced to abdicate, twenty-eight committed suicide, twenty-three went mad, 100 were slain in battle, 120 were taken captive by their foes, twenty-five were tortured to death, 160 were assassinated, and 108 were executed. "Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown."

Conference Notice.

The first quarterly Conference of the Church of God of the Abrahamic Faith of the State of Michigan, will be held at the town hall at Byron Center, commencing Friday evening, Jan. 21, 1887. Let all the brethren be on hand at the commencement of the meeting, and let us all come with our hearts full of prayer and charity. Those coming on the Lake Shore R. R. enquire for Brother Moses; those coming on the Grand Rapids road enquire for Philemon Terrell or Edward Smith.

K. N. WOODWARD, Sec.

THE next Quarterly Conference will be held at Rensselaer, Ind., commencing Friday, Feb. 4, 1887. Fuller notice next week.

A. R. PENDERWOOD, Sec.

Please state in THE RESTITUTION, that I am now in South Eastern Kansas, preaching the word, and brethren who may desire my services will please address me at Hepler, Kansas.

ODE TO THE DYING YEAR.

The dying year, the dying year!
We scarcely can suppress the fear,
To think of time so poorly spent,
Which God in his great mercy lent:
Now gone forever from our hold.
Where days, and weeks, and months unfold,
Have passed before with solemn tread,
Bearing with them the countless dead.

O solemn thought—that with each day
So many mortals pass away!
Back to the dust from whence they came
Crumbles their daily moulded frame.
God's prophet, David, says 'tis true
"Dust with the dead, thoughts perish too."
Thus God's decree in Genesis, xlii. 19-
Confirmed from that sad day to this.

O, dying year, do thou impart
A searching lesson to my heart,
May "truth and grace" take deeper root,
And deeds of kindness upward shoot,
To honor God, and bless mankind.
And thus shall I much comfort find,
Amid the changing scenes of life,
Amid its turmoil, pain and strife.

Impart the strength, O Lord, I crave,
And patience, which alone can save:
And keep me in temptation's hour
From yielding to the tempter's power.
Thou, who hast been our God and guide
In other years, O, still provide,
And bless with us thy children all
Who dwell on this terrestrial ball.

Many are lonely, poor and sad:
Faith in thy word can make them glad,
Increase their faith," then, Lord I pray,
And keep more till that glorious day,
When "Christ, their life," and king shall come
To give them an abiding home,
Beyond the reach of want and fear,
Beyond the reach of death and tears.

Now dying year, we bid adieu—
Farewell! to thee—and hail the new!
Enter with cautious tread the door,
To travel on as years before.
But ah, the Tyrant waits around,
Hoping to lay us in the ground;
But there's a voice that can awake
And to my being new create.

The dying years, O let them pass
And prove "mankind are like the grass"
But of one thing we may be sure,
"God's word forever will endure."

Dear Brethren and Sisters of the Household of Faith:

I stood today by the bedside of a dear member of the family of Christ Jesus, and listened while she told me of the love in her heart for Jesus. This dear one has lain upon a bed of [illegible] for over a year, and yet she [illegible]me, "Oh sister you think I [illegible] hard lying here day after day, [illegible] only able to leave my bed for a few minutes, but, oh, I am so happy in the sweet comfort of the gospel. I hope that I, would not exchange my lot for that of the happiest and richest person in all the world." "Nay I am the happiest and the richest, for I'm the child of a King, and often has my gracious Sovereign come to me in spirit, when I have been reflecting upon the loving tender words he has spoken to his children. Yes, his words are like a song of melody in my heart, a well-spring of water springing up into everlasting life. At such times my heart seems well nigh bursting in its longings to see dear Jesus come. Sister Alice, when you write your letter for THE RESTITUTION, ask the dear ones a question for me. Does not Jesus manifest his presence spiritually to his children of the Faith? for many times has Jesus stood by me, I cannot doubt it, I don't know how to doubt. When I am lying here all alone by myself, the other members of the family busy about their necessary duties, sweetly the hours fly by on golden wings, while I'm thinking of the glorious future. I see in mental vision the crown wearers, the palm bearers, the white robed ones and far above them all, in supreme beauty and loveliness, appears my Savior. Oh, how lovely he seems to me. Tell the brethren and sisters in the Faith, what a comfort, hope and joy unspeakable, the gospel message is to me." Such were the words of our invalid sister in Christ, and I place them in my letter, thinking they may awaken a chord of sympathy in the breast of some one similarially afflicted. I reflect, if a sick one with feeble fainting voice can express so much love for the Master, what can we who are well and strong do? Dear sisters, my heart and pen ask, again, what can we do to win an approving smile, a word of commendation from our Savior. I have long been thinking about the children of our number. How many are instructed in these precious truths which we believe to be the word of God and which will help them as nothing else can, to flee from the worldly temptations which will surely overtake them by and by when they leave your hearthstones. Dear sisters, tears of love accompany my words to you. Forbid it, dear Savior, that thou shouldst have cause to be ashamed of us, who profess to love thee above all else, that so many of us love the world, its fashions and follies, so much, that we have no time to assemble ourselves together, or to teach the little ones thy truth. Dear sisters it is the same old story you have heard [illegible] and from so many sources that you are heartily tired of it, fashion, and pride, and love of display, but some how I wished to say it for the sake of some one up there who is coming to take his own, and we want to be his own. So let me say it tenderly and lovingly, dear sisters, lay aside the fascinating piece of fancy work, the pleating, and ruffling, and lace work, bodily adornment, and home decoration, there is too much of it everywhere among all classes, put it aside and devote that time to teaching the little ones the living truths of God, perfect yourselves in studying the word, seek the most charming methods to present to their childish minds the blessed lessons of truth, bring to your aid too, all the helps possible, and above all seek for heavenly guidance. Give your little ones to him who once walked among earth's children, and who deemed it not trivial amidst his mighty works, to take them in His arms and bless them.

Where are the Hannahs dedicating their little Samuels to the Lord? Our pioneer teachers of the word, are one by one falling asleep. Who will take their places? Dear mothers, what higher honors could you desire for your child than to defend the cause of the King who is coming? Do you say 'tis a hard life obscure and ill paid, the King will more than compensate for all earthly loss. Then give your children instructions in the blessed word of God, if only for a few minutes each day. What can you name of earthly value, that will so richly repay you. Oh, that a less clumsy pen than mine had written this admonition, but I waited a whole year for some one else to say it and no word came, while all the while a gentle voice seemed calling to me to send a word of admonition upon this subject. I could not let the stones in the streets cry out while a living heart was throbbing with love. And so I wrote.

ADDIE M. ANDERSON.
ALICE J. KERR

[Write again. While we are unwaveringly attached to the faith once for all delivered to the saints, and have unbounded reverence for the written Word, still our whole soul cries out for that deeper experience that God works in the trusting, believing heart through his divine truth and its blessed inspiring Spirit. A mere form of godliness without the power will avail but little in the coming day.—ED.]

MICA PEN-NOTES.

INTERVIEW WITH SELAH MERRILL, ON PALESTINE AND JERUSALEM.

Selah Merrill, recently returned from Jerusalem, is now in Westfield on a visit to his mother and his sister, Mrs. Fairbank, of California. The former of the two ladies is a widow of nearly four score and the stepmother of Gen. Joseph Hawley, U. S. Senator from Connecticut. She is in apparently good health, giving the impression of more than ordinary natural vitality and vigor, and expecting very soon to take the journey of more than 3000 miles to the Golden State. Mr. Merrill is in the mature vigor of life (being in his fiftieth year), genial, accomplished, and fluent in discourse on the topic of interest to so many, viz., the condition of the Holy Land, and I reasonably conclude that in whatever relates to its history, topography, and especially any presumed inducements to emigration, or facilities for settlement, his statements would have great weight and value.

In addition to personal interviews, I was permitted to listen to an address by him, in the First Congregational Church in this place, of which he was formerly a member. Doubtless readers of THE RESTITUTION would like to have some account of his experience and some statement of facts relative to the land of sacred history and promise. (I may say, parenthetically, that I missed the interesting address of Mrs. Merrill to the ladies of the Second Congregational Church at their missionary meeting on Sunday afternoon.) Mr. Merrill has resided in Palestine nearly seven years, the larger part of the time as U. S. Consul. He has published two volumes upon the country which he had such a favorable opportunity to study, with the titles respectively, of "East of the Jordan," and "Galilee in the Time of Christ." Neither Jerusalem, nor Palestine, on the whole, he says, has any present encouragement to settlement, or any special aspect of promise. There is some improvement outside of the city walls, but within the situation is rather one of wretchedness and depression. The Jews are the lower class, poor, ignorant, and degraded, and almost entirely dependent on charity for support. Jerusalem is covered with an immense heap of rubbish, there being a mass of debris ranging from fifteen to seventy feet in depth above the old and true foundation. This mass of accumulation would be a good fertilizing material. The streets are crooked, filthy and narrow, being in many cases barely of a width to allow five persons to walk abreast.

Everything in Palestine is embarrassed and restrained by the jealous and despotic Turkish government, and there has been of late a marked increase of restrictions and impediments to the settlement of the country. Turkey is opposed to Jewish colonization. More than a hundred schools have been recently discontinued in Palestine. English influence (from which so much has been expected by many) has materially decreased on account of England's occupation of Egypt. Bismark, more than any other living man, wields an influence in that country, and on this account German colonization is the least likely to be interferred with. There are four German colonies in Palestine, one each in Haifa, Sarona, Jaffa, and Jerusalem. There is a decided insecurity and uncertainty in the titles of land in that country, and no absolute guarantee of unmolested ownership. This state of things cannot be expected to improve until Turkey is dispossessed of Palestine. Of course a change of ownership is likely to involve a desperate struggle of European nations. The ambition of France and Russia is especially noteworthy in the direction of the "Holy Places." Not only Turkey, but the Jews in that country are opposed to further Jewish immigrations, as the latter must undergo a reduction in their share of the "Halukah," in consequence of new arrivals. The charity is already so diffused as to provide only the most meagre supply of the wants of the poor Jews already there. The hostile vigilance of the government is so great that Jews who are about to debark at Jaffa, or at Haifa, are only permitted to land on condition of their leaving the country within thirty days. This is not a merely nominal requisition, but is sought to be enforced. There is no such thing possible as Jewish colonization under present conditions. The subsistance of those in Jerusalem is scanty, and their condition pitiful.

Two or three hundred Americans, and as many English, come to Jerusalem every year, and in favorable years, twenty to twenty-five thousand of other nationalities, of which five thousand are Mohammedans. In other seasons the number of pilgrims may not exceed twelve to fifteen thousand. Many people who go there seem to be quite disappointed at the discouraging aspect of affairs, the poverty of accommodations, and the general unthrift. This is inexcusable ignorance. There is nobody to blame but the traveler himself. He ought to be better informed. At the period of greatest influx, it is impossible to tell how or where the multitude find accommodations. Many must of necessity forego the comfort of beds to lie on.

There is one place of undoubted genuineness and antiquity in Jerusalem, and that is the rock in the old temple area, which remains as it was when the blood of sacrifices flowed from the altar which undoubtedly stood there. There is a hole in the rock into which the blood flowed, but no influence has ever been sufficient to shake the resolution of the authorities not to permit an examination of the cavity. There are also immense stones in the vicinity whose antiquity and identity are unmistakable. Herod the Great was even a greater builder than Solomon. As to the location of Calvary there can be no doubt that the popularly supposed site is an error. It must be identified with the rising ground north of the city, near the Damascus gate.

Bethlehem is always interesting of course. The inhabitants of that village are unlike the people of other places. The women are more attractive, and the men of a nobler bearing than elsewhere, and are supposed to be descendants of the crusaders. There is quite an industry pursued there in the manufacture of articles for sale out of bituminous limestone from the Dead Sea, from mother of pearl, and olive wood. There is one peculiarity in the customs of the people, which is to allow the waste ordinarily utilized as fertilizing material to accumulate year after year, in immense heaps, instead of being applied to the soil. It is almost a marvel that such a practice should not result in pestilence, or in severe injury to life and health. The destructive unhealthfulness of such accumulations is counteracted by the heat of the sun, acting continuously for weeks and months together, to burn up the contagion, dry up the noxious moisture, and so prevent injury.

The structure of the country, geologically, is largely limestone. This reveals vast possibilities of fertility. Such a soil is susceptible of luxuriant productions. Let the hills be reclothed, as they easily might, with the drapery of a growing forest, and the rains would return, and the land now desolate and barren, resume its ancient fertility. It is not true that there is any appreciable improvement in the climate by a return of long absent rains. Such an impression is erroneous. The climate and soil are peculiarly adapted to the production of these three: oranges, melons or grapes. I have never eaten so delicious grapes as those growing in Palestine. I see no reason why sweet potatoes might not be grown successfully. Apples do not do well there.

The Dead Sea is plainly visible from the Mount of Olives. The mountains of Moab, at a varying distance of thirty to sixty miles, appear in the transparent atmosphere to be much nearer. There is nothing to indicate the probability of railroad construction in Palestine. There is nothing to justify the outlay. The people are too few and poor to patronize railroads. Travel is practically safe anywhere without the need of an armed escort. As to the matter of Jewish colonization, there is no man, no Jewish capitalist, who is ready to embark means in such an enterprise, or to step to the front and stand committed to the settlement of Jews in that land.

It is by no means a safe or prudent thing for any man to go there without sufficient means for current expenses, and to insure his return home without embarrassment. It is idle to depend on the chance of a remunerative occupation, or trust to being employed in a country where there are no employers. The difficulties in the way are various. Land is hard to be obtained; titles are unsafe; house building cannot be depended on. It is ruinous to undertake to compete with the Arab in manual labor. Think of working all day in the hot sun, for twenty cents, or at most, twenty-five, and upon a diet of bread, olives and water. Even horticulture is utterly unremunerative. The luscious grapes, carefully tended during their growth, can be bought at the rate of four dollars for a camel load of six hundred pounds, or at two-thirds of a cent a pound.

With respect to the advisableness of joining any existing colony, it is sufficient to say, the Germans do not wish any additions from people of another language. The Germans are so restricted in their allotments of space that it is hard to see what they are going to do when their children are grown. There is no American colony of sufficient stamina to encourage expectation. Some Americans of good character had with good motives have gone to live in Palestine. Others have brought great reproach on their name and the country they have represented.

It will be seen from the foregoing that in the judgment of a man who has studied the country, and who is familiar with the situation as it is today, any plan or scheme of settlement there, must at the present time be pronounced adventurous and imprudent. I cannot personally see that it is necessary to surrender, for one moment, confidence in the fulfillment of the divinely inspired prophetic programme. It is simply necessary in the calm of an untroubled faith, to wait the turning of the wheels of destiny as God is pleased to order them. We are glad to know and face the facts of the present, however unsuspicious they may seem. They should not in the least disturb or unsettle an intelligent and consistent faith. The authority of a man whose experience and research, together with the strictest and most conscientious fidelity to facts, entitle him to our fullest confidence, may be deemed most opportune in discouraging extravagant schemes, or rectifying exaggerated ideas. There remains to us the pregnant query whether the present ominously armed peace of Europe may not indicate such a change in the relation of European powers to Turkey, as will involve the latter's disposition of Palestine, nay, even in an almost incredibly short space of time. Whether by war, or a concert of action of the powers, in the endeavor to avoid it, or a convention following a conflict of arms, it might appear the best solution of a perplexing difficulty to organize an enterprise of re-colonizing Palestine by Jews.

Notwithstanding the widely prevalent indisposition of Jews to go there at present, on account of the lack of commercial or other stimulus, I see no improbability of an extensive settlement of colonists, by agreement of leading powers, though I believe this even must be viewed as only introductory to a later and permanent occupation. The period of the treading down of Jerusalem by the Gentiles, must have its full accomplishment, and no power under heaven can shorten its fixed duration. Nor, on the other hand, can its term be one instant prolonged. In view of the effete and decayed condition of Turkey, and the perilously jealous vigilance of neighboring nations, and the destructively expensive maintenance of monstrous armaments, a crisis, if not a catastrophe, seems impending. The very fact of the senseless and inhibitory spirit of Turkish administration, may be the foretoken of its overthrow. At all events, on our part, nothing would appear wiser than a wisely armed and vigilant patience. If great is expectation, we should strive not to be deficient in wisdom.

Notes by the Way.

I closed my last at Peoria, Ill. In consequence of the failure to obtain the house friends had in view, we did not have as many meetings as we anticipated there. We had a good time when not holding meetings, as we engaged in visiting and investigating the word of truth, and we trust the result will be good. During our stay in Peoria we made our home with our estimable Brother and Sister Slane, whom we found to be steadfast in the faith, with devotion seldom found among our brethren. Devotional service at the family altar is kept up day by day. Would that we could find more devotion among our people. We find that God's people anciently had time to pray three times a day, and in the apostolic age they had set hours for prayer. But we, as a people, have no hour of prayer, no prayer meetings, no family prayer, and many do not even return thanks at the table for their daily bread. I say not this to find fault, but this state of things is deplorable when we think we are the people of the Lord professing to believe that he is near at hand. I don't know but these are so busy watching for the Lord that they had not time to pray. But, brethren, let me remind you that our Savior taught us to pray as well as watch.

But to return to my report. I stopped over two Sundays in Peoria, and on Nov. 8th, we took the parting hand with Brother and Sister Slane and friends of Peoria, and returned to Lenark, Ill, where I was received to the hospitality of our beloved Brother and Sister Chown. Having taken a severe cold on my way home from Peoria I staid with them through the week doctoring my cold and recruiting till Saturday, Nov. 13th, when I took the train to Mt. Carroll and was met by Brother Smith who took me to the Union Church where I held meetings Sunday and Sunday night. The cold continued so bad that I could not hold meetings through the week. I returned to Lenark Monday and was again received into the hospitality of Brother and Sister Chown, where I continued to care for my cold till the next Saturday, when, being much improved, I went with Brother S. E. Carter to East Plum River and held meeting Saturday night, Sunday and Sunday night and then returned to Lanark on Monday. I continued here till Thursday when I took leave of brethren and friends at Lenark and started for Brookhead, Wis. Here I met wife, mother and sister, brother and brother in-law and other friends on the evening of our national thanksgiving day, Nov. 25th.

Here I stayed until Saturday when I went to Monroe, expecting to meet Brother Elkin, of Gordon, and go to his school house to hold meetings over Sunday. But there being some trouble about the school house, Brother Elkin came to Monroe and left word with Brother McCalla that we could not have any meeting in the school house. So I stopped in Monroe over Sunday and visited Brother and Sister McCalla, Brother and Sister Noble, Bro. and Sister Burdick, and other brethren, sisters and friends, having a good time and trying to encourage these brethren to start up some meetings there. Bro. Burdick seems to be alive to the matter and will do something if he can get anybody to help him. It seems that there are enough in Monroe to do something for the cause if the right instrumentality was employed.

Monday evening I returned to Brookhead where I remained until Friday morning, Dec. 3d, when I took leave of friends, stopping over night in Lenark, and then coming to Carroll on the noon train. Here I was met by Brother Amos Eaton who took me to his place, a distance of fourteen miles, to West Plum River. There I was received into the hospitality of his amiable family. Commenced meetings on Saturday night and held over Sunday and Monday. We visited Sister Hilliard and her husband, Mr. Hilliard, though not a believer, is a very intelligent man. He is very kind, attends to seeing that Sister H. is provided with a way to get to meeting and generally attends himself, seeming to be in sympathy with the truth. We had meeting Monday night, and have an appointment out for tonight. So far the meetings have been well attended and good attention was paid to the words spoken. Tomorrow night the house will be occupied by a seventh day man who I shall endeavor to hear. Shall commence at the New school house, two miles above here, on Wednesday night, and continue over the following Sunday, the result of which meetings we will tell in the future. Yours for the truth, waiting the King in his beauty.

T. J. WHITCOMB.

Editor Restitution:

Dear brethren and sisters in the blessed hope, it is a pleasure and a joy to me to write a word of cheer to you. Have just returned from a visit to the east part of the State where my youthful days were spent, and O, what a joy to meet my old friends and relatives with whom I associated thirty-one years ago, and then to repair to the same old school house of the long ago and talk the glorious news of Jesus' near coming, and life only in him. It was my privilege to address them on two occasions. Had an appointment for a farewell meeting, but was prevented by a hard rain. May the Lord bless the truths spoken to them in love. How blessed to work in the vineyard of the Master. I am so glad the Lord has something for me to do. Praise his name forever.

I long for open doors in the gospel work, but for the present it is duty to stay at home and care for the dearest one I have on earth. My husband is sick with heart disease. I fear he will not stay with us a great while, but at most it is but a little while before our Life Giver will appear and bring back our loved ones from death. O, I want to be an overcomer through the blood of the Lamb and word of my testimony. I desire to do my Master's will and say always, "Thy will be done."

While I was away I saw a journal of travel in the Holy Land by one David Millard, away back thirty-five years ago, and in the book was the author's poetic thoughts expressed about the Holy Land. It might be interesting to the readers of THE RESTITUTION.

I saw Jerusalem's sun had set,
Her hills around looked sear;
Moslem wept on Olivet,
Her coming woes, her fall and yet
She scoffed at mercy's tear.

These woes have come, her chosens have fled,
Save hills and vales and name;
Her Kedron no more laves the bed,
Bethesda's healing power is dead,
And Zion creeps in shame.

But Palestine to hope is lifted,
Again to life shall spring,
Shall burst her bands and fetters shiv.
When he who once was crucified
Shall reign her rightful King.

And so it is; the whole earth shall be blessed and the curse removed, and if we are faithful we shall be remembered when the Lord brings again Zion. Your sister in the vineyard,

LAURA H. PERKINS.

PHOTOGRAPHS!

—OF—

ELD. S. A. CHAPLIN,

Editor of the Restitution.

Many of our friends who have seen Elder S. A Chaplin, and are personally acquainted with him, besides many who have become acquainted with him through THE RESTITUTION, have expressed a desire to have his Photograph. It will be evident to every one that Brother Chaplin could not possibly give his Photograph to all these friends, on account of the great expense.

To satisfy this desire of our friends we have made arrangements with W. Tuttle of Plymouth, Ind., to make us a quantity of handsome Cabinet Photographs of Elder Chaplin, and we make the following offer:—

FREE!

To each of our Subscribers who pays his subscription in advance, to Dec. 31, 1887, before Feb 1, 1887, we will send by mail a Gabinet size Photograph of Elder S A Chaplin, Editor of THE RESTITUTION.

This is the Last Chance to get this Present Free, as the offer will end February 1, 1887.

Brother Chaplin has kindly agreed to write his Autograph on each one of the pictures given away by this offer, hence those opening a photograph will also have his

The CHRISTIAN HYMNAL.

The Hymnal is the Title of our New Hymn Book, which will contain about one hundred and sixty pages. The book will be handsomely bound in Cloth, printed on good paper, and nice clear type. We expect to be able to present the book to our friends during the month of January, 1887. Single copies will be sold at 75 cents each. One dozen copies at 60 cents each. In lots of fifty at 50 cents each.

PLEDGES.

We want to know how large an edition to print, and for that reason now ask our friends to send us pledges of the number of books they want, and we can thus get an idea of the number it will be necessary to issue. We do not want your money now, only the number of copies you will take. Send at once. Address

THE RESTITUTION,

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Before you go to the Post Office to get a Money Order to send us, take a copy of the paper and read carefully the instructions at the head of the second page. Examine your order as soon as it is handed to you, and see that it is all right. See that it is addressed to the P. M. at "Plymouth, Indiana," not to Plymouth, Illinois, or any where else. Have it made payable to "THE RESTITUTION"—not to ANY individual. Be SURE it is all right before you send it.

DO NOT, under any circumstances, buy a POSTAL NOTE—If destroyed or lost no duplicate can be issued—any body can cash them—they are UNSAFE. We will not be responsible for Postal Notes or money sent loose in letters.

A Money Order costs five cents, and is Absolutely Safe—A Postal Note costs three cents, and has NO Guarantee with it.

We must insist on our friends heeding these directions, for our mutual protection. Three Postal Notes have been wrong within a short time, and one of them for $2 60 is lost entirely. Two Money Orders have contained errors also, causing much annoyance and delay.

EXPLANATION OF LABEL MARKS.

Some having complained that they do not know what the marks on labels mean, we will just say, "Jay" means January, and when it is followed by a figure "6" and reads "Jay6" it means your subscription expired the first day of January, 1886. "Feb" February, "Mar" March, "Apr" April, and "May" are well understood, but "Jun" meaning June seems, to confuse some, and to be taken to mean January. "Jun" means June. "Jul" is July, "Aug" August, "Sep" September, "Oct" October, "Nov" November, and "Dec" December. The figure following the month stands for the year, "6" means 1881, "7" means 1882, etc. A postal card of inquiry will bring you any information you wish.

THE MASTER WANTS WORKERS.

The Master wants workers, his harvest is white,
His command, "Go ye forth" is to all;
Go work with a will, and let not the dark night
On an ungathered harvest hold fall.
The Master wants workers, and calleth for you,
There's work for the smallest and weakest to do.

The Master wants workers, and that which is right
He will give at the end of the day;
So thrust in the sickle, and work with thy might,
If not gathered ripe grain will decay.
The Master wants workers, then why still go on Begin now to serve him? 'Tis not a hard lot.

The Master wants workers, each service he knows,
And not one is too small to record;
Even he who a cup of cold water bestows
In His name, shall not lose his reward.
The Master wants workers, oh, who will to-day
Begin in his service to labor to-day.

The Master wants workers, the night cometh soon,
When the weary shall rest from all care,
When those who have toiled through the heat of the noon
Shall no longer in weariness bear.
The Master wants workers! think what he has borne,
That you might his crown of rejoicing adorn.

The Master wants workers, his harvest is great—
'Tis the world with its millions outside—
A multitude vast rushing on to their fate,
Knowing not what the Savior has wrought.
The Master wants workers—a host of true men
To lead them to Jesus, from hill, plain and fen.

PALESTINE.

From the last N. Y. Independent we copy the following account of the German settlements in Palestine and of the peculiar motives prompting them to take up their abode in that land. In his own good time, now at the door, God will show that the land is Israel's covenanted inheritance.

THE GERMAN TEMPLE.

During a visit to Palestine one is most pleasantly impressed with the colonies of the German Temple Society. Their neat, well-built houses, carefully cultivated fields, and generally thrifty condition contrast very sharply with the squalor, filth and poverty of surrounding native villages. The stamp of intelligence, skill and industry marks the whole enterprise. It is an exotic civilization, bravely seeking to root itself in a foreign soil, with what permanent success the future only can tell.

These colonies are the outcome of a religious movement, based upon a particular interpretation of the prophecies. The following statement of the special views held by this people is drawn from one of the pamphlets published by the Rev. Christopher Hoffmann, and is occasionally expressed in his own words.

The destiny of man is to be "happy, perfectly happy, and happy forever." The prophets of Israel describe a kingdom of God, whose establishment upon earth shall embody this fundamental idea, and thus fulfill the destiny of man. They failed, however, to do more than awaken and preserve the hope of such a kingdom in the hearts of spiritually minded Israelites, and this hope operated no further than to call into existence a far weaker copy of the ancient people and kingdom of Israel, viz., the people of Judea. What the prophets failed to do, Jesus Christ accomplished. His resurrection was the actual realization of eternal life for man, and his earthly ministry, crowned by his propitiatory death, was the realization of God's kingdom upon earth. His followers were intrusted with the establishment of this kingdom on the earth. Believing that the Christianity of the last eighteen centuries has failed to realize the aim of the prophets and the mission of the Son of God, Christians who accept the peculiar views of the Temple feel called upon to separate themselves from existing churches, although in no spirit of opposition to their essential doctrines, and establish organizations in which, to some degree, the kingdom of God as a spiritual temple may be visibly embodied. These communities, as facts of the Temple of God, should be made up only of "living stones," of men who are filled with the spirit of Christ, and, consequently, no longer follow their own will, but the will of Christ and the Father. This church or the Temple is the only way to lasting happiness, not only for the individual, but for every collection of men who cherish the same faith concerning the kingdom of God, and make their collective life serve its interests, just as the individual makes his individual life serve the same end. When once it comes to pass that a nation is built upon a spiritual foundation, then the external realization of the kingdom of God upon earth will have begun. Such a kingdom would have a far more valid claim than ancient Israel to the name of the People of God, a name erroneously assumed by churches and denominations and by whole nations which believe themselves to be Christians. To collect this people of God, which Christianity has thus far failed entirely to accomplish, is the very first labor that, in accordance with the will of the Master, is to be done by members of the church of Christ, wherever they dwell, and by whatever name they may be called.

Since this labor is to be performed, the question arises at once, "Where is it to be begun?" The Temple is bound to no place. Where two or three are gathered together in his name, there he is in the midst of them. The prophet also says: "The whole earth must be covered with the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea." But a beginning must be made somewhere, and God through the prophets has clearly answered the question. Mt. Zion is the future center of the kingdom of God, when it shall be again realized in the form of a people. Therefore, the starting-point for the foundation of this people of God is Jerusalem and the territory adjacent to it Both Roman Catholic and Protestant churches have neglected the study of prophecy, and through that neglect, have obscured its aim by losing sight of this establishment of the kingdom of God upon earth. The Roman Catholics have erred in making the kingdom of God an outward, unspiritual organization. The Protestants have erred in making it an invisible spiritual kingdom, not organically embodied in visible form. The true idea of prophecy is that the kingdom of God should take form in a visible, God-fearing nation, of which Jerusalem is the center.

The objection against the present undertaking to found such a people, that Palestine has long been subject to war and intestine trouble, is met by the affirmation of God's omnipotent power to change entirely the present government and order of things. Another objection that the possession of the Promised Land was guaranteed only to the natural descendants of Abraham, in case they kept the law and obeyed the prophets, is answered by the fact that they did not comply with the condition, and therefore the prophecy of Isaiah was fulfilled in Christ. "The Lord shall slay thee, and call his servants by another name," lxv. 15. Through Christ is the beginning of the new kingdom of God upon the earth, and, consequently, the mission of restoring the Holy Land and Holy City was transferred from the Jews, the natural children of Abraham, to Christians, the true followers of Christ, who are Abraham's spiritual seed. All attempts to avoid this by accepting the spiritual calling of God's people, and the establishment of a divine kingdom without an earthly visible embodiment of that people, are based on a mistaken idea of the Scriptures. The failure of Christian churches to carry out the ideal of Christ and the prophets is the sign of the ripeness of the time for the establishment of the kingdom of God upon earth, Luke xviii. 8. This is not only a sign, but a constraining cause for every believer in and lover of Christianity in its true form, as the way to everlasting happiness of the world, may be visibly and materially represented.

In consequence of these peculiar ideas, about forty years ago a society was formed in Wurtemburg, with branches in Saxony, Hesse, South Russia, and North America, to prepare for the collection of the people of God in Palestine, by first establishing the Temple—i. e., a Christian community according to the command of Christ and his apostles, in various Christian countries for this purpose. The publication of the Suddeutsche Wacte, in 1815, was the first public step taken. In the Crimean war of 1853–6, to check the advance of Russia, Oriental affairs were brought so prominently before the attention of Europe, that an appeal was made to Christians and Jews for the gathering of the people of God in Palestine. At the same time twenty families took up their residence at Kirschenhardthof, in Wurtemburg, to begin a Christian community life, and form the center for the movement to settle Palestine. In 1861, on account of trouble with the ecclesiastical authority, the community at Kirschenhardthof and their associates in belief, separated from the Established church, and formed an independent organization called the Temple Society. Already, in 1855, three men had been sent to Palestine to examine the land as the destined place of settlement. In the following years several members of the Temple Society settled in various parts of the Holy Land; but it was not until 1868 that the Society sent out two of its principal men, and directed them to effect a more extended colonization in full conformity of the purpose of the Temple.

At the present time there are four colonies of the Temple in Palestine, one of Jaffa, one at Sarona, an hour's distance from Jaffa, one at Haifa, and one at Jerusalem. They number upward of 2,000 souls, and are slowly increasing by accessions from Germany and America. The colonists support themselves entirely by their own labor. Indeed, at Haifa, no one except a tolerably well-to-do person is allowed to join the colony. A man who wishes to be received at Haifa must be able, on his arrival, to place enough money in the hands of the Committee of the colony to support himself and family for three years. He is, however, entitled to all that he may earn during the three years. At the expiration of that time he may withdraw any money which remains of the sum placed in the Committee's hands, or leave it still in their charge as an investment, at six per cent. interest. All penniless persons, or such as have not sufficient money to comply with the above-mentioned rule on their arrival, are immediately sent back to Germany or America. This wise policy tends to keep the community on a sound financial basis, which is very important in a country whose government imposes such heavy restrictions on industry and enterprise by its taxation and extortion. Whatever may be one's opinion of the special object which led to the establishment of these colonies, they are materially a positive benefit to the country by their example of intelligent and thrifty labor amid all the difficulties which environ them.

These colonies value education, and have good common and high schools for their children. They also make provision for the sick by the establishment of hospitals under the charge of competent physicians. Although there is no distinctively missionary effort, some of their institutions are for the benefit of Jews and Mohammedans as well as Christians.

In 1874, for the purpose of unity of effort and greater effectiveness in carrying out their object, the colonies were united under one management, and the Rev. Christopher Hoffmann, of Jaffa, became the President. There are also elders in each community who possess considerable power. To the President and elders belong the general oversight of the spiritual condition of the membership, the management of the regular meetings of the congregations on Sundays, holidays, and all other times. Under the apostolic authority of the command that every soul be subject to the higher powers," they have the charge of the admission and exclusion of members. Yet, up to the present time, they have ordained no rules concerning the ordinances instituted in Christ. Believing that the divisions of Christianity have arisen from giving these an undue prominence, and thus putting external signs in place of the essence of the truth, they leave baptism and the celebration of the Lord's Supper to the conviction of individuals, until the unity of the Spirit shall have advanced far enough for universal regulations.

Harmony and prosperity prevail under the administration of Mr. Hoffmann; but whether the colonies are homogeneous enough to continue and increase under a less firm and able leader, time only can show. Thoroughly convinced that Turkey and Mohammedanism itself are near their final struggle for existence, these pioneers for the establishment of a visible spiritual Israel in the Holy Land expect a speedy triumph of their movement as the outcome of that struggle—J. N. Cushing, D.D.

THE BIBLE AND THE JEWS IN AFRICA.

From the closing part of an article in the New York Independent, by Dr. A. J. Gordon, we clip the follow items regarding the translation of the Scriptures into the languages of Africa, as well as respecting a Jewish remnant in that quarter of the world. Everything pertaining to the general circulation of the Scriptures, and to discoveries of portions of the exiled tribes, are signs of the ending of this age, and the advent of the Son of Man. To every indication of the coming age we wish to direct the attention of our readers.

Who that has read it, can forget the story, as told by himself, of Robert Moffat's translation of the last verse of the Scriptures into Bechuana? Single-handed he had nearly completed the task of turning the entire Bible into this African dialect. And now, as he reached the final verse of Scripture, he was so overpowered with joy and awe, that for a moment he was compelled to pause. He rose and walked the room; his heart beat like the strokes of a hammer; the feeling came over him that he must die, so intense was his agitation, and he only found calmness by throwing himself upon his knees and pouring out his heart in praise to God for having spared him to finish his task. Need of fruit shall we call this? Both, no doubt; "seed to the sower and bread to the eater." And now look upon the growing harvest in African versions. Mr. Cust, of England, who has given special attention to the subject, says that the Scriptures have been translated, in whole or in part, into sixty-six of the dialects of Africa, while the whole Bible has been rendered into eleven languages, spoken by multitudes of natives. Blessed streams of life for irrigating that vast desert! "When thou, O Lord, didst die on the cross," said an old Reformer, "thou didst put the Spirit of life in thy Word, and gavest it power to make alive through thine own dear blood, as thou thyself sayest, 'the words that I speak unto you they are spirit and life.'" What life shall come to Africa through these translations in recompense for manifold precious deaths?

Such is but a brief hint of the martyr-fruit which is ripening in the Dark Continent. The last retreats of darkness are being invaded and the morning cometh; and with the morning the removing of the blindness from Jews as well as Gentiles, and their recovery together to God. There is known to be a Jewish remnant in the heart of Africa; and in Zechariah there is a beautiful latter-day promise supposed by some to refer to such: "From beyond the rivers of Ethiopia my suppliants, even the daughters of my dispersed, shall bring mine offering." When Ethiopia shall have stretched out her hands unto God, and been healed, then will the Lord stretch out his hand and gather his dispersed from beyond the rivers of Ethiopia. Oh, Lord! how long? How long before the curse shall be lifted from Africa and "the open sore of the world" be healed? The seed has been planted in multitudes of graves, the first fruits have been gathered. God grant that soon the harvest may wave like Lebanon!

The Waiting Time.

No time of seeming inactivity is laid upon you by God without a just reason. It is God calling upon you to do his business by ripening in quiet all your powers for some higher sphere of activity which is about to be opened to you. The time is coming when you shall be called again to the front of the battle. Let that solemn thought of dread, yet kindling expectancy, fill the cup of your life with the inner work of self-development which will make you ready and prepared when your name is called. Ten thirty years at Nazareth, what was the result? A few years of action, but of action concentrated, intense, infinite; not one word, not one deed, which did not tell, and which will not tell upon the universe forever.

Thirty years of silence, and then—the regeneration of the world accomplished, his Father's business done.—Alford.

Communications.

Editor Restitution:

Bro. Colegrove's article in a late issue of THE RESTITUTION, reminds me of my own summersault on the question of the application of the Apocalypse. I had published in 1860, "The history of the Dragon, that old Serpent, the Devil and Satan," in which I had taken the then popular ground that the Apocalypse had been in process of realization from the commencement of Christianity, or the day of Pentecost. Some time after Bro. Luxford published a series of articles in the Gospel Banner and Millennial Advocate, in which he contended that the seals and perhaps the trumpets were in the past, the vials necessarily in the future; this argument directed my attention to the subject, and the result was I was forced to the conclusion that all was in the future. Subsequently the argument that John was simply translated into "the Lord's day" to behold the details of its unfolding and development spread a flood of light over its records, and enabled me to perceive that the realizations recognized as its fulfilment were only the shadows and types of its true fulfilment. Hence the important question, where is the Lord's day located in the chronology of our order of creation? I took the ground that it is the seventh day. That each of the days are made up of a thousand years, that consequently the seventh thousand years since our order of creation commenced will constitute the Lord's day, and John was in Spirit on the Lord's day, or translated in the Spirit to the day of the Lord, and witnessed the occurrences that are to take place in that day in type or shadow. Hence I recognize the age of our order of creation as the one important element that fixes our location toward the day of the Lord, and the Scriptures are the authoritative source of information on that subject, and gather therefrom that creation occurred 4122 years before the birth of the Christ.

Showing that the evening of the Lord's day commenced with the Jewish year of A. D. 1873. From 1873 to and inclusive of 1885, seven years, the first seal was opened during which period truth in all its aspects and relations was developed and manifested more than in any other previous period of the world's history. "It went forth conquering to conquer."

1886 The second seal is one to be opened. The rider on "the red horse" has power "to take peace from the earth." The labor question undoubtedly constituted the disturbing element of this seal, and I apprehend it will require seven years to adjust the principles upon which this disturbing question can be settled.

The black horse rider of the third seal will see that the principles agreed upon are adhered to or practically applied. The applications of these principles may consume another seven years. And we had better wait these developements before speculating further.

Q. B. STACY.

"No man can who soever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple." Luke xiv. 33.

Are your prayers and supplications, all of them, answered to your entire satisfaction? If not, let us examine at least one probable cause, which may be found in the above words of our blessed Master. I think we shall not err much if we consider prayer simply as a check or draft upon the bank of heaven, if this is so, should we not first ask, have I any deposit there upon which I may draw. If so what have I deposited, how stands my account there, how much has my Heavenly Father already lent me, and what proportion of this have I returned to my credit at his bank, for unless we deposit largely of that which he has already given us, we need not expect him to honor our large petitions. He may lend us more if he sees it is wisely used, we cannot retain all he has given us and be sure that he will give us more. Was not this the law that governed our blessed Master when he came to this wicked world, giving up the honor and glory which he had with the Father, to labor, suffer and die? Did he not thus make a very, very great deposit, (sacrifice) which he never has and never will over-draw, and does he not say to each one of us "follow thou me" and thus prove your love to me, and then "ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you." Our Heavenly Father is a wise banker, he knows perfectly what he has lent us, and how we have used it. "If we suffer with him we shall also reign with him." If we belong to the body of Christ, we shall never over-draw our deposit, but every petition will be honored and granted, this is his promise if we abide in him, John xv. 7.

THE COMING AGE,

—ITS—

Nature and Proximity.

—By J. P. WEETHEE —

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprise; the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which that has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents honest views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it is the one book concerning the coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events, it discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great directing Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Uncomprehensible Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who governs and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in cloth. Price $1.50. Send to this office for this work.

The Law, the Covenants, and the Sabbath.

—By L. C. Thomas.—

Title page.—"The Law, the Covenants; and the Sabbath. Also an Epitome of the Great Salvations; and an Appendix including various other subjects, in brief.

The perfect unchangeable moral law is considered and shown to be the basis and spirit of the old Sinaitic law, now dead in its entirety. The law of Moses and law of Christ are compared and contrasted; and the relation of both to the old and new covenants is treated at some length. The Sabbath question is carefully and lengthily examined, and presented and discussed in a somewhat new light.

The work also includes the consideration of Sunday, conditional immortality, the gospel, return of the Jews, the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, punishment of the wicked, the state of the dead, the new birth, the one faith, the one hope, the image of God, nature of Christ, the name, the religion, morality, Christianity, etc. This work contains 350 pages. ### The Things Concerning the Name of Jesus Christ. Acts viii. 12.

Leaving out the words "name of" the above phrase is shortened to read, The things concerning Jesus Christ. In Eph. v. 32, Paul says I speak concerning Christ. Luke says he expounded unto them in all Scriptures the things concerning himself, chapt xxiv. 27 see 44. In the light of these texts we can not suppose that the burden of Philip's discourse was touching the proper name, Jesus or any of the divine titles which he bore, but concerning him the personality on whom rested so worthily the many wonderful titles by which he is designated in the Scriptures. It was not a question about these though many or all may have been used in setting him forth.

This history, the Acts of the Apostles, gives us no full report of any sermon or series of sermons preached on any occasion under which converts were made to Christianity. I have sometimes, not wisely perhaps, wished it had given us one such report at least, so that we might know just what things and how many were proclaimed to sinners as prerequisites to a valid baptism. With such a history before us we would still be left in doubt unless accompanied by the statement that these things and nothing less than these must be embraced in the faith of the awakened sinner to make his repentance and baptism valid. In this report of Philip's preaching is given the nearest synopsis. There is here no formula of doctrine—nothing in the shape of a creed. So we are left to gather up the things concerning Jesus as we find them scattered here and there.

Turning to the commission as recorded by Luke we read: That it behooved Christ to suffer and to rise from the dead the third day, and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations. Chapter xxiv. 46, 47. Peter addressing his own countrymen said: God.. raised up Jesus whom ye slew and hanged on a tree. He hath God exalted with (to) his right hand to be a Prince and Savior, to give repentance to Israel and remission of sins. Acts v. 31. Through this man is proclaimed remission of sins. Every one that believeth is justified from all things from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses, Acts xiii. 38 Peter testified to the Jews that "Jesus was a man approved of God by miracles, wonders, and signs," and further that "he was crucified—slain and raised up to sit on David's throne, and made both Lord and Christ" Acts ii. Again this same apostle says: "It is he which was ordained of God to be Judge of quick and dead," and he tells us he with other witnesses was commanded to preach this to the people. Acts x. 41. All these things center in the Christ, the only name given under heaven whereby we must be saved. He is set forth in Apostolic preaching as a man approved of God, demonstrating his power, his wonderful claims and his moral fitness by miracles and signs; as dying for our sins according to the Scriptures and raised the third day, 1 Cor. xv. 1—for our justification, Rom. iv. 25; as the man to sit on David's throne, Acts ii. 30, at some future time when he shall rule over the house of Jacob forever, Luke ii. 33; as Lord, Master and Proprietor to own and control whatever God the Father places under him, the territorial domain of his kingdom and its wonderful resources of wealth and happiness together with all its living agencies, its subjects, its joint and subordinate rulers, as Judge of quick and dead, to decide on the principles of love and mercy, and justice, the destiny of individuals and nations, awarding to the good and worthy life, place, trust, glory and honor, and to evil doers of every grade, the punishment written in the Word of the Lord.

By these primitive heaven-ordained preachers, men were exhorted and commanded to believe in him as the Son of God, begotten by the Holy Ghost, to believe in his mission of mercy and love, in the words he spake and the deeds he wrought, in his official relations to the Father and his alienated creatures, and finally to believe in the promises and his ultimate purposes touching the ages to come. All the circumstances of the case so environ sinful man as to bar every passage and shut him up to a most emphatic faith in this personal Savior, this Jesus, this Nazarene of the law and the prophets. All was in him. Through him God worked and will work. Heaven's pity, compassion, love, mercy, peace and pardon abound to the fallen race through him. It is no wonder then that in apostolic times every thing was done in his name, from the giving of a cup of cold water up to the mighty work of raising the dead. Pamphilus with this "all availing" name God's messengers bore the glad tidings of love and mercy to the world. Through him they came off conquerors and more than conquerors. To self-righteous Jew and learned and dispassionate Greek, they proclaimed hope only in his name, for reformation of life and character was a grant through him. Repentance in the name of Socrates or Lycurgus as moral reformers and teachers, would avail nothing for the philosophic Greek, and something more than the righteousness of the Law was absolutely necessary to give to the natural seed of Abraham, place and position in the Messianic kingdom. Many things are written concerning Jesus in the law and the prophets, in the four inspired biographies of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, in the Acts of the Apostles and in the historic allusions found in the epistles, but it is not at all likely that all these things were focalized in one sermon or summed up in the faith of a repentant sinner in order to the validity of his baptism. It will not do to insist on fulness of detail in this case. It seems highly probably that in the presentation of things concerning the name of Jesus as well as the things in reference to the kingdom, wherever the need was felt and the question elicited "what shall I do to be saved, baptism was commanded, or repentance and baptism as on the first Pentecost after Christ's ascension; and this no doubt as a point in the instruction somewhat short of completeness in detail.

JOHN L. WINCH.

THE TRANSLATION OF THE SAINTS.

But how will they be trusted with, or disposed of, by the Lord, who shall be left to pass through the great tribulation? Many will be beheaded for the testimony of Jesus, and for the word of God:" these will be resurrected, will live again, at the end of the tribulation, or the beginning of the thousand years, as we learn from Rev. xx. 4. In the fifth verse, the resurrection of "the rest of the dead" is referred to as taking place at the finishing of the thousand years; and of these two resurrections, that of the martyred saints is the first; but they may be reckoned as a part of the resurrection of "the dead in Christ," mentioned by Paul in 1 Thess. iv. 16, as they will join them, and with them reign with Christ. But wide spread as the persecution will be, and numerous as they will be who will suffer death for not worshiping the beast, some who are equally faithful in refusing such worship, may nevertheless escape the hand of violence. While they suffer much, they may live through the hour of trial. How will they be disposed of? Without doubt they will be changed in a moment, under the seventh trumpet, translated, and will then join "the first fruits," who were translated before the pouring out of the bowls.

It has been thought that the holy ones in the church who are ready for translation at the first stage of the Lord's appearing, will be the only company who will reign with him in the kingdom; it has been concluded that those whose faith and love are so defective as to exclude them from participating in that translation, and who are therefore left to pass through the great tribulation, will not form a part of that exalted company, notwithstanding they will be saved. We are persuaded that this is a wrong view. It is of these very martyred saints that it is said, "And they lived, and reigned with Christ a thousand years." They will, therefore, be exalted to the position of being co-heirs with Christ. Though untruthful during a part of their Christian course, they repent, and afterwards become so faithful as to choose martyrdom rather than swerve from Christ. But we think it quite consistent with the analogy of Scripture to infer from this circumstance, that although they are permitted to join those who are resurrected before the hour of trial, and these who are caught up alive to meet the Lord in the air, and with them become joint rulers in the kingdom, they may not occupy the like high positions. The fruitfulness may be more distinguished, may have higher degrees of glory and honor. Oh what a motive this should be with Christians to faithfulness and watchfulness. We confess to you that we have an earnest desire to be among the firstfruits. Should death come, we want to die in such faith and hope as that we shall have a part with those who are first raised from among the dead. And should Jesus come while we are alive, we want to be in such a state of preparedness as to be accounted worthy to have a part in the translation of the saints. We would not like to be among those who will be left behind to pass through the terrible sufferings of the time of trouble.

Jehovah has declared that they who honor him, he will honor; and if we desire the honor of translation at the parousia of Christ, we must honor him daily and hourly by a holy life, by a pure conversation, by cherishing an unselfish spirit, and by having our eye on the divine glory as the motive of every Christian work. There are some who think that this peculiar distinction will be bestowed only on those who hold second advent truth, and are looking for the appearing of Jesus. But some who, owing to defective education and unscriptural teaching, may not have been led to see this and other kindred truths as we see them, may, on account of their whole-hearted love to Christ, and their extraordinary earnestness in winning souls to Christ be deemed worthy to be among "the firstfruits unto God and the Lamb;" while others, whose views of this doctrine are more correct, will be left behind, because the belief of the doctrine has not been allowed duly to influence their lives. God requires us to search his word that we may have right apprehensions of the truth; this is of great importance; but it is of still greater importance that we be sanctified in the truth, and that our walk in the truth should be blameless.

After the translation of the holy ones, the elect, after many who were, are not, because God will have taken them away, there will be a great amazement and dread not only among sinners, but in the professing church. They will then have brought very vividly to their remembrance the prophecies which teach that Christ will come as a thief, and that some shall be taken and others left. And when, in thousands of instances, one neighbor misses his next door neighbor, and friend misses friend, and husband or wife, or son or daughter in the family, are no more to be found, we may better conceive of the astonishment and fear than we can express it. And at the same time an angelic messenger will be sent to warn the inhabitants of the earth of the judgments that will then fall upon them, and to proclaim an eternal gospel, crying with a loud voice, "Fear God, and give him glory." These things will doubtless have the effect of awakening many sinners, and stirring up multitudes of slack and imperfect Christians—the class set forth by the five foolish virgins—to renewed diligence and more fervent prayer and greater faith. It can scarcely be otherwise. When they see that their more faithful brethren and sisters are accounted worthy of a translation that they may escape the terrible time of trial, that time which will then try, or tempt, the earth's inhabitants, and that they, on account of unfaithfulness, are left to pass through it, it will cause deep and inexpressible sorrow, and without doubt, in numerous instances, renewed and more entire consecration to God. It will then be seen that the efforts many are now making to call attention to the Lord's second coming, and to warn the church and the world of the nearness of that event, were grounded on the teaching of God's Word. It will then be seen, in the clear light of actual realities, what moral insanity they were guilty of, who now sneer and scoff at the doctrine of Christ's second appearing. It will indeed then be seen that all our present labors on this line, whether in the pulpit or through the press, fell short of what the importance of the wonderful theme demanded. Second Advent truth which by some preachers and writers is now even ridiculed, will then be believed and received. But it is far more blessed to believe the truth on the authority of the Bible, to have faith in the declarations of inspired prophets and apostles, and so stand in readiness for the things that are shortly to come to pass, than to doubt and disbelieve, and move on a low religious plane, and be only half prepared when the solemn realities, as lightning, flash upon your vision.

You believe this morning will come when the saints will be missing, when it will be found that during the night they have been taken away. If you believe the Word, you must believe that such a morning will some day dawn upon the world. You may believe it is very distant; we believe it is very near. For your belief, you have no Scriptural foundation; you secretly wish the day to be far off, and that is about the only thing that is at the basis of your belief; for our belief, we have certain Scriptural signs by which we may know when the event is approaching, and we have also various facts taking place before our eyes fulfilling the prophecies of Holy Scripture; and there are thousands of Bible students in the present day who believe that the predictions of the prophets are being fulfilled, and that the end of the age is near. Now this subject is too important to be sneered at, or to be treated with indifference. If you will not voluntarily take it up for study and contemplation and prayer, it will shortly force itself upon your attention in a manner the most unwelcome to you; for soon the great realities of the hour will burst upon you. It is for us to give a trumpet warning, and admonish you to give heed to this matter. Carelessness, or indifference towards it, or a postponement of it may be followed with peril and unavailing regret. Let no Christian ever allow himself on any night to close his eyes in sleep without a clear consciousness of his acceptance with God, lest that night should be the night of the saints rapture, and he should be left behind.

The true church, the believers, the saints or holy ones among men being removed by translation; that which now restraineth being taking out of the way; God's purpose of decree being accomplished in completing the number of the elect race,—the royal priesthood; this being done, the "man of sin, the lawless one, sometimes called the Antichrist, and sometimes the beast, will be revealed. He will then rise up, the way being prepared for him by the falling away from the truth, and the receiving up of the pure and the holy.

The Book of Jobab, called Job, Son of Zare, Son of Hregnel, Son of Hesab, Son of Isaac, Son of Habraam: according to the Septuagint.

CHAP. XXXIII.

1. No indeed! But do thou Job hearken unto my spoken words, and mark my plain talk well.

2. For lo, I opened my mouth and my tongue hath spoken plainly.

3 My heart shall be clean in what it says, and the understanding of my lips shall apprehend clean things.

4 Divine Spirit is it that made me and a breath of the Almighty is it that teacheth me.

5. If thou art able, give me an answer to these things; be patient, stand opposed to me and I to thee;

6. Of clay wert thou formed as was I also; of the same thing were we formed.

7. Fear of me will not unduly constrain thee, nor will my hand be heavy upon thee.

8. But thou didst say in my hearing; I heard the sound of thy words;

9. Why dost thou say I am cleansed, I am not a sinner? I am blameless, yea I have not transgressed the law.

10 And he hath found fault with me, and accounted me as an adversary.

11. And hath put my foot in a stock and hath set a watch over all my ways.

12. Yea how dost thou say I am just, and he hath not listened to me? For he is an Everlasting One over and above mortals (the term — aiwnios — here comes to mean everlasting in this way. He is one who lives his own lifetime or "breathing-space" and this we know from the general teaching is eternal or a to aei wn, the ever breathing space).

13. And thou sayest, in the execution of what right from me is it that he hath not hearkened to any spoken word of mine?

14 For in the Lord having spoken once, yea twice,

15 By dream, or in meditative thought by night, as when for instance some dreadful fear falleth upon men in their couch.

16. He then clearoth up man's mind, and hath affrighted them with such fearful shapes,

17. To turn man away from wrongdoing, and hath snatched his body from the impending blow;

18. And hath spared his life from death and prevented his falling in war:

19 And hath again convicted him in weakness upon his couch, and benumbed all his bones;

20. And no mortal food can he take, and his soul (living organic body) will long for food,

21. Until his flesh becometh corrupt and his bones show uncovered;

22. And his soul hath drawn nigh unto death, and his life (zoe, the abstract principle) to Hades;

23. If there be a thousand death-bringing angels; not one of them shall pierce him, if he apprehend in heart to turn unto the Lord and declare his faulty condition to man, and point out his want of reflection;

24. He shall spread up grass to fall to death, and he will renew his body like the paint that has become dull upon a wall, and his bones be filled with arrows;

25. Yea his flesh will he make as softly delicate as that of a child, and to be a man among men will he restore him;

26 And when he hath offered his vow unto the Lord his offerings will also be acceptable, he will enter in with a cheerful countenance, together with a confession of praise, and he will pay the righteousness he owes to men;

27. Then after that, this man will blame himself, and say what have I perfected? Not to a way that my sins deserved hath his preliminary examination tried me.

28. Save my soul from going to corruption and my life (zoe) shall see light.

29 Lo, all these things hath the Strong One wrought in three ways with a man (a true man)

30 And he hath delivered my soul from death, that my life (zoe) may praise him in light.

31. Mark it well, Job, and hear me; Be dumb and I will talk:

32. If thou hast words answer me: Talk; for I desire to have thee justified;

33. If not, hear me; be dumb, and I will teach thee.

"The One-Story Cot in the Lane."

Air—Little Brown Cot on the Hill.

How dear to my heart are the spots where I played,
Well in sight of a fond mother's eye!
Though far, far away from the old home I've strayed,
I still think of it's sad, sad good-bye.

CHORUS—
Oh mother's now dead, and father's grown old,
Ah, my tears I can hardly restrain!
Yet, fear I shall never my boy-home behold,
The one-story cot in the lane.

If I may not again see my dear native shore,
Nor walk by those murmuring streams
In fancy I'll pass, on the clay hills no more,
And speak with old friends in my dreams.

CHORUS—Oh mother's now dead, etc.

I wish my Mother wouldn't grow old, nor her hair turn gray, said a dear girl to her mother, while tears came in her eyes, and as she lovingly encircled her arms around her mother's neck The reply was, only ripening for the better age. How it lightens the mother's heart, to hear such expressions from their pure Girls be kind to your mothers. You can never realize the anxiety and care they have for you, until you fill their places. Obey your parents, is strictly a Bible command. Eph. vi. 1. "Children obey your parents in the Lord, for this is right," also Col. iii. 20. "Children obey your parents in all thing, for this is well pleasing unto the Lord." What if you are sometimes disappointed in your calculations, better obey your parents; "It is well pleasing unto the Lord." You are promised it will be well with you and that you will live long on the earth, when the earth is made new, Paradise restored. Then mother won't look old, nor her hair be gray. This is what she is toiling for, and she wants all her girls to be there with her. Girls, be kind to your mother.

N. ROBERTS.

Dear Children:

When Israel departed from the living God, he permitted them to fall into the hands of their enemies, but if there was one righteous one among them he manifested a peculiar care over such. On a certain day a man of God, whose name signifies, "A breaker" was threshing his wheat near the winepresses, and no doubt, crying to the Lord for help, as Israel's enemies had greatly impoverished them, so that they had to hide in dens and caves. While the breaker was dividing the wheat from the chaff, an angel of the Lord came, and sat under an oak tree, situated in a place which signifies, "Dust." While the breaker was wondering how he could hide the handful of wheat from those whose name signifies, "Judgment," the angel of the Lord sweetly whispered, "The Lord is with thee, thou mighty man of valor." The sorrowful breaker said, Oh my Lord, if the Lord be with us why then is all this befallen us? And Jehovah looked upon him and said, "Go in this thy might, and thou shalt save Israel from the hand of their enemies, have not I sent thee?" and he said, Oh my Lord how can I save Israel? my family is the meanest, and the tribe to which I belong signifies, "Forgotten," and I am considered the least in my father's family. And the Lord said unto him, "Surely I will be with thee, and thou shalt smite Israel's enemies as one man." The breaker's spirit was so dejected with the seven years oppression, that he said to the angel, Show me a sign that thou talkest with me? and when the breaker perceived it was the angel of Jehovah he said, Alas, O Lord God: for I have seen an angel of the Lord face to face, but the Lord comforted him, saying, Peace be unto thee, fear not, thou shalt not die. Then the breaker built an altar unto the Lord, and named it (Margin) "Jehovah send peace." After this, the Spirit of the Lord clothed the breaker, and he blew a trumpet, calling together a people whose name signifies, "My father's help," of the tribe whose name signifies, "The son of my right hand." Then the messengers were sent to three other tribes, the first signifies, "Blessedness," the second, "A dwelling," the third, "A struggling." But before the breaker could have courage to go forth to the work of overcoming Israel's enemies completely, he prayed that another sign might be given him, and if this was given him from the Lord, he was sure of Israel's salvation. Then he prayed, Behold I will put a fleece of wool in the floor, which is the covering of a lamb, and if the dew be on the fleece only, and it be dry on all the earth beside, then shall I know thou wilt save Israel by mine hand, and it was so. The heavenly dew is so copious when wrung out of the covering of the lamb in the morning, that it filled a bowl full. More than the fleece caught the begotten drops of distilling dew But this was not all, the breaker needed another sign to satisfy his earnest mind of Israel's complete victory. Another dark night had to overshadow the place, and another bright morning had to usher in a new sign, that not only the covering of the lamb was wet with heavenly dew, but his prayer was, On all the ground, let there be dew, and so, when the morning came the covering of the lamb was dry, but on all the ground the sparkling drops of heavenly dew comforted the breaker that his work was of the Lord, and Israel's redemption drew nigh. When Jehovah will be as dew to Israel, and Israel shall be in the midst of many, as a dew from the Lord. When the breaker realized this token from the Lord, he pitched beside the well of Harod, or "Fear and astonishment." There the Lord commanded him to separate the fearful from the courageous. Many were called, but only a few were fit for the work. Those unqualified were to depart early from Mt. Gilead, or a heap of witnesses. Ten thousand were retained. Yet these had to be tested, courage was not the only thing necessary to fill the breaker's ranks, and only those who could labor with the tongue and hand, were chosen for the great work of redeeming Israel. The breaker was commanded to bring the thousand warriors to the water, and every one that could lap water as a dog lappeth with his tongue, were chosen, and the number of them that lapped putting his hand to his mouth were three hundred. And the Lord said to the breaker, by these will I save Israel. Water is an emblem of life, and the dog whispers the Gentiles, Jesus called them dogs. But through the tender mercy of God, they are to be fellow heirs with Christ. The breaker in this beautiful narrative is a true figure of Jesus Christ, and the work he has yet to accomplish. The first thing the breaker did was to build an altar, calling it Jehovah send peace. The next thing he did, while the people were wrapped in slumber, was to destroy Baal, "The shameful thing." Then the breaker was clothed with Spirit, and he blew a trumpet bidding his father's help to come. Then the dew from heaven fell as a token of Israel's redemption, and the noble warriors are those who have stooped to drink of the waters of life. "The little flock," like David's three noble warriors, who risked their lives to bring water to the King. When the shadows of night came the Lord said, Arise, go down unto the host, for I have delivered Israel's enemies into thine hand, but if thou art afraid take thy servant with thee; he did so, and Israel's enemies, were like grasshoppers for multitude, but while the breaker was near the ranks, a young man told a dream he had dreamt. He said Lo a cake of barley bread tumbled into the host, and came into a tent, and smote it that it fell. And his companion said, This is nothing else save the sword of the breaker, for into his hand hath God delivered Israel's enemies. This dream with its interpretation, one loaf, gave the breaker new strength, and he soon called his little band together, and divided them into three companies, giving into the hand of each man a trumpet and in the other hand a pitcher containing a fire brand, or lamp. Then the breaker said to his warriors, "Look on me, and do likewise. When I blow with a trumpet then blow ye the trumpets, on every side of the camp, and say, "The sword of the Lord and the breaker," and just as the watch was newly set by the enemy, the noble warriors blew the trumpets, and broke the pitcher in their hands, and when the trumpets in their right hand were sounded blood and the brilliant light blazed forth from their broken earthen vessels, with the cry from three hundred and one voices, The sword of the Lord and the breaker, the enemies of Israel ran, cried, fled and every man's hand was against his brother. They fled to a place signifying, "The house of Chorus," from thence to a place signifying, "Mourning of sickness." The breaker sent messengers to other tribes to come and help, that he may fill his bow with Ephraim, or Fruitful. The breaker then destroyed two princes, the name of the one signifies, "A wolf," the other, "A raven," the unclean bird was slain at the winepress. Then the little band of warriors passed over Jordan faint, yet still pursuing their enemies, and returned before the sun had risen as mighty conquerors, "Each one resembling the children of a King" whom the breaker called his brethren. Surely the battle is not with the strong, not by might, but by my Spirit, saith Jehovah.

Your affectionate Teacher.

E. COFFMAN.

RENEW TODAY.

Some articles and literary notices must await a place in future numbers.

Sister Carrie Williams' article on the resurrection, with response thereto by the Editor of the Christadelphian will appear next week, Deo Volente.

The January numbers of the following foreign papers have all come to hand: The Rainbow, Jewish Herald, and Israel's Watchman, published in London, England; the Bible Standard, published at Malvern Link, England, and the Messenger, published at Glasgow, Scotland. These are all excellent numbers of very valuable public journals. We give an interesting article this week from the Jewish Herald.

THE OUTLOOK.

While the Great Powers are all with one consent preparing for war, the feeble hope for a long continued peace is a mere illusion are long to be dissipated. Russia, France, Germany, Austria, England and Turkey are all shaping their course as though a conflict was an absolute certainty. That Russia is preparing for some great movement is a foregone conclusion. That Constantinople and Central Asia are the destined objects of acquisition is but too obvious to all other powers. That the current year will pass without war is not looked for by those best qualified to know what is most likely to result from national complications. That the time has come for that solution of the Eastern Question that will open the way for the emancipation of Palestine from Turkish rule, and for the return of the exiled tribes of Judah and Israel to the father-land, is fully apprehended by students of prophecy.

The great movements of the age are toward the final consummation. The "Times of the Gentiles" are nearly fulfilled. To be living, as we undoubtedly are, in the closing generation of these "times" is a very solemn and important consideration. It is for us to look up, for our redemption now draweth nigh. It is for us to look forward, for the kingdom of God is next in order. It is for us to look at the present, and ask, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? If the course of this age be nearly run, it is a time of great responsibility. If the end of all things pertaining to the course of the "world that now is" is at hand, then surely

"We are living, we are dwelling,
In a grand and awful time."

If the coming of the Lord is now, as everything indicates, imminent, then assuredly

"Life greatens in these later years;
The century's aloe flowers to-day."

If the Gospel age is so near its close, how important that we should each and every one of us esteem the part assigned us of doing something for the cause of our dear Redeemer as a precious trust, and as something that we are to do, not only willingly, but gladly, trusting in the love of our soon-coming Lord to bestow that "crown of glory that fadeth not away."

He that has promised the crown is faithful, and his promise can be depended upon; but it is required of us, on our part, to be faithful also if the work intrusted to us, if we expect to gain the fadeless prize.

JEWISH ROTES.

From Jerusalem some important excavations are reported. The Dominican monks bought a piece of property about three hundred metres from the Damascus gate. Six metres under the present surface the workmen found a subterranean vault of considerable size, and with carefully built walls. A short distance from this they found a chapel at whose entrance was a stone covered with inscriptions. Before this could be discovered the stone had been stolen, and nothing has been heard of its whereabouts since. Some fine specimens of mosaic were also unearthed, and as the remains of some splendid columns were found there, it was the opinion that this is the place where, in the fifth Christian century, the empress Eudoxia erected a magnificent basilica to the honor of St. Stephen. Later the workmen discovered a large and beautiful room with walls of stone. Two of the walls contain each two niches which form the entrance to four large chambers for the dead. On both sides of each chamber was a place for depositing a body, and in the background room for one or two more. The central room opens into a second room which contained three large sarcophagi with lids. It is thought that this is the place where Helen, queen of Adiabene and her two sons are buried. A large number of bones of dead bodies were found in these rooms, but no further inscriptions of any kind were seen.

The Germans are active in mission and charity work in Jerusalem. Since the death of Bishop Gobat, the two most prominent Germans in the Holy City are Architect Schick and the "Orphan's Father" Schneller. The former has been an official resident there for many years. He is a thoroughly educated man, and his topographical studies in Jerusalem and Palestine constitute some of the most valuable contributions to our knowledge of the Holy Land. He co-operates heartily with the German Palestine Society in its work. He has taken great interest in mission work also, devoting his main attention to the cause of Jewish missions. The persecution of the Jews in Russia, Rumelia, and other countries of Eastern Europe, about three years ago drove thousands of poverty-stricken Jews to Palestine, where there are already poor Jews in superabundance. The enterprise of the Christian mission created for these refugees an agricultural colony at the village of Artuf, between Jerusalem and Jaffa, where an opportunity to earn a living and secure an education for their children was offered. The enterprise was in the hands of Rev. Friedlander, a missionary in the employ of the British Society for Jewish missions. The venture has proved almost a failure, and the colony is now reported to be almost deserted. The colonists apparently took their chances at a few pennies of the annual donations sent from all the world to the Jews of Jerusalem, rather than earn an honest living by tilling the soil. Schick was also much interested in this work. Schneller established, about twenty years ago, an orphan's home in Jerusalem, and has done much for the education, both intellectual and manual, of the Arab boys and girls of the neighborhood. The work done in the asylum far surpasses that of the native Turkish manufacturers.

Exegetical.

EXEGESIS OF JOB xvi. 22; xvii. 1.

Authorized Version.—"When a few years are come then shall I go the way whence I shall not return. My breath is corrupt, my days are extinct, the grave is ready for me."

Revised Version.—"For when a few years are come, I shall go the way whence I shall not return. My spirit is corrupted, my days are extinct, the grave is ready for me."

Literal Version.—"But the numbered years are come, when I go the way I shall not return, a
My breath is spent,
My days are cold,
The tomb—for me!

These verses are intimately connected in sense and relative dependence, and should not have been separated by the chapter division; that would have been better placed after the twenty-first verse of the sixteenth chapter. But that division, existing not in Job's speech as originally delivered, need not be recognized in the exegesis of these verses.

Viewed together, there is, in the Authorized and Revised versions, an apparent incongruity between these verses. In the first verse, Job's utterance, as given in these versions, seems to express his expectation of living a few years longer; and yet in the next verse he speaks of his days as at an end. To reconcile this apparent incongruity it may be urged that the intended import of the declaration in the first verse is, that when the few years of life allotted Job are come, then he will depart; not precluding the supposition that such period has now come to its close.

A translation needing such elucidation may well be replaced by one which needs it not. In the Literal version no such incongruity or obscurity exists. Job's declaration there is plain and positive in both verses, that he views his death as near. In the first verse he says:

"But the numbered years are come
When I go the way I shall not return."

And in confirmation of this in the next verse adds:

"My breath is spent,
My days are cold,
The tomb—for me!"

The clearness and consistency of this translation in all its parts are appreciable by the ordinary reader, and of its fidelity to the original, scholars may judge by comparison of it with the Hebrew text.

Its accordance with the subsequent part of Job's speech, and its fit expression of the transition which he makes in the first verse, from the previous part of his discourse, will be apparent on inspection of the context.

Such examination will make the reason manifest why Job's antithetical utterance in the first verse is introduced by a particle more properly interpreted "for" than "when," or "for when" in expressing the antithesis.

In a supreme agony of his sufferings Job pleads with God for relief from them; and, as if despairing of it otherwise than by death, he exclaims:

"Oh! the numbered years are come
When I go the way I shall not return."

Its fitness thus to express Job's meaning warrants the sense given that particle in the Literal version, while it is also sanctioned by a like interpretation in other similar cases.

The phrase "numbered years," in the Literal version, is given as the proper rendering of the clause in the Hebrew text, reading "years of number." This is a Hebraism where the last noun has the force of an adjective, qualifying the first. Hence its meaning in English becomes manifest on converting the last noun into an adjective, and placing it before the first, as in the above case.

The idea that man has a fixed allotted time in one which Job had elsewhere expressed, as in xiv. 5: "Seeing his days are determined, the number of his months is with thee, thou hast appointed his bounds that he cannot pass." In Job's declaration in the last clause of the first verse, is implied the important truth that death cuts off all his hope of earthly enjoyment. This is essential to the validity of the test designed by God in disproof of Satan's impeachment of Job's piety as based on worldly motives.

In the second verse, in confirmation of the first, Job avows his summons to the grave, tersely, and fitly, thus:

"My breath is spent,
My days are cold,
The tomb—for me!"

In the A. V. Job is represented as speaking in the first line of this verse, of the bad quality of his breath, without its being any necessary indication of impending death.

In the R. V., same line, his "spirit" is spoken of by him as "consumed," indicating spiritual rather than natural death.

The Literal version gives a sense to the first line, aptly significant of natural death.

In the second line, the Literal version substitutes "cold" for "extinct" as read in the other versions. Tsil is from the verb tsil, which has among its meanings, "count," "number," "enumerate," etc. In the prior verse Job speaks of his "numbered years"; in this verse, of his days as numbered, counted off, told; hence the latter term more aptly expresses the meaning than "extinct." Besides, it better serves the poetic rhythm.

The last line is an impassioned ejaculation by Job, which is all the more forcible for the ellipsis, which the Literal version preserves.

In conclusion, it is hoped that the above Literal version of these texts, with this brief exposition, will aid in rendering their true import obvious to Bible readers.—Joseph A. Seiss, in N. Y. Observer.

SEEDS OF KINDNESS.

There never was a golden sunbeam
That fell on mortal place,
But left some trace of its presence
That time could never efface:
Not a song of ineffable sweetness,
That rapture's self inspires,
Then slumbered in silence forgotten
For many and many a year.

But a word of a song might awaken
Its magic of power anew,
Long after the sweet-voiced singer
Had faded from earthly view;
Now a heart that was sear so weary,
Or tainted with sin and guilt,
But a word of tender compassion
Might find an abiding place there.

Then scatter the aphorisms of kindness,
Though you deadly may never be known:
The harvest will ripen in glory,
If the seeds be faithfully sown
And life will close with a blessing
As it fades into endless day,
Like the golden hues of the sunbeam,
That fade in the twilight gray.

THE BIRTH OF CHRIST.

This great event, the most momentous in the history of the world—since it divides it into its two great parts, and is the hidden pole around which gravitate all human destinies—took place as unheralded as the most obscure. No one marked it, except the angels in heaven, and some shepherds, who were keeping their flocks on one of the hills which surrounded Bethlehem. It was a season of the year when the softened temperature sometimes made it needless to lead the sheep into the city at evening time. It was, doubtless, one of those beautiful oriental nights when the heavens proclaim nothing but mercy. Those simple men were chosen as the first to receive the good tidings of great joy, because they were waiting for it. Everything in those fields, where the young David, like themselves, had fed his flock, reminded them of the promise made to his race, and they, as well as the Scribes at Jerusalem, had doubtless read the mysterious oracle, which declared that the very ground they were treading should be the cradle of the Messiah. Suddenly the startled air resounds with a mysterious choir; they hear angelic voices, and Divine words proclaim in their ears:

"Glory, to God in the highest,
Peace on earth, good will toward men."

The shepherds believed the things which were spoken; simple, artless men they were, who had not learnt in the schools at Jerusalem only to admit as possible money that which the Pharisees could comprehend. They deemed it not strange—and we are at one with them—that angels, man's elder brothers, dwellers in a purer region where evil had not come, should celebrate with their sweetest songs, such an event as the birth of the Redeemer.

Bethlehem is built on a little hill; it is surrounded with lesser hills which do not shut in the horizon. Fertile and wooded plains abound on this high level, from beyond which a soft and yet striking landscape stretches away to the mountains of Moab and the steppes of the Dead Sea. The shepherds were encamped on one of those lovely meadows, planted with olive and fig trees, which may still be seen; from thence they set out in haste to the town, and in a steep and narrow street, they find the holy child wrapped in swaddling clothes and lying in a manger. They know his glory, and they see his humiliation. In lowly adoration they fall at his feet. These poor men, rich in faith and love, are the first retinue of the King of souls, as the cradle is his first throne. No honor could better become him, nothing could better show over what kingdom he came to reign. "Oh! with what majesty does he appear to the spirit," exclaims Pascal. Mary looked on, adoring, with trembling, as much greatness in as much frailty; she made of all these memories a sacred treasure which she "laid up in her heart," to transmit them unbroken to the church.—Dr. Pressensé.

Notes By the Way.

I stayed my last while at Brother Eaton's on West Plum River. I went to the Dow school house Thursday night, Dec. 9, and continued till Sunday with fair audiences and good attention. Sunday night returned to the Easton school house and continued till the next Thursday night; that closed our meetings. Here let me express my thanks to the brethren and friends for their kind hospitality and financial aid which they gave me while among them. Quite a number seem to be interested and we hope will soon become obedient believers.

Friday, the 17th, we took the parting hand with friends in this place and came on to the vicinity of Union Church and remained there over Sunday. Monday night commenced at the log school house in the vicinity of Lorraine on East Plum River, and continued till Thursday night. Here the truth seemed to take some effect; some became quite interested as we had a full house with the best of attention. Friday, being Christmas Eve, we thought best not to continue the meeting any longer for the present. We then went to Brother Simon Ranner's where we spent our Christmas very happily with Simon and family.

Sunday we held meeting in Brother Ranner's school house our usual place on East Plum River. Here we encountered another snow storm and consequently our meeting was not what we usually have, yet we had a good meeting and a good turnout considering the storm, the interest still continuing good. Monday morning we found it intensely cold, the mercury ranging from 30 to 34 degrees below zero. We did not attempt to leave Brother Ranner's till afternoon when we went to Lamark and was received into the hospitality of Brother and Sister Chown, where we remained until the next day. Dec. 28th we took leave of friends in Lamark and started for Broadhead, Wis., at which place we arrived at seven o'clock p. m., and met our friends after an absence of one month. I found the health of wife and daughter both improved. A brother that had his leg taken off in September has greatly improved in health and is using a wooden leg. You would hardly know that he was a lame man any more. Mother and Sister are very much the same as when I wrote before.

We remained here till Thursday, and then in company with wife and daughter went to Sugar River, our old home, to spend the New Year with my sister, a thing that has not occurred before for thirteen years. Found them all well. Yours in hope,

T. J. WHITESITT.

Report of Meetings.

The readers of THE RESTITUTION will remember the notice given by Bro. S. T. Hook, of a series of meetings to commence Dec. 24, 1886, five miles Southeast of Noblesville, on the Noblesville and Greenfield Pike. Upon Bro Hook's being notified to attend Court during part of the time of the intended meeting, he notified the writer of the same, requesting him to come and take charge of the meeting during his absence. We arrived at Noblesville about 10 o'clock a. m. Dec. 24, 1886. Found Bro. Bennett waiting to convey us to his home. Commenced meeting Friday evening, continued preaching to congregations which manifested a great interest in the Truths as we presented them. Bro. Hook arrived Tuesday following. Continued the meetings until Sunday evening, Jan. 2, 1887, at which time we closed, as we could have the house no longer, on account of day school. The meetings were attended principally by heads of families, who manifested a deep interest throughout the entire meeting. There were none obeyed the Gospel, but the good seed has been sown and we trust has fallen on good ground. During our meeting the United Brethren were holding a protracted meeting about 80 rods from our place of meeting. On Monday, Jan. 3, we bade farewell to the brethren and friends, and returned to our homes, promising to return to them in the spring. May God's blessings rest upon all lovers of Truth.

L. E. CONNER.

A man owns wit, and some did count him mad;
The more that this man gave, the more he had.
—Hampton.

"Dives sits in the front pew." In a church in Washington—the national capital—the preacher was turned down because most of the accessions, new members, brought into the church during his first year as pastor, were poor people. The financial steward told me, "Such converts were of no use in running a church." A poor man told me yesterday that his church brethren have driven him out of the church by their utter lack of brotherly kindness. I used to wonder why it was we had so few converts from the Jews, but I have not wondered any on this line for some time. There is more brotherly kindness practiced among the Jews than among Christians—so-called. I will go further. I am persuaded there is more real sympathy and helpfulness in base ball associations than there is in our fashionable churches. A well-to-do base ball fancier called a ball player to him the other day and asked him how he was fixed for the winter. "Old fellow," said he, "if you need a fifty or a hundred, call on me." Who ever heard of a well-to-do church man calling his poor brother to him, and making such an inquiry and proposal? If the command, "Go, sell that thou hast and give it to the poor" was given to our well-to-do church people now, there would be a general stampede from the service of him they have never known. If we have not his Spirit, we are none of his.

ISAAC MCCURRY.

SAN DIEGO, Cal.

Editor Restitution:

Will you please insert in THE RESTITUTION, if there are any brethren or sisters of the One Faith in San Diego city they will call on me on Thirteenth street, between D and G, second house from corner of D. I would love to meet one of like precious faith. By circumstances that I deem to have no control over I am here in San Diego. My son-in-law moved here some three months since. I am alone, (as far as I know) in the One Faith here, but I am standing through grace firm in the faith, but no one to break bread with. I am lifting my heart to God continually that some one may be drawn to come here. The Orthodox churches are filling up with new comers, there is such a large emigration. It has increased eight thousand the past year and still they come. I have been to hear the Orthodox preaching but do not find the Gospel that Christ and the Apostles taught preached; it is the kingdom of God, set up in the heart. I find it first the cross then the crown. It is a cross to live where you cannot meet with the brethren and sisters of like faith. When the gathering time come may I be ready with all the saints to meet my Lord and King.

My surroundings are spiritualists, but I have a calm and abiding peace in Christ, and the promises will not fail. In the world ye shall have tribulation, but in me ye shall have peace. To me the rest of faith in Christ is very precious amidst the conflicts of life, believing all things will work together for good to them that love God, and look for and love his appearing. Yours in the One hope of the Gospel.

BERLIN, January 17.—Emperor William, receiving the President of the Prussian Landtag today, referred to the dissolution of the Reichstag and the rejection of the Army bill. "The rejection of this measure so important for the preservation of peace to Germany," the Emperor said, "has deeply chagrined me. After so many happy days has been vouchsafed to me in old age, especially after completing eighty year of service in the army, the rejection of the bill impressed me deeply and most painfully. It is impossible from a military point of view to regard the three-years term proposed by the majority of the Reichstag as sufficient. I hope the bill will be passed in the near future."

ST. PETERSBURG, January, 15.—It is announced in semi-official circles that Russia, having been solicited by the powers to name a candidate for the Bulgarian throne, designated Prince Nicholas of Mingrelia. Austria stated that any candidate would be acceptable to her, provided he was not a Montenegrin Prince. The reception of the nomination of Prince Nicholas convinced Russia that a preconceived disposition existed to reject it, more because the nomination was advanced by Russia, than from any objection to Prince Nicholas personally. Any other candidate who was patronized by Russia would encounter the same difficulty. Hence, Russia is not disposed to choose another candidate, though Europe might possibly accept him. Russia desires that, before the candidature of Prince Nicholas be decided the Regents and their supporters withdraw their opposition to him, and that he be fairly presented to the Bulgarian people, who shall be allowed to freely decide whether they will accept him or not. Russia will not consider the question of presenting the name of another candidate until the Bulgarians reject Prince Nicholas under the conditions mentioned above.

Nicholas of Mingrelia is a Prince who has never reigned nor been more than an obscure henchman of the Czar. He was born on January 4, 1847, and on April 20, 1874, was married to Marie, daughter of the conspicuous Russia general and Minister, Count Adlerberg. He is a colonel in the Russian army and an aide-de-camp to the Czar. His hereditary title of "Prince" comes from his ancestors having held a chieftainship over some of the wild tribes of the Caucasus. The extinct dynasty which he represents claimed direct descent from King David of Israel. Prince Nicholas is a highly educated, accomplished, courteous gentleman of European type. He was educated abroad, as well as in Russia, and speaks several European languages besides his own. Although he still maintains his ancestral castle at Lugdidi, he resides mostly at St. Petersburg, and is well known in high society at Paris, Vienna and Berlin. His sister, the Princess Salome Dadian, married Prince Achille Murat.

Mingrelia forms a portion of ancient Colchis. It is in Asia, bordering on Circassia and the Black Sea, and is a part of the lieutenancy of the Caucasus, of which the Grand Duke Michael is satrap. It has an area of twenty-six hundred square miles, mostly mountainous, the low lands being fertile but swampy, and infested with the most malignant fevers. There is an iron mine, and it is said that gold has been found there, but the people do little beside raise corn and rice enough for food, and tobacco and bad wine enough to supply their appetites. There are practically no roads or other improvements, and the whole country has a savage and forbidding aspect. The inhabitants number about two hundred and forty thousand, and are of the most debased type of Georgians, being physically, mentally and morally the lowest of the Caucasian tribes. They belong nominally to the Greek Church. Mingrelia was taken in conquest by Russia in 1804, but the "Prince" was allowed to retain his place as chief, under a Russian overseer, until 1867, when he was altogether turned out and consoled therefor with a bounty of seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The Russian candidate for the throne of Bulgaria is a son of Prince David Dadian, the petty ruler thus ignominiously dealt with by the Czar Alexander II.

Remember that by paying for THE RESTITUTION till Dec. 31, 1887 between now and Feb. 1, 1887, you will receive free a Cabinet Photograph of Elder S. A. Chaplin, Editor of THE RESTITUTION, with his Autograph attached.

OBITUARY.

BENNETT.—At Correctionville, Iowa, on Sunday, Dec. 26, 1886, Sister Susie Bennett, aged sixty years.

In the year 1856, she was baptized into the Advent Faith. Some years later at a conference in Busseyville, Wis., on hearing Brother Whitsett preach on the covenants, she was baptized into the One Faith. A few days before her death when told she must die, she replied, "If it is the Lord's will, I am content." She longed for the coming of Christ, the Lifegiver, and her end was peace.

Conference Notice.

The Second Quarterly Conference of the Church of God in Indiana will be held at Rensselaer, Ind., commencing Friday, Feb. 4, 1887, and continue over the following Sunday. Brethren and sisters, this is your appointed meeting—do not wait to be urged to attend and aid in its work, but esteem it as one more privilege of assembling together, and by a united effort push forward the cause of our Master. As Brother R. S. Dwiggins, President of the Conference, is in the South for the winter, I have been requested to urge Brother J. L. Wines, First Vice President, to attend.

A. R. UNDERWOOD, Sec.

The first quarterly Conference of the Church of God of the Abrahamic Faith of the State of Michigan, will be held at the town hall at Byron Center, commencing Friday evening, Jan. 21, 1887. Let all the brethren be on hand at the commencement of the meeting, and let us all come with our hearts full of prayer and charity. Those coming on the Lake Shore R. R. enquire for Brother Moses; those coming on the Grand Rapids road enquire for Philemon Terrell or Edward Smith.

K. N. WOODWARD, Sec.

Please state in THE RESTITUTION, that I am now in South Eastern Kansas, preaching the word, and brethren who may desire my services will please address me at Hepler, Kansas.

A. F. DUNCAN.

Take Notice.

After Jan. 1, 1887, my address will be Rensselaer, Ind.

LOVE ABIDES AND GAINS THE CROWN.

Up to the gates of the kingdom came,
With shining features, a lovely dame;
She spoke no word, but her happy eyes,
Were fair and clear as the summer skies.
And Love and Faith in her face were blent,
With hopes glad colors of sweet content;
Her tasks and trials at last were done,
And she looked in faith to the faithful One.

She'd "suffered long," yet her "kindly" tongue
In tuneful measures had blessed the young;
Had calmed the fever of wild despair,
And lent to sorrow the strength to bear;
Had turned with its answer the wrath of man,
To joy in God, in the gospel plan;
Her tears had been to the weary feet,
As showers to meadow in summer's heat.

She had made the pillows of death more fair,
Strewed flowers in the path of the bridal pair;
Sent woe away with a lighter tread
And smoothed in play the orphan's head.
Made childhood glad by her smiling face,
And cheered the aged with words of grace,
And showed to all to the journey's end,
The kindly heart of a faithful friend.

She'd "envied not," for her thoughtful mind,
Had marked the errors of humankind,
And marvelled before her they seemed to stand
In countless hosts on her either hand;
For God's forgiveness she saw them sue.
And she, unworthy, what more could do?
If God took pity on her, why then,
No arrows of envy were meant for men!

No "puffed up" love had her heart's'er known,
No "vaunted self" had her kind life shown;
No works, but meant for the unwilling eye.
But deeds of love for her Lord on high.
No "rude behavior" had marked her way.
But conduct pure as the light of day;
"Her own unconscious," she had sought to press
The cups of others with happiness.

For love unselfish, itself forgot,
And clouded or sunny, she questioned not,
But sought the homes of the humble poor,
To feed and clothe from her meagre store.
"Provoked not easy," "no evil thing,"
E'er smote her breast with its angry wing.
She ne'er "rejoiced in the deeds of wrong,"
But "joyed in the truth," in her life and song.

She "bore all things" with a patient heart,
From pang of sorrow to Satan's dart;
Had "faith in all" that her Lord had said,
And "hoped for all" from her unseen Head,
For Love ne'er failed, but in darkest hour,
It was to her weakness an arm of power:
Faith, Hope, and Love, they abided there,
Upborne on the wings of unceasing prayer.

Faith! Hope! and Love! with the lovely three,
She was all that a woman on earth could be!
She hoped to pity for sinful souls,
Waked faith in them, and it made them whole.
Her love!, and hate with its wrath she'd frown,
Throw all the weapons of vengeance down!
Dislikes, she conquered, to reach and save
The blind and deaf from a hopeless grave.

And the Porter said, as he saw her there,
"Ah! Love has been in that face of prayer!
She waited for God, through the love of me,
And love abides for eternity!
I bring for her key from the heights above,
The treasure stored in the Bank of Love;
Go in, glad victor, thy hardest down,
For thine, oh thine, is the promised crown!"

THE FIRST CHRISTMAS, AND NOW.

Editor Restitution:

The following article I cut from the Editor's Column Baltimore American, recognized here as the leading Secular Newspaper.

It appeared Christmas week. It might be interesting to the readers of THE RESTITUTION to see the progress of sober common sense, among honest thinkers, relative to Christian faith and practice. I. McCURRY.

It is at this season that the Christian world tells over again the beautiful story of the birth of the Son of Man, its lowliness and its deep human sympathy, its meekness and its glory. It never grows stale. It is always fresh, touching, exquisite. It goes to the heart like a rich old melody, like a poem—because it is so human, so human, although the angel voices, the star, the burst of light, are so wholly out of the range of human experience. And, yet, this supernaturalism links it to lowliness. The light that shone upon those who watched their flocks by night and did not glorify the chroches, the palaces or the temples, but fell upon the humblest of men who tended the sheep at night. It was there to whom the angels brought "glad tidings of great joy," not to the princes, the priests, the rich or the mighty.

The star, too, that led the astrologers from the East, whither did it lead them? To a cow shed, where in the manger lay a weak, new-born babe—descended from the kings of Israel, the line of David, yet born in a place unfit for human habitation. Nothing could be further removed from worldly pride, power or luxury.

And when the babe grew up to man's estate, his teachings and his example were in keeping with his humble birth. He blessed the poor and spoke to them his sweetest words, while to the pride of wealth and power he spoke in terms of keenest rebuke. He made his life among the poorest. He had not where to lay his head. He ate with publicans and sinners. He kept aloof from all pomps and prides, and he held in equal scorn the shows of wealth and luxury and the shows of religion. He scorned formalisms and ceremonials, and demanded simplicity and truth. What wonder, then, that he was despised and rejected of men. What wonder that the rich hated him and called him a pestilent fellow; what wonder that the hypocrites hated him, when he saw through and showed up their hypocrisies; what wonder that the formalists in religion hated him when he told them that they were the children of hell. And, yet, not even by his own followers was he understood. They were during his life constantly asking him questions that showed that they had no conception of his mission. One of them doubted him, another denied him, and a third betrayed him. They went to sleep while the bloody sweat of agony was falling from his forehead. When he was dead they lost heart and hope, and when they got together again to found a church, they founded a thing to which he had given them no model and no instructions. They conceived it as nothing more than a Hebrew sect. It was Paul, who began as a persecutor, that opened the Gospel to the Gentiles; and all the early days of the church were full of dissension, schism, heresy, wars and earthly ambitions. Peter and Paul had a mortal quarrel as to the object of the mission of Jesus.

But the lowliness of the birth and of the life was soon forgotten. Human pride became the great factor in organizing the church. The pride of intellect displaying itself in the metaphysical subtleties of doctrines and dogma; the pride of ecclesiasticism delighting in pomp and ceremonies, mysteries, symbols and ritual; the pride of temporal power, that fed the vanity and ambition of men; the pride of wealth, that built rich churches, with spires that point to heaven, while they are rooted to the earth—fit types of much that sits within. These were all things that Jesus set his face against. He had no metaphysics of doctrine. Nothing can be simpler than the Sermon on the Mount. All the dogmas were made by men after he left the earth. He instituted no order of priesthood, and authorized no ecclesiasticism. On the contrary, he condemned it in the Scribes and Pharisees, and he told them that they were blind guides. He condemned the worldly ambition and power of wealth, and told the rich young man to go and sell all that he had, and give to the poor. He taught by the seaside, in the fields, and by the roads, and sought no haughty church edifice, and where human pride and exclusiveness delight to nestle. No, from his birth in the cow shed, to his death between the two thieves, his teaching and his example were lowliness, simplicity, earnestness, faith, love, peace—the peace of God that passeth all understanding.

But what have men made of his life and his example? Alas, they have contradicted all that he lived and taught. They have made a highly complex church organization, where he made none, and they have filled it with riches for pride, ambition and luxury. Wealth and civic power have had in the past a fearfully large influence in modeling Christianity, as they have now. Fashion, cost, vanity of riches, lust of power—these are potent today. Hypocrisy sits in the front pews. Fashion inspects bonnets during the service, paid singers please the senses, and a haughty sexton keeps the poor out of sight. Alas, alas, how far removed all this is from the Sermon on the Mount! Do the worshipers ever seriously consider what that sermon means? or do they think that it ought to read, "Blessed are the merciless, for they shall obtain money;" "blessed are the rich, for theirs is the kingdom of earth," "blessed are the strife-makers, for they shall be called the leaders of fashion"—and so on?

And was the lowly birth and the lowly life and the degrading death all in vain? Has he who came to teach us humility and spirituality left us the sport of pride and worldliness? Has he who delighted to call himself the Son of Man, who lived among the wretched, the weak, the sinful, who rebuked with scathing scorn the ecclesiasticism of his time, the metaphysical doctrines of his time, the wealth and worldliness of his time, been so misunderstood, perverted and misconstrued that the things that he rebuked are the vital forces of the churches, and the things that he loved—mercy, peace and love—become mere formalities?

Oh, if men would sometimes turn back in thought to the manger of Bethlehem, the mechanic trade, the poverty of Jesus, the life among the lowly, the godlike teachings and the malefactor's death, and see how far removed it is from that which is called Christianity today, it would be worth all the sermons ever uttered; for the Scribes and Pharisees ran the churches, Dives sits in the front pew, good clothes, and not humility, deck the worshipers, the things that he condemned are now sanctified, and the things that he blessed are cursed.

NOW is the time to renew.

HOMES AND HAUNTS OF JESUS.

Miss Von Finkelstein, a Russian Christian, who now usually resides in America, but who spent her childhood in the country districts of Palestine, is in England, giving lectures most valuable from the light they throw on the histories and the teachings of Holy Scripture. The notes which follow are by no means intended to supersede the hearing of her lectures in person; but rather to show how rich a treat awaits those who have an opportunity of doing so, an opportunity which should never be lost. The lecture heard by the writer was on the "Homes and Haunts of Jesus," and was delivered in the costume of an Arab peasant woman. The lecturer was accompanied by her brother in the garb of a shepherd, and by two friends, one of them attired as a shepherdess.

Some of her explanations of the customs referred to in the parables of our Lord, were graphic and useful in the extreme. We will refer to some of them.

Luke xv. 8–10.—"Either what woman, having ten pieces of silver, if she lose one piece, doth not light a candle, and sweep the house, and seek diligently till she find it? And when she hath found it she calleth together her friend and neighbors, saying unto them, Rejoice with me, for I have found my piece which was lost. Likewise, I say unto you, there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth."

Miss Von Finkelstein said that she had heard an infidel lecturer exclaim—"What a fuss to make about one little piece of money" He simply knew nothing of the matter. Every Arab woman (and the peasant-women of the country districts of Palestine are Arabs), receives from her husband on her marriage a necklace of ten pieces of silver, one large piece in the centre, five smaller pieces (the tenth part of the larger coin) on each side. This is to her as her wedding ring. If she is going out, her first care is to examine this necklace, because if even one piece were wanting she would be the object of the scorn of all her female acquaintances, as well as of her husband's anger. One day she finds that one piece is gone. She knows she cannot have lost it out of doors, for her step is too stately, her walk too quiet for this; it must have been indoors in one of her numerous domestic occupations, such as kneading bread, etc. What then does she do? She lights her little lamp, and takes her small hand-broom (not a long house-broom such as that represented by Millais), and searching in every nook and corner is pretty certain to find it. All her female neighbors have known of her loss—for the huts of the village are built so close together that she had only to go to her own door-way to be heard by all. Most certainly on her joyful discovery she goes to her door again and sings out—"Rejoice with me! I have found my lost piece!" All her friends rush in, and sitting down at her side, unite in the song—"Joy! joy! thank God you have found your piece of silver;" and the day is for them all a festival of gladness. Likewise, there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth."

Again:—Matthew vi. 30—"If God so clothe the grass of the field, which today is, and tomorrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?" There is a certain plant in Palestine, the Arab name of which means, "grass of the field." The women go out early in the morning and gather it, pulling it up by the roots. It grows so luxuriantly that what they take is not missed. The flowers on the plant are abundant and beautiful. It is oleaginous and burns well; and the women place it in an opening in their small ovens, and when it is consumed they know their bread is baked. Thus, as the Savior said, it is a plant which lives but for a day, and is yet so richly attired as to reprove the "little faith" of those who say with troubled care, "Wherewithal shall we be clothed?"

Once more. An infidel lecturer objected to our Lord's direction when sending forth the seventy, "Salute no man by the way," as uncourteous and churlish. He would have spoken more wisely had he known that the salutation forbidden occupied at least half an hour. On perceiving a figure advancing in the distance, the traveller, placing his hand to his mouth to assist the passage of sound, asks the name of one advancing towards him. That being given, if the parties have knowledge of each other, they run forward to embrace as did the father to the prodigal in the parable. Inquire mutually after the health and welfare of each other's friends and acquaintance to the farthest degree, and likewise after the flocks and herds: then, sitting down together they join in a song of welcome and rejoicing. Hence forbade these lengthy greetings, which were always dispensed with by the bearers of important messages. So that, when a man was seen going swiftly on, saluting none, it was known that he was a herald bearing tidings. Therefore, that such was the character of the progress of the first preachers of the kingdom of God, bespoke attention for their glorious message.

Human telephones are employed in that land on occasion of haste and emergency. To a "watcher on the mountains," the news is first delivered. He, bending down towards the earth to assist the transmission of his voice, delivers the tidings to a brother on another height. And so on and on, the messenger running swiftly when another is not within ear-shot. The reply is similarly passed back, until the required district has been twice traversed. The brother of the lecturer stated that he had sent a message from Dan to Beersheba and had received the reply in about half a day; the time thus not much exceeding that occupied by communications through the electric wires.

It is of course, well-known that the Eastern sheep are not driven, but follow their shepherd. One of the most interesting passages of Miss Von Finkelstein's lecture was that relating to this subject:—"He goeth before them, and the sheep follow him, for they know his voice," John x. 4. She related how she and her brother, whose early days were passed amid these scenes, and who were always running among them, would sometimes borrow the shepherd's garb, and see if they could take the shepherd's place; it would not do, for the sheep know not their voice. The whole flock stands together listening, usually with a ram in front, in whom all the sheep place confidence. If they find the man seeking to direct is not their shepherd, they will not follow him; but if the ram seems satisfied they will not disperse. If, however, the ram shows uneasiness, which he may do by hunting out direct attack, the whole flock scatters. Up hill and down dale rush the sheep, and the true shepherd has long and hard work to go after his sheep that are scattered and to lead them back to the fold. Each sheep has its own name, some individual appellation of affection and endearment, such a Judy, Diamond, Pearl; and each knows that name, and answers to it, when uttered in the shepherd's voice, and not in the unfamiliar tones of the "stranger." It will thus be seen that the hearers of Miss Finkelstein's lectures have not only a rich intellectual feast, but receive information calculated to be most useful, especially to those who come in contact with the too frequent doubt and gainsaying, born of ignorance. She is tall, and has the graceful and easy carriage of the children of nature she describes; while her voice is clear, and her style the simple and attractive utterance of the cultured lady.—*E. S. SPOKANE FALLS, Wash. Ter.

Editor Restitution:

We have now passed another Christmas day. Before another is passed many changes will be witnessed. Very many who are buoyant in the pleasures and festivities of yesterday will not live to see and enjoy the Christmas of 1887. Some who are now full of hope of living many years will be among the many thousands who will enter into the dreamless sleep of death. With all the uncertainty of life how few comparatively speaking are making preparation for the world to come?

The great mass of men and women are rushing along in pursuit of the wealth and honors of this world, and who do not care to ever hear anything said about the second coming of the Lord, and the establishment of his kingdom upon the earth, and the resurrection of the righteous to immortality and eternal life. A substitute for all these things is now generally accepted, viz: That man by nature has an immortal soul which cannot die, but at death goes—the righteous into heaven—where God, and Christ, and angels with all the immortal souls which have gone before, there to be in bliss perhaps for thousands of years yet before the resurrection will take place,—the others—the wicked, to be sent at death into a lake of fire and brimstone—there to be in torture until the resurrection, when both classes of souls are to be brought back to earth and reunited with their resurrected bodies, are to appear for judgment and the final award.

If the two classes are thus divided and sent to heaven and hell, it is hard to see how it is accomplished without a judgment being had at death. If it be admitted that a judgment does take place at death, why the necessity of bringing them out after some have been in these places so long, to judge them again?

Will it be claimed that mistakes may occur at the first, and a second judgment or review is necessary to make these things certain for an endless eternity?

Accepting the doctrine of the natural, or inherent immortality of the soul necessitates a place for the souls to go at the death of the body, and believing the righteous souls go at once to heaven, or to a place of enjoyment does away with the necessity of the coming of Christ or a resurrection, for if they are already happy, why interrupt them?

God's plan will be carried into effect no matter who, or how many may oppose him. His word declares that Christ the Son of God will come again and that he will give life to the righteous, giving them then, at the time of their emergence immortality, and that they will reign with him a thousand years on the earth.

That, the reigning will be after their resurrection. That in death there is no remembrance of God, that the thoughts are perished, having no love, envy, hatred or memory; and that "the dead know not anything."

It is only in life that man has intelligence. In the great prophetic chart the picture for the inhabitants of earth, in the last days of the present dispensation is indeed a gloomy one. "Evil men and seducers, waxing worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." Then among professors of Christianity we find the apostle Paul giving the general characteristics of the last days, 2 Timothy iii 1-5 All nations are preparing for war. All the world is on tiptoe of expectation and in trouble, in looking for those things which are coming upon the earth.

What those great events are the philosophers and men of the world cannot divine The close students of prophecy can read in these great movements that the coming of the Lord draweth near. A time of trouble for many is already upon the world.

What we do, must be done speedily. Brethren and Sisters, let us be on the alert—discharging the duties incumbent upon us, lest we be found unprepared, overcharged with the cares of this life.

Very many who a few years ago were zealous in the cause of Christianity and were in real earnest, have from various causes "neglected the assembling of themselves together." In some localities where once there were active churches exerting a good influence upon the communities where located, now there are no meetings held. Some have died, others have removed to other localities and those remaining have ceased to let their lights shine, by which their neighbors could be benefited. Such things are sad to contemplate.

How can intelligent brethren and sisters afford to live thus? The great prize is before us, and we must fight the good fight of faith if we desire to come out victorious and be approved when the Lord comes to make up his jewels.

Let us all rally around the Standard of the Captain of our Salvation, for the warfare with some of us will soon be over; and by our course in this world we fix our destiny in the world to come.

Will you not double our diligence as we see the signs thickening daily around us, and by our good words and works, try to influence our dying fellow beings to go with us and secure an inheritance in the kingdom of God?

Since coming to this city I have preached some as I have had opportunity, but thus far with apparently very little success. I will however do the best I can as I may find opportunities to speak.

Bro. Chaplin accept of our Christmas greeting We are glad to know you are still able to hold the responsible position as Editor of THE RESTITUTION, a position which you have so long and satisfactorily filled. The question is who will take your place when you must leave it?

Some one will doubtless come to the task. In hope.

RICHARD CORNALBY.

Editor Restitution:

Having returned home from a trip to the central part of Ohio, thought I would write a few lines for THE RESTITUTION. On the last of Nov., I received a call from Bro. S. Steele and Bro E M Shoneman, of Pharisburgh, Union Co, Ohio, stating that they were in a starving condition for the hearing of the Word, and wanted me to come, although they were poor but thought they could raise five or six dollars towards paying my expenses. Nothing doubting, I started although I was aware that my expenses to go there and return would be about $8.00. There had been a Tent Meeting near there, and at Richwood and Marysville, about 8 miles to each place, held by a Bro. Dunbar, of the A. D. Church. Quite a number were converted under his labors, and an organization was entered into at each place, drawing away some of the prominent and able brethren from them, and leaving a few without any preaching of the One Faith. Therefore the condition stated above. When I got to the place found that the Christian Preacher had been holding a protracted meeting and went home sick, but arranged with the M. E. Minister to carry on the meeting. As I had a desire to see my old friend and brother in the Faith, G. W. Cherry, that I had not seen in 30 years, Bro. Shoneman took me to Marysville. After dinner, as Bro. Watson of Richwood had brought me to Bro. S's., not even letting anybody know that I was in the place, for fear that their meeting would be protracted on till it would run out for the want of hearers. The third day after Bro. S. came after me stating the meeting was closed, and he had given out an appointment for me, for the following evening. Nobody knew who I was and where from, yet I had a good congregation, the next Sunday some came 10 miles, the good Lord helped to present his Word in all its parts. Staid there three weeks. The second Sunday, the old elder that had carried on the protracted meeting came on to fill his regular appointment, and took a good deal of pains to bring up every passage that he could think of to upset our preaching, such as Paul's "house" "desire" "out of the body" "inner man," etc. "rich man," "thief," etc. Well we took them all up, and cleared the track for positive evidence. The people appeared to be well satisfied, and quite a number manifested by the tears and grip of the hand that they were almost persuaded to become Christians, and the few Brethren and Sisters think that I must come back again, and preach for them. The Lord's will be done is my prayer. Glad that our dear Bro. Chaplin has taken the helm of our beloved paper. Hope the Lord will prosper him in his old age, and the paper be still the medium of truth in all its parts to the waiting ones.

Yours for the Truth
JOHN T. ONGLEY.

P. S. I have only been able to get four three month subscribers this trip and collected some for THE RESTITUTION. Yet a number have said they will take it just as soon as they possibly can. Enclosed the names and money collected. J. T. O.

Editor Restitution:

As I take delight in reading the letters in THE RESTITUTION from brethren of like faith, I thought perhaps some might be interested in hearing from us on the Pacific Coast. Most of the brethren with whom we are acquainted know that we live in Middle Wallowa Valley. We have a small church here of some sixteen members. Our numbers having fallen off some in the last year on account of "no here; and lo there," still there are some who are holding on by faith. At Prairie Creek we have quite a church, although some have fallen away there. We just closed a ten days meeting there, and find most of them are firm in the faith and love the blessed truth. One was immersed into the All-saving name. I rejoice that a deep conviction seems to have settled down on all classes that Jesus is soon coming. I have reached in this valley five years, and outsiders have never been more attentive than now, especially in the upper and lower valleys, but sometimes I am almost discouraged on account of the efforts of seemingly designing men to disquiet the ones who would walk in simplicity and truth.

Dear ones; who wait for Christ, we need something besides formality. Head religion is good in connection with that faith that works by love and purifies the heart, but if we do not have the latter I think we had better not have the former. Should any of the preaching brethren pass by, and wish to call and help us, we will give you a hearty welcome. But we have no need of any one who preachers that it is better to work more on Sunday than all the other six days of the week, or that prayer is a sin, or that Jesus was not the Son of God, or that in the next age it will be more convenient to repent then now, and that it is God's intention to save all in the age to come. Or that the wicked will not be resurrected, or that there is no devil, or that the church has gone into the wilderness, therefore there is no visible church, no organization, no deacons, no authorized ministry, no class-book.

Yes, terrible sin to have name on church-book with those who expect to live together in the kingdom of God, and yet some of these careful brethren would not fear to join some worldly institution.

Now brethren, [illegible] faithful minister [illegible] preaching the Gospel of the kingdom finally wears out prejudice and himself to raise up thirty or forty members all rejoicing in the hope, and here they come with all the above bubbles. What must become of so many young converts? We know that one can tare down faster than many can build up. Truly we are living in the perils of the last days, and have need of prayer, that we may escape the things that are coming on the earth and be able to stand before the Son of Man.

Yours in hope of eternal life.
GEORGE PICKETT.

Editor of the Restitution.

Many of our friends who have seen Elder S. A. Chaplin, and are personally acquainted with him, besides many who have become acquainted with him through THE RESTITUTION, have expressed a desire to have his Photograph. It will be evident to every one that Brother Chaplin could not possibly give his Photograph to all these friends, on account of the great expense.

To satisfy this desire of our friends we have made arrangements with W. Tuttle of Plymouth, Ind., to make us a quantity of handsome Cabinet Photographs of Elder Chaplin, and we make the following offer:—

FREE!

To each of our Subscribers who pays his subscription in advance, to Dec. 31, 1887, before Feb. 1, 1887, we will send by mail a Cabinet size Photograph of Elder S. A. Chaplin, Editor of THE RESTITUTION.

This is the last Chance to get this Present Free, as the offer will end February 1, 1887.

Brother Chaplin has kindly agreed to write his Autograph on each one of the pictures given away by this offer, hence those securing a photograph will also have his

AUTOGRAPH.

These pictures may also be had for 25cts each at this office.

EXPLANATION OF LABEL MARKS.

Some having complained that they do not know what the marks on labels mean, we will just say, "Jny" means January, and when it is followed by a figure "6" and reads "Jny6" it means your subscription expired the first day of January, 1886. "Feb" February, "Mar" March, "Apr" April, and "May" are well understood, but "Jun" meaning June seems to confuse some, and to be taken to mean Jan uary. "Jun" means June. "Jul" is July, "Aug" August, "Sep" September, "Oct" October, "Nov" November, and "Dec" December. The figure following the month stands for the year, "1" means 1881, "2" means 1882, etc. A postal card of inquiry will bring you any information you wish.

Will you help us by getting one or two Trial Subscribers?

WHAT SHALL I BE!

What shall I be, Lord, when I behold thee
In awful majesty at God's right hand,
And 'mid the eternal glories that enfold me,
In strange bewilderment, O Lord, I stand?
What shall I be? these tears may dim my sight,
I cannot catch the blissful vision quite.

What shall I be, Lord, when thy radiant glory
As from the grave I rise, encircles me?
When brightly pictured in the light before me,
What eye hath never seen, my eyes shall see.
What shall I be? Ah, blessed and sublime
Is the dim prospect of that glorious time!

Yes; faith can never know the full salvation,
Which Jesus for his people will prepare;
Then will I wait in peaceful expectation,
Till the good Shepherd comes to take me there.
My Lord, my God, a blissful end I see,
Though now I know not what I yet shall be:

THE RESULT OF EPHRAIM'S SIN.

Ephraim he hath mixed himself among the people. Ephraim is a cake not turned. Ephraim also is like a silly dove without heart.....Woe to the crown of pride, to the drunkards of Ephraim, whose glorious beauty is a fading flower which is on the head of the fat valleys of them that are overcome with wine. Behold the Lord hath a mighty and strong one which as a tempest of hail and a destroying storm, as a flood of mighty waters overflowing shall cast down to the earth with the hand the crown of pride, the drunkards of Ephraim shall be trodden with feet." "And as it was in the days of Noe so shall it be also in the days of the Son of man....and the flood came and destroyed them all." "As for Ephraim their glory shall fly away like a bird from the birth and from the womb and from the conception. My God will cast them away because they did not hearken unto him and they shall be wanderers among the nations."...."And did not he make one, yet had he the residue of the Spirit. And wherefore one? That he might seek a seed of God; therefore take heed to your spirit."...."So shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth, it shall not return unto me void but shall accomplish that which I please and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it."...."And ye have made void the word of God because of your tradition. Well did Isaiah prophesy of you, saying, This people honoreth me with their lips, but their heart is far from me; but in vain do they worship me, teaching as their doctrines the precepts of men." "Blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it."

As our readers well know the seventh chapter of Isaiah has been a controversial theme to the church of God in this hour of trial while in the time of the end. I must believe that Matthew's and Luke's record of the conception and birth of Jesus of Nazareth whose name signifies "Savior," is true, because many prophecies in God's word would be made void if it was not true; see particularly Isa. xliv., read and ponder, and you will see that it relates to none other than Jesus.

Let us follow Paul's teaching to the Corinthians before we take up this chapter in Isaiah. Howbeit we speak wisdom among the full grown, yet a wisdom not of this age nor of the rulers of this age which are coming to naught. (The wisdom of the rulers of that age, mark it well, was, Is not this the carpenter's son? do we not know his father, his mother and his brothers? He is the son of Joseph.) But we speak God's wisdom in a mystery, even the wisdom that hath been hidden, which God foreordained before the ages unto our glory which none of the rulers of this age knoweth, for had they known it they would not have crucified the Lord of glory, but as it is written, "Things which ye saw not and ear heard not, and which entered not into the heart of man, whatsoever things God prepared for them that love him." But unto us God revealed it through the Spirit, for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea the deep things of God. For who among men knoweth the things of a man save the spirit of the man which is in him, even so the things of God none knoweth except the Spirit of God.

But we received not the spirit of the world but the Spirit which is of God, that we might know the things that are freely given to us by God; which things also we speak not in words which man's wisdom teacheth but which the Spirit combining (margin R. V.) interpreting spiritual things with spiritual. Now the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him and he cannot know them, because they are spiritually examined. But he that is spiritual examineth all things, and he himself is examined of no man. [illegible] covered with inscriptions. Before [illegible]

Paul here shows us that the Spirit combines the literal words of the prophets and Scriptures and interprets spiritual things with spiritual, which when spiritually examined disclose the deep things of God. And while "all things that the prophets have spoken must needs come to pass," and not one jot or title shall fail to come to pass, there is often a deeper meaning hidden in these words, which when rightly interpreted and examined, reveals the deep things of God, which is somewhat explained and shown in the epistles of the apostles.

Paul says "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfected, thoroughly furnished unto all good works." See 2 Tim. iii. 16; 1 Cor. x.; Rom xv. 4. "For whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope." See also Rom. iv. 23, 24; 1 Cor. ix. 10. These epistles plainly show that there are innumerable types in the Scriptures, and which we are to study "to show ourselves approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of God."...."Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth steady having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his, and let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity." 2 Tim. ii. 15, 19. We will, in examining a portion of this seventh chapter of Isaiah, follow Matthew in his method of interpreting the Holy Scriptures, and spiritually examine the deep things of God contained therein.

Matthew in recording the conception and birth of our Lord Jesus Christ, says, "Thou shalt call his name Jesus for it is he that shall save his people from their sins. Now all this is come to pass that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the Lord through the prophet, saying, Behold the virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Immanuel, which is, being interpreted, God with us." Now I wish you to particularly notice this Scripture quotation, the "name Immanuel, which is, being interpreted, God with us." Here is one of the deep things of God shown to us in interpreting spiritual things with spiritual. The same is true with the name Jesus, which is, being interpreted, "Savior," for he shall save his people from their sins. Do you not readily see the significance in the meaning of the name given. The Lord's command to Hosea to take a wife of whoredoms, who bare him a son, and then the Lord said, call his name Jezreel: "seed of God, the brightness of the Lord;" and she bare a daughter, and God said call her name Lorahamah, which is, being interpreted, "not having obtained mercy." Again she bare a son; God said, "Call his name Loammi," which is, being interpreted, "not my people." Here names were given, which, when interpreted, disclosed the deep things of God.

Let us now turn to the first verse of Isa. vii., and examine the names which God has given there, by following Matthew's revealed mode of interpretation. "And it came to pass in the days of Ahaz, the son of Jotham, the son of Uzziah, king of Judah, that Rezin, the king of Syria, and Pekah, the son of Remaliah, king of Israel, went up toward Jerusalem to war against it but could not prevail against it. And it was told the house of David, saying, Syria is confederate with Ephraim (margin, resteth on Ephraim.) And his heart was moved, and the heart of his people as the trees of the wood are moved with the wind." Ahaz, which is, being interpreted, "that takes and possesses." Jotham, which is, "the perfection of the Lord." Uzziah, which is, interpreted, "the strength of the Lord." Judah, which is, interpreted, "the praise of the Lord." Rezin, which is, interpreted, "voluntary good will." Syria, which is, interpreted, "sublime that deceives." Pekah, which is, interpreted, "he that opens or is at liberty." Remaliah, which is, being interpreted, "who prevails with God." Jerusalem, which is, interpreted, "vision of peace." The house of "David," which is, "well beloved." Syria, "sublime that deceives," resteth on "Ephraim," "that brings fruit."

Third verse, "Then said the Lord unto Isaiah, Go forth now to meet Ahaz, thou and Shearjashub thy son, at the end of the conduit of the upper pool, in the causeway of the fuller's field, and say unto him, Take heed and be quiet, fear not, let not thy heart be tender (margin, for the two tails of these smoking firebrands, for the fierce anger of Rezin with Syria and of the son of Remaliah. Because Syria, [illegible] of Remaliah [illegible] saying, Let us go up against Judah and weaken it and let us make a breach therein for us and set a king in the midst of it, even the son of Tabeal. Thus saith the Lord God, it shall not stand, neither shall it come to pass. For the head of Syria is Damascus and the head of Damascus is Rezin, and within threescore and five years shall Ephraim be broken from a people. And the head of Ephraim is Samaria, and the head of Samaria is Remaliah's son. Do ye not believe? it is because ye are not stable." "And the Lord added to speak unto Ahaz, saying, Ask thee a sign of the Lord thy God, make thy petition deep, or in the height above. But Ahaz said, I will not ask, neither will I tempt the Lord." "And he said, Hear ye now, O house of David, is it a small thing for you to weary men, but will you weary my God also. Therefore the Lord himself will give you a sign. Behold a virgin shall conceive and bare a son, and thou, O virgin, shalt call his name Immanuel. Butter and honey shall he eat that he may know to refuse the evil and choose the good. For before the child shall know to refuse the evil and choose the good the land that thou abhorest shall be forsaken of both her kings."

"Isaiah," which is, being interpreted, "the salvation of the Lord." "Shearjashub thy son," which is, "The remnant shall return." The son of "Tabeal," which is, being interpreted, "good God." "Damascus," which is, being interpreted, "a sack full of blood." "Samaria," which is, "his throne, his lees, his diamond, his prison." "Immanuel," which is, being interpreted, "God with us."

Here are the names given us in connection with this sign to the house of David with the hidden wisdom, and the deep things of God lie in the interpretation of these names, and with their works are disclosed their fruit. "By their fruits ye shall know them. Can men gather grapes of thorns or figs of thistles." "Now all these things happened unto them by way of figure and they were written for our admonition upon whom the ends of the ages are come. Wherefore let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall. Wherefore, my beloved, flee from idolatry. I speak as to wise men, judge ye what I say." 1 Cor. x. 1-4 inclusive. "In those things they became figures of us (see margin, 6 v.) There hath no temptation taken you but such as man can bear. But God is faithful who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able, but will, with the temptation, make also the way of escape, that ye may be able to endure it." v. 13.

Let us endeavor to trace out this work and fruit of the confederation of Ephraim and Syria, and Remaliah's son. For the Lord spake thus to me in strength of hand and instructed me that I should not walk in the way of this people, saying, Say not a confederacy to all whom this people shall say a confederacy, neither fear ye their fear nor be afraid. Sanctify (set apart) the Lord of hosts himself and let him be your fear and let him be your dread, and he shall be for a sanctuary, but for a stone of stumbling and for a rock of offence to both houses of Israel for a gin and for a snare to the inhabitants of Jerusalem. And many among them shall stumble and fall and be broken and be snared, and be taken. Bind up the testimony, seal the law among my disciples, and I will wait upon the Lord that hideth his face from the house of Jacob and I will look for him. Behold I and the children which the Lord hath given me are for signs and for wonders in Israel from the Lord of hosts which dwelleth in Mt. Zion. To the law and to the testimony, if they speak not according to this word it is because there is no morning in them. For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulder and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace."

The Lord sent a word into Jacob and it hath lighted upon Israel, and all the people shall know Ephraim and the inhabitant of Samaria that say in the pride and stoutness of heart, The bricks are fallen down but we will build with hewn stone, the sycamores are cut down but we will change them into cedars. Therefore the Lord shall set up the adversaries of Rezin against him and mingle his enemies together. The Syrians before and the Philistines (which is those that dwell in villages) behind and they shall devour Israel with whole mouth. For all this his anger is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still. For the people turneth not unto him that smiteth them, neither do they seek the Lord of hosts.

It came to pass in the days of him that takes and possesses the perfection [illegible] of Remaliah [illegible] resembles the nominal church who are king of the praise of the Lord, in those days it was that voluntary good will, the king of sublime deceit, that he that opens or is at liberty, the son of the exaltation of the Lord, who was the king who prevails with God, went up toward "the vision of peace," to war against it. (This vision of peace which was witnessed in Judea's plains by the night watchers, the shepherds of the sheep, when the angel said, "Be not afraid, for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be to all the people, for there is born this day in the city of David, a Savior which is Christ the Lord, and this is the sign unto you, ye shall find a babe wrapped in swaddling clothes and lying in a manger. And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host praising God and saying, Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace among men, in whom he is well pleased.)"

These went up to make war against this vision of peace, but could not prevail against it. And it was told the house of the "well beloved" that "sublime that deceives" was confederate with Ephraim "that brings fruit" and his (the house of the well beloved) heart was moved and the heart of his people as the trees of the wood are moved with the wind. (Ephraim feedeth on wind and followeth after the east wind.) Then said the Lord unto "the salvation of the Lord." "Shearjashub thy son," which is, "The remnant shall return." The son of "Tabeal," which is, being interpreted, "good God." "Damascus," which is, being interpreted, "a sack full of blood." "Samaria," which is, "his throne, his lees, his diamond, his prison." "Immanuel," which is, being interpreted, "God with us."

It came to pass in the days of him that takes and possesses the perfection [illegible] of Remaliah [illegible] resembles the nominal church who are afraid to investigate, to know for themselves the truth of a thing. Another member said to me as we met for a moment, "I hear some in your church deny that Jesus is the Son of God." I answered, "In one sense so he is and in another they don't. They claim that he was Joseph's son but became the Son of God at his resurrection." "Oh," was the answer, "I did not understand it so before." Evidently so that he was acknowledged the Son of God in any sense it would pass muster.

But unlike it is not so with the 144,000 of the first resurrection, those upon whom the second death hath no power, "having his name and the name of his Father written on their foreheads" for they are virgins. These are they which follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth. "I am the Way, the Truth and the Life." These were purchased from among men to be the firstfruits unto God and unto the Lamb. And in their mouth was found no lie, they are without blemish; their doctrine was pure, they had found the perfect law of the Lord. They were sanctified in truth, and the truth shall make you free. They worshipped God in spirit and in truth, they pressed on toward the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

Ahaz would not ask, so the Lord said, Hear ye now, O house of "well beloved," the Lord himself will give you a sign. Behold a virgin shall conceive and bear a son and thou, O virgin, shalt call his name Immanuel. Remember they of the first resurrection are virgins, and they call him Immanuel and know him to be "God with us," through searching the Holy Word which testifies of him.

Now we understand who Matthew means when he says they shall call his name Immanuel which is, being interpreted, "God with us." His virgin mother called him this when she pondered over all the things in her heart. Luke ii. 19, and the wise virgins knew this to be true through the Spirit of truth which searcheth all things, yea the deep things of God.

"But Ephraim is an unwise son, for he should not stay a time in the place of the breaking forth of children." Ephraim provoked him to anger with bitterness therefore shall he leave his bloods upon him and his reproach shall his Lord return unto him. As for Ephraim their glory shall fly away like a bird (like a silly dove) from the birth and from the womb and from the conception. Though they bring up their children yet will I bereave them, yea woe also to them when I depart from them. My God will cast them away because they did not hearken unto him and they shall be wanderers among the nations. Hosea.

READINESS TO MEET CHRIST AT HIS COMING.

We shall soon see events taking place such as the world never saw before, events the most startling, the most wonderful, and fraught with the deepest interest. He who is now our Advocate will leave the throne of the Father, and descend into the clouds, and by the word of his mouth will awake the holy dead, and change the holy living, and call them up to himself. No language, no human imagination can picture that scene. Many will be found in that blessed multitude who are now thought little of, who are perhaps even despised: many others will be found missing, who now make a great show, and noise, and command much attention. Oh, what will be the thoughts of those in that hour who find their companions taken up, and themselves left behind? In some cases, the husband taken and the wife left, or the wife taken and the husband left. In other cases, the brother taken from his sister, or the sister from her brother; father and mother from son and daughter, or son and daughter from father and mother. In other cases, separations among ministers, office-bearers, and church members. What consternation, what bewilderment, what sadness will be experienced by those who are not caught up, but are left behind because they are not quite ready, not entirely sanctified, their house not quite in order, have not quite oil enough to keep their lamps burning. How they will lament their not being ready to be recognised as part of the body of Christ, or the bride of Christ. What sadness will have to fear the dreadful persecutions which will soon follow the rapture, under the power of the man of sin, who, saying that which now hinders his development taken out of the way, will soon manifest himself in terrible opposition to God and goodness among those who are left upon the earth. Oh, how earnest we should be in seeking a preparation, a readiness to meet Jesus.

No question can exceed in importance and interest the question of readiness. This consists in something more than an acceptance and an understanding of the doctrine. Some may accept the doctrine, may have a pretty correct understanding of it, and yet not be prepared for the Lord's coming. We should naturally look for those who believe this truth, to seek the highest degree of holiness, that there may be nothing lacking in their preparation. Yet as a matter of fact, while this may be the aim of some, we fear that many place too much confidence in the belief of the truth, and too little in walking in the truth. This doctrine of the Lord's speedy coming again is everything; eternal consequences are involved in it, consequences to me and to you of untold greatness, as we are ready or not ready. We should allow nothing to come between us and this truth. All its blessed light and influence should come directly upon us. It should shape our inward and our outward man. Never should we pass a day nor an hour without being ready for the personal presence of the Christ.

Half-hearted Christians, doubting and unwatchful believers, cannot have the privilege of translation, if alive at the descent of the Lord, or the honor of a resurrection from among the dead, if asleep in their graves. He cannot thus reward the slothful, the indifferent, and the worldly-minded. It is only those who are increasing in faith and love, and abounding in works of righteousness, and whose hearts are fixed on Jesus, being dead to the world, who will be thus favored. This consideration is of untold importance to us, seeing that we are living so near the close of the dispensation, and may soon may open up to our vision the most stupendous wonders. Almost every where things both in the church and in the world are moving in the direction of the ultimate and foretold by the prophets.

It behooves us to cherish a spirit of indifference to the world's riches, and honors, and pleasures. What are these things to us if we are soon to leave them? The short time we remain we may make the best use of as much money as we can wisely and honestly obtain; but as to the world's honors and pleasures, we need neither.

We need more and more to become Bible students,—students of the prophetic word, that we may understand as fully as we can the events which must soon take place. A knowledge of these things will help us to prepare for them. And with the Book in our hands, and the promise of the Spirit to guide us, and in the possession of various human aids, will ignorance be excusable? Most certainly it will not. If we may find the truth by seeking it, but will not seek it, we shall be held responsible for not finding it.

Then there should be no blind attachment to preconceive opinions,—opinions which we may have imbibed from our parents or teachers, or taken up readily without due examination. We should keep our minds open to receive any new view of truth which harmonizes more with the general tenor of Scripture teaching.

An impartial examination of ourselves is needed; a comparison of our belief with the teaching of the word, a comparison of our dispositions and affections with those of Christ, a comparison of our daily walk with the precepts and requirements of Christianity. In this matter we cannot be too honest and too faithful, for no profession, or appearance of piety, or even the manifestation of zeal in public work for Christ, will be allowed to take the place of a loving spirit and an obedient life. We must endeavor to be found in the Philadelphian Church.

Nor it is less needful for our will to repose in the will of God, for the human to stay itself on the Divine. Just as the mind seeks to repose in the truth, so the spirit must seek to repose only in him who is himself the truth, and the way, and the life.

There are so many mysteries in the providence of God, so many things which we cannot understand, to mar our happiness, that it is only a strong faith in God our Father that holds us up. While it is the nature of unbelief to create rest and quietness. With confidence in the Divine government and the Divine providence, we shall be happy,—happy in mind, inwardly at peace, even though some things may cause a ripple on the surface.

Many Christians become too anxious about their future lot in this life. To avoid this is impossible unless they give past, present, and future into his hands, and thus cast every care upon him. None but God can make out the best programme, can mark out the wisest plan for the days that shall come. None but God can lead you in an unerring way. Then sink down confidently and lovingly into his holy will. And let all your concerns pass into his hands. Faith in his almighty power, his infinite wisdom, and his everlasting love, will give you ease and quietness of mind, and enable you to wait in momentary readiness for the thief-like coming of the Son of Man.

SILAS HENN.

We have been reading anew, this morning, the delightful verses of the poet Moore, in which the dove set free, darts into the upper ether, and pines her pinions, seeking home. Look at the longing of love, look at its fixedness and persistedness! And the poet, by the picture of the bird, heedless of all entisement or diversion, holding on its home-bound course, to find the old paradise, and the waiting feathered kindred there, teaches the sweetness and nobleness of seeking God, the inexpressible eagerness of the heart aiming its way upward, coward to the blessed light, the precious infinite God! Shine upon us, O Lord, and draw us with a divine attraction. O, do wonderfully for us, seeing "the few lurid mornings that dawn on us here," are flitting on with unpausing swiftness. How sweet is the call of Jesus to them that "labor and are heavy laden," to come to him, and how sweet it is to heed and answer that solicitation! And how blessed is the faith that accepts the promise of rest and believes the heartiness of welcome! We come and we know we are accepted, and that is the end of it; nay, it is but the beginning.

Much of the painfulness of life is due to reluctant coming. And the reluctance may be twofold, first, because of some alluring object that draws away the heart, even ever so little, from the Blessed, and second, that unbelieving spirit which is picturing and beholding unwillingness of Christ to receive us. Here are two snares, why not see the first and magnify and choose him? Put him to the front, and give him our choice and preference? And why not learn to come to him for all medicine, for all right direction, always? What he wants is the heart without reserve that he may take and temper and tutor and transform it. The great mischief of the erring mind is some reserve, through suspicion or fear of not being really welcome. Some conscious weakness, selfishness, reproach of conscience, or imperfection rises up and restrains us. How much we miss by this error of reserve! Let us come over and over, and learn the pleasure and profit of it. What a gladness to understand that our Lord means what he says, and that we are certainly recognised and heartily welcomed! How fears take wing then! How sorrows evanesce! How unrest vanishes and flies away! When we think of it, when we narrowly observe, there is a curious and adverse crookedness that is playing havoc with peace and progress—it is unbelief. Whereas we may have this taint, this perverseness healed, Christ touches it, and it shrinks and shrivels, as we are right glad to know. And when the faith of his always welcoming us, gets possession of us, welcoming us for the very purpose of taking our case into his hands, and healing our moral maladies, there is a new pleasure in living. A star shines overhead, a rose blooms where we felt the prick of thorns, praise springs up where was the dull oppression of doubt. Life is not to hopeless or motiveless henceforth.

This faith, this conviction is to be cherished. Give not an inch of room to doubt again. We have got a home of the mind, a refuge, a place to recover strength, evermore. Here I come to get a right beginning of the day, to get a spark of sacred fire, to get wisdom, to get composure, to get the invisible working power of him who is above all.

I have just seen something worth quoting, from Rev. A. J. Gordon's sermon on "Last Day Delusions," at the Chicago Prophetic Conference. Besides spiritualism, ritualism and theosophy, he mentions what he styles the "cooking-stove apostacy," which he says is turning so many of our church basements into places of feasting, and the entertainment heresy which sets up all sorts of shows and exhibitions for amusing the unchurched masses into an interest in the gospel. We deplore these things, and here and now lift up our warning against them as another device of the enemy for corrupting and aperverting the church of God." (At the utterance of this sentiment, or its equivalent in an improvised form, Dr. Gordon's colleagues on the platform, Dr. Pierson leading, and the whole audience arose to say "Amen.") That was an "amen" to some purpose, and illustrates the pertinence and power of this word in its due place. Coming with an irrepressible energy and spontaneity, it is a positive force.

But now let me put in a word of caution and objection. An amen out of place is not good—say, it is a trouble and a weariness. That does not intend the verbal echo of an untruth, of course not. But the word amen is a sacred word, and should be kept sacred, and is a potent word, and should be kept potent. But by oft repetition it becomes degraded to a wholly unmerited diminutiveness. Sometimes amen is constantly spoken to mere common places, whereas it is not by any means in accord with sound sense to greet everything with an amen, because it is true. There needs to be a reform here, and it is not to be refused on the plea of an abridgement of liberty. I insist that harm is done by repetitions of this word, repetitions that seem parrot-like in their frequency, and evident lack of just occasion. I speak now of amens voluminously ejaculated to preaching, which at the right time and in the right place, have sometimes marked force and propriety. This is all suggested, not loftily, I presume, though incidental to the record of the grand amen given by that Chicago audience to the emphasis of the "entertainment heresy."

Yes, it is painful to see churches debauched by this phase and even craze of luxurious artifice. It is even a shame. What gastronomic elaborateness, what weariness of parade, what vanity of allurement! It is not enough to eat freely at home. But the church festival is a scheme and provision for gastric glutting. Eating is out of season, it is indigestion often of rich and unhealthy viands, and is perilously likely to be in harmful excess. Is there not in some partakers a protesting conscience? Is there not rebellion of the sense of equity? And how about dreams and indigestion (the organic murmuring within) and the punishment of enfeebled body and brain and enfeebled faith most of all? How about all the polished convenience of church parlors, that are surrendered to specialties of a weak form of animal enjoyment? There is an incongruity, a crookedness, in this business of religious luxury, or luxury in religious garb for religious gain. I say "religious," but only in name. There is nothing religious, in a good sense, in the whole demoralized and demoralizing zeal of foolish expediency.

I wrote thus far and ceased. Now I have found some "lead pencillings" a few weeks old, and will transcribe. When we are chastened for our folly, let us call it by the right name. We sometimes call that tribulation, which quite as correctly is termed punishment. It is even right and good to be punished if we transgress, and to take it heartily, and say, "Lord, it is right, let the rod smite." How we worry and scheme and wish others a snake! And what is the lesson to be learned? It is one undivided and unmistakable thing, confirmed by bitter ordeals of trial, and by happy experiences of blessing. The lesson is—the truth is—look to God ever and truly, and depend on him. We ridicule even a dog for dropping his fat burden of meat, to chase a poor cur with a bone. The bone he may get, but the meat he has lost. So we foolishly lose our hold on God, even for a moment, and run after some sham of our own foolish trying, or somebody else's worldly wisdom. Now let us quit and be done with it. Come back, O my soul, to thy God, to sweet and immutable truth. Who that has a key to the greatest good, will throw it away? Our key is God in truth, or truth in God, truth immutable and calm, and always friendly and perfect.

Love in the Marriage Relation.

"Husbands, love your wives, and be not bitter against them."—Col. iii. 19. "That they may teach the young women to be sober, to love their husbands."—Titus ii. 4. "Likewise ye husbands dwell with them according to knowledge, giving honor unto the weaker vessel, and as being heirs together of the grace of life, that your prayers be not hindered."

The Bible is a curious book, and the great keynote of this curious book is love; "love not in word, nor in tongue, but in deed and in truth;" love for the brethren, so that life can be laid down for them; love that puts away all hatred; love that has compassion; love that can bear all wrongs and bitter words; love that sits in the light, with eyes unsealed, above the darkness of hate; love, not for the world, but for God and his dear Son; love that keeps the commandments; love, that is the bond of perfectness;" love, that forgives.

Love must be in the church, it must be between man and man, it must govern all business relations; it must go into the family and bind all hearts, to do as they would be done by. The husband must love the wife. He must think, not of her faults, but of her good qualities and virtues and kindnesses, until the most tender feelings are awakened in his breast and she seems more dear to him than any one else in the wide world. God has given him the knowledge that she is an heir with him of the grace of life; that both are to share in the happiness and glory of the future, and he is to look on her and dwell with her according to this knowledge. He is to honor her, not only as being the weaker vessel, but also as being an heir of glory. His love for her must be molded according to this knowledge. It must have in it no element that God would not approve. It must be a love that looks beyond the vistas of the present hour; that cares, not only for her physical wants and well-being, but that helps her to build up and exalt her spiritual nature.

He must dwell with her according to Bible knowledge, that their prayers may not be hindered, that is, he must carry out the teaching of the word in the family, and in his conduct toward his wife, or no prayer can ascend from his home to God. No indecent word or tale must proceed from his lips; his conduct and conversation must be pure; such as he would want it to be were Jesus sitting by his fireside. The love that God wants him to have for his wife is a love that will not demoralize by any act or word, but that will lead and help and feed the beloved one in the way of life, until both reach at last the golden gates, and enter in, to go out no more forever.

But what if the wife be cross, ill-tempered, perverse? Love her anyway! God does not command the husband to love the wife if she be an angel in perfection of temper and person; he says, "husbands, love your wives!" without any qualifying words. You are not to use any bitterness. If she is hateful, treat her as the Bible tells you to treat an enemy, do her good, "heap coals of fire on her head." You will make her better, you will save her, if there be in her anything to save.

So the wife is to love the husband. If she does not love him, she is to be taught to love him. God does not say "love him" if he is good looking, and polite, and intellectual, and makes no mistakes in speaking the king's English, but that young women be taught to "love their husbands," without any qualifying words, just as in the case of the man. But how can the wife learn to love her husband? How can her eyes see in him all the imaginary perfections of the ideal with which she invested him before their marriage, if he does not possess them? What if the glamour of youthful vision and romance deceived her, and he is only a common clod, a poor human being, after all? a being with all the wants and needs and aspirations of the human? Is she anything more? Has she not the same needs and wants and aspirations that he has? Must she not look up for forgiveness? ask for strength? appeal for help?

Can she obey God, in loving her husband, by constantly looking at his faults and imperfections? Is it impossible to love, where there are no faults? Then, would there be no love in the world? The wife is not to look for perfection in her husband. It is not a quality that belongs to human beings. She may have far graver faults than he has, yet she looks for love, and kindness, and forbearance from him. Shall she not give as much in return? She expects him to provide for all her wants, to surround her with all of the comforts and many of the luxuries of life. She would expect everything and give nothing; but that is not the Godlike way. Love hides a multitude of faults. A brother or sister in Christ bound together in the conjugal relation, are also bound to treat each other in that relation, as God commands. The husband dare not say, "he cannot love the wife," nor the wife, "she cannot love the husband." If it had been an impossibility to love, then, would it not have been enjoined as a duty on the married pair, then would it not have been said that the wife must be taught to love her husband. Her will here must submit to the divine will. The matter is imperative. She has given her hand, and her heart must go with her hand. The husband is an heir with her of the grace of life. He is walking with her toward the city of gold. He needs her help; the love, that will keep him in the strait and narrow path, that will shield him from the arrows of the foe, that will surround him with an atmosphere of holy thought and prayer. She must give that help, that love. A man who loves God has in him something to love. "True love strikes root in reason," and reason looks at the good and continues to love.

Love is more a thing of education and of reason than we have been taught to believe. If a wife does not love her husband it is because she wants to take her own way and not God's way. She has not found anything in the world good enough for her, and never will until she learns the blessed lesson of submission, gets above the darkness of hate into the light, and has her eyes opened by the touch of the divine fingers. God help us all to climb into the light of love!

ABRAM'S FATHERLAND.

The fatherland of Abram is, according to the assumed narrators of the Pentateuch (P, Gen. xi. 28; and J, Gen. xv. 7), the land of the Chaldees. Chaldea, or the Babylonian mat Kaldu (-di,-du), often mentioned in the cuneiform literature after the ninth century B. C., originally comprehended, according to the sources lying before us, the land between the Euphrates and the Tigris, south from Babylon; that is, Central Babylonia. In latter time, however, the word was more generally applied to the whole of Babylonia. Abraham, therefore, was a Babylonian. And, indeed, his very name shows this nationality in its bearer; for the corresponding Babylonian name, Abarsam, meaning, with the Hebrew, "The father is sublime," is discovered even among the numerous proper names occurring in the contract-tablets and lists of eponyms written in cuneiform characters. Thus, for example, a certain Aburam or Abram, was officer under King Esarhaddon, named also in Scripture, 2 Kings xix. 37, and is mentioned as the Assyrian eponym of the year 677 B. C. The native place of the biblical Abram within the borders of Chaldea or Babylonia, is given in Genesis as Ur. We are better instructed today about the real situation of this city, thanks to the Babylonian literature, than our fathers were. The ruins of Mugheir, or Muqqejar, which are placed a little south from the thirty-first degree of latitude, not far from the lower Euphrates, on the banks of the old famous channel Pallakopas, are doubtless identical with the "Ur of the Chaldees." For a good number of bricks and clay cylinders found there, show the former name of the buried city to be Uru, and now called by the Arabs Mugheir, from the bricks having been cemented with bitumin." These ruins of Mugheir, or Ur, consist "of a low series of mounds of oval form, the largest diameter from north to south measuring rather more than half a mile." As often as the Euphrates overflows its banks and inundates the neighboring districts, the ruins are completely surrounded by water, and approachable only in boats. A high cone—the principal ruin of the place—contains the relics of the very old temple of Ur, dedicated to the moon-god Sin, still in good preservation; for it is remarkable that Ur and Haran, where Abram emigrated at first, were principal seats of the cultus of Sin. Ur was a most famous seat or capital of the oldest Babylonian kings, and its favorable situation on the great water-course gave the city the importance of a flourishing commercial centre with extensive water facilities. The numerous clay coffins being excavated in Ur, which evidently are brought here from all the regions of Babylonia, show it to be the large and sacred churchyard of Babylonia. For, as at present in the same country, the Persians carry their dead to Kerbela and Meshhed Ali; so the old Babylonians wished to be buried in places which they believed to be especially sacred, and particularly near the large temples of South Babylonia. Not a few names of the oldest kings of Ur are handed down to us even so far back as the sixth century B. C., the town must have existed. Among the Babylonian rebels who revolted against king Sardanapalus (668-626), we find the Assyrian governor of Ur. The famous Nebuchadnezzar (604-562) boasts of his extensive buildings and works of restoration on the site of the old temple of Ur. And Nabonedus, the last Babylonian king (555-538), took great pains, just before the fall of the great monarchy, to restore the temples of Ur and Haran. On a clay cylinder found at the corners of the temple of the moon-god at Ur of the Chaldees, in a prayer of King Nabonedus, of wich the following is a part:

O Sin, Lord of the gods,
King of the gods of heaven and earth:

Preserve me, Nabonedus, king of Babylon, from sin against thy sublime divinity, and bestow upon me a life of long days, and plant in the heart of Belshazzar, the eldest son, the offspring of my heart, fear of thy great divinity, that he never may give way to sin, never incline to deception!—Sunday School Times.

More Conscience.

We want more conscience in all the trades of the day; then our carpentery, our plumbing, our cabinet making, and our tailoring will not be what they are, but what they claim to be. The looms that weave our fabrics and the establishments that sell them to the people: the lawyers who propose to take care of our wills when we are dead, and to out now the silver bond of marriage when it has rusted, and concerning which God has said, "Let no man put it asunder;" the legislators who so tenderly claim only to be "the servants of the people;" the dairyman who sells us milk; the grocer who cares for our horses; the clerk who keeps our accounts;—the need of all these today, and of every other right work, is more conscience.

There is a vast amount of slovenly, dishonest work done, and it has done much to degrade men and put them at a very serious disadvantage. A man who does not put truth into his work does not tell the truth, and he is doubly guilty when he makes the world or the fabric or the opportunity lie for him. Wherever you are employed, young man, and by whomsoever, put your conscience into your work, and though your employer wrong you, never wrong yourself by sleighting your task. Be very careful that circumstances, the removal of restraints, are not allowed to rob your conscience of its sublime liberty. Better maintain your conscience in doing your duty than to escape the reproach of men, and be careful to carry your conscience into the smallest duty. Nothing is indifferent, the faithful doing of which responds to moral obligation in a man.

Some men cannot be trusted with details. A thing of duty with them is determined by its massiveness, its quantity, or the capacity it may have for promotion or self-glorification. In all the universe very little things are important. It would seem that God was very careful in making a spear of grass, and there is more of wonder in the throat of a canary than in the shaggy head of a lion. The faithfulness of a man is not determined by the size of his work, and duty is never done when its force is expended on the great things at the expense of smaller obligations. When one confers the dignity of conscientious duty upon the smallest part of his work, he has not only served well, but he has laid the stairway of his own promotion.

It is nobler to be faithful than to be famous, and I assure you, young man, if you would give greatness to your duty, if you would ever climb to the ideal of a dream in your mind, it will be by faithfulness in the smallest matters.—H. Rhodes, D. D.

Conference Notice.

The Second Quarterly Conference of the Church of God in Indiana will be held at Ransselaer, Ind., commencing Friday, Feb. 4, 1887, and continue over the following Sunday. Brethren and sisters, this is your appointed meeting—do not wait to be urged to attend and aid in its work, but esteem it as one more privilege of assembling together, and by a united effort push forward the cause of our Master. As Brother E. B. Driggins, President of the Conference, is in the South for the winter, I have been requested to urge Brother J. L. Wiese, First Vice President, to attend.

A. R. UNDERWOOD, Sec.

Remember that by paying for THE RESTITUTION till Dec. 31, 1887 between now and Feb. 1, 1887, you will receive free a Cabinet Photograph of Elder S. A. Chaplin, Editor of THE RESTITUTION, with his Autograph attached.

THE RESTITUTION,

Terms—TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

Payable in advance. Three and Six Months the same rate.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christian King of Kings; and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also, a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

RENEW TODAY.

REPRINT of three verses of Prof. Gardner's translation of Job xxxiii., from the Septuagint, which appeared in THE RESTITUTION last week, correcting typographical errors. The corrections are in italics.

Vs. 2. For lo, I have opened my mouth, and my tongue hath spoken plainly.

Vs. 16. By dream, or in meditative thought by night, as when for instance some dreadful fear falleth upon men in slumberings upon their couch.

Vs. 24. He shall sprout up so as not to fall to death, and will renew his body like the paint that has become dull upon a wall, and his bones be filled with marrow.

EDITORIAL BREVITIES.

In Gal. iii. 19, we read—"For I through the law am dead to the law, that I might live to God."

Bloomfield remarks on this passage that quite a difference of opinion exists among Expositors as to the exact sense of the original expression; particularly as respects the two words dia nomou—through law. He says some explain this genitive case of the word law as referring to the "Christian religion" or the gospel system, illustrating this exposition by a reference to Rom. iii. 27—"the law of faith;" ch. ix. 31—"the law of righteousness;" and viii. 2; "the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus which makes free from the law of sin and death." In this way the text would be made to mean that death was by one law and life by another law through death. In comparing Versions we find that the Italian translation gives this sense. We quote the words as given in this Version:—"Conciosiachè per una legge io sia morto ad un' altra legge, acciocchè io viva a Dio"—Inasmuch as through one law I may be dead to another law, in order that I may live to God.

This rendering makes the text mean that it is through the law of the Spirit of Life," the "law of Christ," the "law of faith" that believers have died to the law of Moses, and that the life they now live, is the life "to God." As the next verse says "crucified with Christ nevertheless living." Or, as says the Apostle:—"I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me."

The one that dies in the Lord dies in a law that provides for an endless life through the Son of God, and through a resurrection from the dead.

"And the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations," Rev. xxii. 2.

Looking over a volume of Whittier's Poems the other day we met with the following note prefixed to some very beautiful verses.

"The Batuta, the celebrated Mussulman traveller of the fourteenth century, speaks of a cypress-tree in Ceylon universally held sacred by the natives, the leaves of which are said to fall at only certain intervals, and he who had the happiness to find and eat one of them was restored, at once, to youth and vigor. The traveller saw several venerable Jogees, or saints, sitting silent and motionless under the tree, patiently waiting the falling of a leaf."

We subjoin two verses from the Poet.

Unheeded in the low, arched stone
The song of Cuyo's old Hindu was sweet:
Priests by Lotus-lily Rivers
Chanted brightly at their feet.

They waited for that fabled leaf
Of which the wonder-working Sages sing;
Which heals every wound to entirely as
The [illegible]

[illegible] by time to renew.

EARTHQUAKES.

Our Lord, among the signs that are to precede his second coming, enumerates "earthquakes in divers places." The following account of one, that occurred last summer, is taken from the Family Herald and Weekly Star. Others of a very destructive nature have occurred in East India, and in Mediterranean Islands, within the few past years. We do well to observe the "Signs of the Times." The 'Great Earthquake" is yet to come. See Rev. xvi. 18.

THE RESULT OF THE VOLCANIC ERUPTION IN NEW ZEALAND.

BY A RESIDENT IN THE COLONY.

The Terraces, exquisite as they were in their loveliness, at the same time inspired a feeling of awe. They were quite unique, so far as is known, throughout the whole world. There was something about their regular formation which suggested human handiwork, and yet it needed not a second glance to satisfy the spectator that no human skill could ever turn out a work so impressive in its proportions, and at the same time so delicately fretted and carved in its smallest details. Here was emphatically a structure made without human hands, and the thought must have occurred to the visitor—Was it possible that this lovely vision could really be of earth and permanent in its nature, or was it destined to melt away like the sweet sights and sounds conjured up by Prospero on his enchanted island?

When such a doubt arose, however, it was quickly dismissed. True, the district was of volcanic origin, and boiling mud pools, and puhis, and fumaroles abounded on every hand. Still, scientific men agreed that this volcanic activity was dying out, and the traditions of the Maoris showed that, at any rate, while they had been resident in the district—say from 500 to 1000 years—no event had occurred to make them fear the possibility of any fresh outbreak of the fire fiend.

Before I describe the startling and horrifying manner in which we have suddenly been deprived of these wonderful natural features which the people of New Zealand had learned to regard as their most priceless national possession, let me say a word or two as to the way in which they were originally formed.

Nature, great artist that she is, produces her most charming effects with the simplest materials, and so it was in this case. Deep down in one of her hidden laboratories beneath the crust of this volcanic region, she prepared a strong solution of siliceous matter in boiling water. This solution is so strong that a shirt dipped in it would be "starched" stiff in a few seconds, and an immersed twig becomes quickly encrusted with silica, reminding us of the "dripping wells" to be found in the limestone caves of some parts of England.

This solution being prepared, it was forced through a pipe to the top of a small eminence, and flowed down the latter into the waters of the lake which nestled at the foot. In the course of some hundreds of years the silicia, becoming deposited from the water, had built a series of graduated basins extending from the foot of the hill to its summit, and these formed the most perfect natural baths it was possible to imagine. Their floors were as true as if laid by a spirit-level, while the water in trickling over the edge of the basin deposited an exquisite filagree-work of shining crystals. Such was the White Terrace.

The other Terrace, situated some distance away, was constructed on similar lines though smaller, and here Nature had varied her effects by tinging the crystals with a slight flush of rose-color. The water in the basins was a delicate ultramarine, and the lovely contrast thus obtained was at once the delight and despair of artists.

Nor was it alone the eye of the visitor that was delighted. To bathe in these basins was a luxury as of Elysium. Some of the ingredients unknowingly mixed with the water by Nature's subtle alchemy, gave a soft, creamy feeling to the skin, and a sense of elasticity to the body, which made people ask themselves whether they had indeed discovered the secret of perpetual youth.

All this loveliness is now, alas! a thing of the past. About two o'clock on the morning of June 10th, 1886, the inhabitants of Wairoa and other places in the Hot Lake district were aroused out of their beds by a terrific commotion. Overlooking the Terrace district is a singular-looking mountain with three peaks, known respectively as Wahanga, Tauwahia and Tarawera. First there was an eruption from Wahanga with a loud noise and shocks of earthquake; a few minutes afterwards there was a more violent outburst from the top of Roawahia, the middle peak, and lastly there was a tremendous explosion from the remaining peak, the whole east end of which was blown away, the debris covering the country to a distance of many miles. Huge clouds of steam and pumice dust and showers of hot stones were flung into the air, and constant flashes of lightning illuminated the scene. What the eye-witnesses described as "fire-balls" hurtled through the air, and as the eruption was accompanied by terrific roaring of high-pressure steam escaping from the volcanic vents, and the constant thunder produced by the electrical discharges, it need scarcely be said that the combined effect was appalling in the extreme. The explosions were heard over the greater part of the North Island of New Zealand; and the steam-clouds, which were estimated to have attained the height of nine miles, could be seen for a distance of 80 or 100 miles.

The effect of the eruption was particularly disastrous as regards the township of Wairoa, and the native settlements of Moureo and Te Ariki. The two latter were overwhelmed by avalanches of volcanic mud, and all the inhabitants perished. Wairoa was buried in ashes and stones, but most of the inabitants managed to escape. Altogether, however, seven Europeans and between 90 to 100 natives lost their lives in this terrible outbreak.

So far I have dealt only with one phase of the outbreak.

The Pink and White Terraces were situated on the shores of Lake Rotomahana, and here another very extraordinary phenomenon occurred. I have already mentioned how one end of Tarawera mountain was blown off. Dr. Hector, F. R. S., C. M. G., Director of the New Zealand Geological survey, who has made a careful examination of the spot, and to whom I am indebted for many details in this article, states that this rent is a most wonderful feature. It is not a slip from the mountain side, but appears as if a portion of the mountain measuring 2000 feet by 500 feet, and 300 feet deep, had been blown off, leaving a rocky chasm, from which steam was being discharged in rapidly succeeding puffs. The eastern side of this chasm is brightly tinted as if by the efflorescent deposit of a mineral substance, probably ferro-chlorides.

Starting from this rent is a terrific chasm extending right across the site occupied by Lake Rotomahana and some distance beyond. The lake has quite disappeared. Within the chasm is a chain of mud volcanoes, which are constantly ejecting stones and boiling water to a distance of from 600 to 800 feet in the air. As the sides are continually falling in and being again cast forth, each crater presents the idea of a huge monster eating away the surrounding country and vomiting forth boiling mud and steam.

Such is the scene of horror, which now occupies the spot once beautified by one of the most lovely natural objects in the world!

I have not yet exhausted the catalogue of wonderful things which happened in connection with this eruption. The Government township of Rotorua, where are situated the healing springs that exert such a marvellous effect on cases of rheumatism, skin diseases, and the like, had a most providential escape. When the first outbreak occurred, the gigantic column of dust was heading straight in the direction of Rotorua, and for this town a similar fate to that of Wairoa appeared inevitable. Suddenly the wind changed, diverted the course of the devastating cloud, and Rotorua was saved.

As is usually the case in most eruptions, the volcanic dust was carried to immense distances. Settlers living eighty miles away from Tarawera awoke in the morning and found their houses and farms covered four inches deep with what at first appeared to be a strange, ghastly kind of snow, but turned out to be grey volcanic dust, which darkened the air like a dense London fog as it fell. Vessels out at sea, 120 miles from the volcano also had their decks and rigging covered with powder. Near the scene of the eruption the drift covers the ground to the depth of ten to a dozen feet. Cattle being thus deprived of food are roaming about in a starving condition, and the loss to the colonists will be very severe.

There are, of course, conflicting theories as to the cause of the eruption, which is not surprising, considering how little is really known by scientific men about volcanoes. The outbreak undoubtedly took place in a line of volcanic activity, which can be distinctly traced to the Sandwich Islands and some people are inclined to argue that as Kilauea, the great volcano of Hawaii, has been quiet lately, the pent up volcanic energy has relieved itself in New Zealand. Dr. Hector, however, holds that the outbreak is a purely local development of hydro-thermal energy." His theory seems to be that, by some means or other, the water of the hot springs or lakes in the district obtained access to subterraneous heat; and this caused the generation of an immense amount of super-heated steam, which brought about all the mischief.

At present the volcanoes have quieted down to some extent, but no one knows, of course, when some fresh outbreak may occur. A day or two ago a party of savants were exploring in the district, when an explosion took place within 200 yards from where they were standing, throwing up a column of debris and steam thousands of feet high. Scientific ardor for once gave place to regard for personal safety, and the savants beat a rapid, if not very dignified, retreat.

The whole aspect of the country is now so changed that the most experienced guides are unable to recognize localities with much accuracy. Avalanches of mud, geysers, and landslips also render sight-seeing an extremely dangerous occupation. By-and-by, however, when the country has become a little more stable, it is hoped tourists will be able to visit the spot, and a fresh attraction will be added to the many wonderful sights offered by New Zealand to the lover of the picturesque. It has been discovered that we shall not be altogether without something to remind us of the vanished Terrace. These formed so powerful an attraction that people quite lost sight of the fact first pointed out by Dr. Hochstetter some years ago, that there were other Terraces of siliceous sinter—to use the technical phrase—in New Zealand. These are situated in a little-known part of the North Island, within the Hot Lake district, but in such a secluded spot that they have been seen by few Europeans. They are greatly inferior both in size and beauty to those which have been destroyed, but doubtless will now be sought out by tourists as affording some idea of that majestic vision which has vanished for ever, leaving in its place an inferno of doleful sights and sounds.

FROM JERUSALEM.

My first visit here was in the spring of eventful 1882, and my second this autumn of 1886. In 1882 the growth of the suburbs of Jerusalem, outside of the present walls of the city, caused the Rev. Joseph Cook, of Boston, who was here that spring, to speak of it to me as the "New Jerusalem." But the marvelous growth of the four and one-half years since that, is still more wonderful. Where and when will this growth stop?

I have seen the cities and towns in the western states of the American Republic, as they sprang into existence like mushrooms in a night, but it was easy to account for it. It is more difficult for the world to account for the rapid growth here. This is a city of stone—hard cut stone—substantially built upon deep rock foundations.

Other cities have a port, a railway centre or intersection; a manufacturing interest; a large productive country; or something regarding health, education or trade to attract attention and draw in a population and capital; to erect buildings, raise the price of real estate and prosper.

But what causes the growth here? It is the religious idea and nothing else. A Messiah is expected here soon. By some this coming is believed to be a second coming, and by others his first coming. Some expect the coming of a literal person, visible to the eye. By others this coming is supposed to be spiritual, or as a great principle, overturning the past and present order of things and establishing a new. But notwithstanding the diversity of views, the expectation of the coming of a Messiah remains a subject of special interest.

There are as yet no attractions from trade, either present or prospective. No railways completed, or even begun; and but little talked of, though admitted to be a sure thing at some future day. No great highways either pass or intersect here. Only the one surface road to Jaffa, which everybody must come on at present, but not the first semblance of a trade route. There are several foot and bridle paths leading in here from many directions; but only because Jerusalem, or as the Moslems call it, 'The Pure,' is here. By these foot and bridle paths the city is supplied with grain, fruit, vegetables, beef, wood and brush, upon donkeys, camels, and the heads of strong Arab women.

There is plenty of coal in the Lebanon mountains, but not allowed by the government to be taken out. We should be glad to see yet one and middle aged people from America, with backbone and good principles, come here; ready to farm, quarry stone, or lead off in any proper occupation which they may have learned for a life business.

But after all, the religious idea must carry the day.—J. Cranell, in New Age.

The Biblical Record Corroborated.

So far, every tablet which Rawlinson and George Smith and others have found on the banks of the Euphrates have corroborated the Biblical record. In the later reading of them all we shall see, not that the Pentateuch is a group of empty myths, but that the myths are only the dim oral reflections from the first recorded light in that Pentateuch. Smith has found, for example, in the tiles of dead and buried Babylon, the Chaldean myth of Noah and the flood.

We read in the word of God these words: "Marvellous things did he in Zoan." What was Zoan? Where was it? Within two years we have learned all about it. There is a vast section of the Delta of the Nile which covers five hundred thousand acres of land, and is called the Menzeleh district. It is purely primitive. The land is flat, covered by water during the inundation of the Nile, and forming great lagoons, occupied mostly by fishermen. That is the Zoan of the Bible, the Tanis of today. Great temples have been discovered. Vast palaces of superb sculpture have been thrown open. The houses are of immense proportion You can see the labyrinthian paths which led through the cemeteries of five thousand years ago. (?) Beautiful homes have been kissed by the sunlight.

Now, when was Zoan founded? Moses tells us, far, far back in the centuries, "seven years after Hebron." Now, it turns out, by hieroglyphics and unmistakable records, that in this same Zoan, the Tanis of today, the splendid court of the great Rameses II. lived in all its splendor. Rameses was the Sesostris of history, the mightiest king in all the East. Even in his day he found Tanis a ruin, and built it up into his great capital. Here lived, later, Menepthah, the very Pharaoh of the Exodus. Here within the gates of Tanis, Moses, performed his miracle of murrain and of darkness. Here, amid the splendors of military pageantry, the immense Egyptian army set out for the capture of the fugitive Israelites, but came never back again. How little the builders of the cities knew of what they were doing in those distant times! How little the very destroyers knew, when they laid waste great cities and left them for the desert sands to wrap them in their winding sheets. Little they dreamed of the secret revelation which was yet to be made in all its fulness, and of the world's redemption through the incarnate God, and that down in the later ages, they should themselves arouse from their winding-sheet of desert sands and stand up as witnesses of that wonderful Book. Within just a few months only, Maspero, the director general of the antiquities of Egypt, has taken off the bandages of Sesostris, and his face has been photographed; and we now know the very features of the man who introduced the great oppression of the Israelites.

Another illustration of the enterprise with which the new countries are lifting the veil from the old and the buried, and making them tell their long kept secrets, can be found in the results of the expedition to Assos, in Asia Minor, organized and paid for by the citizens of Boston, and conducted by Messrs. Clark and Bacon. Now, Assos has an important bearing upon the travels of Paul. It lies upon the Ægean coast, in the district of the ancient Mysia, and distant about twenty miles from Alexandria Troas, where Paul saw the Macedonian vision, and whence he set out for the evangelization of Europe. He subsequently passed through Assos on foot, in order to take ship at Mitylene, for Cesarea in Palestine. These two American explorers have now unearthed this historical place. They found it at first a miserable little fishing village, perched among the rocks, but they have lifted its wedding-shoot and revealed to us, far beneath, vast buildings, rich treasures, magnificent sculptures, and all the characteristics of what Bellowes, long years ago, had said, was probably the most complete and undisturbed Greek city in existence. These treasures of Assos are now safely lodged in Boston, and can be studied at leisure. Here one can see with his own eyes the very triumphs of art which represented the Greek civilization whose Polytheism Paul attacked in its strongholds. It would not be strange if some of the objects which are now priceless treasures [illegible] brought from their long entombment in Assos, were once, and often, gazed upon by Paul's own eyes.

Another illustration in the same line, can be found in the rich gatherings from Pergamos. A company of German explorers went to that city in Asia Minor a few years ago, and began their work. The result is, that they brought to light some of the most magnificent of all the colossal sculptures which have come down from Greek civilization to our own times. And what, Ephesus, was Pergamos? In the early part of the Christian era it was a city of great size, a very center of artistic achievement, and widely celebrated. The Christians — they were everywhere. If they could not be kept out of Rome, and even the palace of the Cæsars, neither could they be kept away from the rich and lordly Pergamos. When John looked upon Asia Minor for a representative group of churches, he could not leave out that city. Here was a grand illustration of a wonderful truth. The Christian can be a Christian still, the wide world over. Put him in hut or palace, if he be true to his conscience, he is ever the Christian. To the Christians in proud and pagan Pergamos John wrote these words: "I know thy works and where thou dwellest; and thou holdest fast my name, and hast not denied my faith, even in those dark days when Antipas was my faithful martyr, who was slain among you, where Satan dwelleth." Now these German explorers thought they saw in the sight of ancient Pergamos a storehouse of treasures different from, though hardly inferior to, the archæological wealth which Schliemann rescued from the depths of ancient Troy. And they were successful. Many of these colossal triumphs of Greek art have been lifted out of their long resting-place, and are now to be seen as one of the great ornaments of the National Museum of Berlin. The very sculptures which were familiar to Christian eyes nineteen centuries ago, may now be studied face to face, and made to tell their story to any observer in this nineteenth century.

But what of Egypt in the same period? Less than two years ago the now renowned Naukratis was discovered through a single inscription found by Mr. Petrie on the west Canobic arm of the Nile, near the railway which runs from Alexandria to Cairo. Here was once a large city, the capital of Lower Egypt in the time of the Greek Ptolemaic ascendancy, before the Romans conquered the country. Here in Naukratis was manufactured that rich and rare pottery whose glazing and exquisite form dazzled the eyes of the hunter of bric-a-brac long before a Cæsar sat upon the Roman throne. Up the broad canals of Naukratis the great ships from the various Mediterranean ports moved, and stopped at the quays of the opulent city. This is proved by the presence of stones, with barnacles and sea-shells upon them, picked up by Petrie from the debris of the long buried city. Vases of rich and delicate form and color have been found in vast number and infinite variety, all of which are described in the third Memoir of the Palestine Exploration Fund. Here is a celebrated city, brought to light within a few months—a city which tells what Egypt was in the interval of four centuries lying between the closing of the Old Testament history and the opening of the New. It is a new revelation, and supplies an important link in the general history of the world. It is a lifting aside of the veil which hides the Egypt of the Ptolemies from the Christian student of today.—John P. Hurst, D. D., in Zion's Herald.

A Card.

To the brethren in Arkansas and Southern Missouri I would say I intend to start, no preventing providence, in about three weeks, for your country, with a view of locating there. If the brethren would write me at Ord, Valley Co., Neb., their post office address and the advantages and disadvantages of the country, I would esteem it a great favor. Yours in the blessed hope,

A. V. GROVE.

The brethren of the Abrahamic faith will convene in conference at Lenark, Ill., commencing Jan. 28th, and continuing over Sunday. A cordial invitation is extended to all.

R. CROWS.

The church of God at Cleveland, O., will hold meetings at 10:30 a. m. every Sunday (D. V.) in Bland and Keller's Block, Room 36, West Superior Street, Corner of Bolivar, North of Central Market. Seats free. Brethren from abroad of like faith and all searchers after truth are welcome.

The [illegible] of Our Saviour and Elected doctrines—no life only through Christ—the resurrection of the dead—second coming of Christ—The Kingdom of God, etc., will be particularly preached every Sunday morning at 10:30 a. m. [illegible] to above services we earnestly invite the reader [illegible] Bible service will close at 12:30, after which [illegible] will meet for conference, "breaking of bread and prayers." Be punctual, as first hour is [illegible]

BUSINESS NOTES.

On account of the continued sickness of one of the music compositors employed on our New Hymn Book, "The Christian Hymnal," the work is delayed for a short time. Be patient, brethren, the delay will be short, we hope. Send on your orders and they will be filled in the order they are received.

Only six days yet remain till the offer to send a Cabinet Photograph of Elder S. A. Chaplin, Editor of THE RESTITUTION, etc., will close. Send on your orders and secure this present. Any one who has received his picture in bad condition injured in the mail—will be furnished a new one by informing the publisher of the fact. We want every one who desires this memento to have it, and in good condition.

Any one sending us a new subscriber for 1887, and the subscription price of $2.00, may select books or tracts to the amount of 75 cents from our list, and they will be sent them free, post-paid. Sample copies of THE RESTITUTION furnished on application.

If the person who sent us a letter from Hepler, Kan., ordering a pamphlet, will favor us with his name, we will be pleased to fill the order.

Home Items.

LONDON, Jan 23.—The Daily News professes to know that there is extreme danger of war. It says the Government is alarmed on account of its having heard that Germany is likely within in a few days to ask France to explain the meaning of French military movements on the frontier.

VIENNA, Jan. 23.—Rules governing the Landsturm, which have just been published, show that nothing but blindness, deafness, dumbness, and lameness will exempt men from service, and that drafts from the Landsturm will be used to fill up the gaps in the regular army and navy reserves. The new rules have rather surprised the country, such sweeping, stringent contingent not having been expected.

The CHRISTIAN HYMNAL.

The above is the Title of our New Hymn Book, which will contain about one hundred and sixty pages. The book will be handsomely bound in Cloth, printed on good paper, and nice clear type. We expect to be able to present the book to our friends in a very short time. Single copies will be sold at 75 cents each. One dozen copies at 60 cents each. In lots of fifty at 50 cents each.

PLEDGES.

We want to know how large an edition to print, and for that reason now ask our friends to send us pledges of the number of books they want, and we can thus get an idea of the number it will be necessary to issue. We do not want your money now, only the number of copies you will take. Send at once. Address

THE RESTITUTION,
Plymouth, Ind.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Before you go to the Post Office to get a Money Order to send us, take a copy of the paper and read carefully the instructions at the head of the second page. Examine your order as soon as it is handed to you, and see that it is all right. See that it is addressed to the P. O. at "Plymouth, Indiana," not to Plymouth, Illinois, or any where else. Have it made payable to "THE RESTITUTION"—not to ANY individual. Be SURE it is all right before you send it.

Do NOT, under any circumstances, buy a POSTAL NOTE—If destroyed or lost no duplicate can be issued—any body can cash them—they are UNSAFE. We will not be responsible for Postal Notes or money sent loose in letters.

A Money Order costs five cents, and is Absolutely Safe—A Postal Note costs three cents, and has NO Guarantee with it.

We must insist on our friends heeding these directions, for our mutual protection. Three Postal Notes have been wrong within a short time, and one of them for $2.50 is lost entirely. Two Money Orders have contained errors also, causing much annoyance and delay.

CHRISTMAS NIGHT IN ST. PETER'S.

Low on the marble floor I lie:
I am alone;
Though friendly voices whisper nigh,
And foreign crowds are passing by,
I am alone.
" Great hymns float through
The shadowed aisles, I hear a slow
Refrain, "Forgive them, for they know
Not what they do."

With tender joy all others thrill;
I have but tears;
The false priests' voices, high and shrill
Reiterate the "Peace, good will:"
I have but tears.
I hear anew
The calls and scourge: then comes the low,
But words, "Forgive them, for they know
Not what they do."

Close by my side the poor souls kneel,
I turn away;
Half-pitying looks at me they steal.
They think, because I do not feel,
I turn away.
Ah! if they knew.
How, following them wherever they go,
I hear "Forgive them, for they know

Above the organ's sweetest strains
I hear the groans
Of prisoners, who lie in chains.
So near, and in such mortal pains
I hear the groans.
But Christ walks through
The dungeons of St. Angelo,
And says, "Forgive them, for they know
Not what they do."

And now the music sinks to sighs;
The lights grow dim;
The Pastorella's melodies
In lingering cadences float and flee;
The lights grow dim,
More clear and true,
In this sweet silence, seem to flow
The words, "Forgive them, for they know
Not what they do."

The dawn swing lucence, silver gray;
The night is past;
Now comes, triumphant, God's full day;
No priest, no church, can bar its way;
The night is past;
How, on this blest
Of God's great dawns, blaze and glow
The words, "Forgive them, for they know
Not what they do!"

The Book of Jobab; called Job, Son of Zare, Son of Hraguel, Son of Hesan, Son of Isaac, Son of Habraam.  According to the Septuagint.

CHAP. XXXIV.

1. And Elious taking up the discourse again saith,

2. Hear me ye wise; mark me well ye exact scientists:

3. Because the ear proveth the value of words and the throat lusteth in eating;

4. Let us essay ourselves in a judicial way, let us come to an understanding between ourselves as to what is good: (noble or beautiful, not good in the abstract).

5. Because Job hath said, I am just; The Lord hath changed his opinion of me;

6. And hath falsified his judgment of me; my arrow is perforce without wrong-doing.

7. What man is there like Job, drinking down scorn like water?

8. He is one that doth not sin, and hath not been irreverent, nor hath he made common cause with those who participate in transgressions to go his way with the irreverent.

9. Yea, didst thou not say there shall be no visitation of man, even no visitation of him from the Lord?

10. Therefore, ye who understand in heart hear me: may it not be mine in the sight of the Lord to be irreverent, and pervert the right in the sight of the Almighty,

11. But may he give man his due even as each one of them doeth, and in the path of a man that is a man shall one find him;

12. And dost thou think the Lord will do out-of-the-way things? or the Almighty will pervert the way of Judgment;

13. He who made the earth? and who is he who made that which is under the heavens and all that is therein?

14. If forsooth he should choose to withhold and withdraw its breath to himself,

15. All flesh would come to an end together, and every mortal would go back to earth whence he was moulded;

16. See, art thou not admonished? Hear these things; mark well the sound of spoken words;

17. Regard thou the one who hateth transgressions, and the one who utterly destroyeth the wicked. The One who is eternally Just:

18. Should'st thou speak irreverently to a king, thou art a transgressor, O thou most irreverent to rulers.

19. There is One who hath not been abashed at the face of a noble, nor doth he know what it is to do honor to the great, to be awe-struck with their faces; and their man-crying and beseeching will go away as vain things.

20. For they have exercised their utility in an evasive way, while the helpless were being inclined out of the way.

21. For he is a seer of the doings of men and nothing that they do hath escaped his notice.

22. Nor will there be a place for those who are the cause of transgressions to hide;

23. Because not upon a mere man will he rely any more: For the Lord hath been overseeing them all;

24. He who apprehendeth most unsearchable things, famous and out-of-the-way things of which there is no number;

25. He who maketh their doings known; he will subvert the mighty and they will be brought low:

26. He hath quenched the irreverent, and they are seers in his sight,

27. That they have inclined away from God's law; and have not recognized his statutes;

28. That he might attract the cry of the needy to himself; the beggars' cry will he hear;

29 And he will have it quiet by his side, and who will legislate otherwise? and he will hide his face and who shall see him? And he is against a nation and against a man alike.

30. Giving the kingly rule to a man that is a hypocrite because of a discontented royal people:

31. Yea, to the strong he it is who saith, I have taken; I will not give a pledge.

32. Without my own agency will I see: Do thou show me: I I have done wrong I will not repent it;

33. Shall one require it of thee, because thou art to be thrust away? Because thou hast chosen and not I? Even what thou knowest speak plainly.

34. Therefore will those who understand in heart say these things, and a man that is wise hath hearkened unto my spoken (oracular) word.

35. But Job hath not spoken with understanding; his spoken words are not in the way of positive science.

36. Yea forsooth and do thou learn, Job, not to give answer any more like the thoughtless.

37. Lest we add to our sins, and transgression be imputed to us, in addition to the sin of our talking much in the sight of the Lord.

C. GARDNER

MILLFIELD, O., Jan. 15, 1887.

Editor Restitution:

As I cannot address each personally, allow me, through your valuable medium, to express to you and to all, my heart-felt gratitude for the many letters of sympathy. The Lord bless you, and make you partakers of Messiah's love and holiness. I have been confined to the house, for some weeks, through indisposition, but am now about recovered.

My domestic hearth, however, is solitary: the picture of the one, now absent, and sleeping, is, in vision, always there, waking up the scenes and happiness of buried years; but I do not sorrow as one without hope. The sleepers will be with him who is the "Resurrection and the Life."

I have appointments (by invitation) near Quaker City (at Zion Congregation and at Byesville) to deliver series of discourses, on the "Coming Age," and "The Eastern Question." I commence at Zion, Feb. 8, and shall spend nearly a month at the two places. The people in those districts, are much interested to hear on the great events of the present and future ages. They wish to understand the signs of the times; what may be called, "present truth," and "meat in due season."

I am now closely occupied in reading proof, and in preparations for the issue of my second work, "The Eastern Question in its various phases." This work is progressing satisfactorily and will be out sometime during the next month, and will then be ready for delivery. I shall keep the work in my own hands, and shall be able to supply readily and faithfully, all that desire to read and handle the work. I intend to keep THE RESTITUTION fully supplied, and hope and believe that you will find it to your advantage to make some effort in their circulation.

These two works, ("Coming Age," and "Eastern Question") have cost me severe mental labor, and the personal outlay of $3000.00. God has enabled me to meet their cost, so that no debt will hang over either of them. The "Coming Age," you have seen and read (a book of 500 Royal octavo pages). The Eastern Question will contain over 600 pages of the same size. I desire as soon as possible to send these two works out into the world on their mission, as angels of alarm, and of gospel instruction. Of the second work (Eastern Question) you will allow me space for outline prefatory remarks hoping that they will be read, and that, through them, attention may be called to the book itself.

1. The title the work (Eastern Question in its various Phases) might convey the idea that it is a purely political book; and not, therefore, of special interest to the Christian. Such a view will be found incorrect. It is a religious work, designed especially to interest, and instruct the people of God on the national aspects of coming events, and their relation to Christian duty. At the same time, it is the statesman's key to the proper interpretation of the present and the future national movements. We have examined this great question, viewed by the great men of the world, and by Jehovah himself. We have fully demonstrated that human and divine purposes are quite unlike; that (a) Jehovah is the Father and Governor of the nations; (b) that "my (Jehovah's) thoughts, (are) not your thoughts, neither (are) your ways my ways, saith the Lord. For (as) the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts. For as the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater; so shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth; it shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper (in the thing) whereto I sent it." Is. lv. 8-12.

We have given his prophetic word, and showed its accomplishment, in national history.

We selected six national families, Egypt, the British Empire, the Russian Empire, the Ottoman Empire, the Hebrew Family, the Great American Republic, and the Messianic Kingdom. These we trace from their origin, give the remarkable events in their histories, and delineate their position and work, in the coming national drama.

We have pointed out the purpose and agency of Jehovah in all the great national movements. The work is new in its design and development of human domination. There is no other work similar. We have taken great pains to define the Eastern Question as its elements have come to the front, in the progressive history of the world. Our sketches of the Hebrew, the American, and the Messianic Phases of the Eastern Question, cannot be read, and attentively investigated, without eliciting the most intense interest.

All we ask of the reader, is to examine carefully each part of the work, and its design.

It is the duty of every one to study the signs of the times, and make due preparation for coming events. As Jehovah moves among the nations, we should attentively follow his divine foot-prints, and watch for Messiah's coming and Kingdom.

We do not ask you to speak of the work until you have seen, and read it. If, then, you find it a work worthy of special notice, you will act accordingly.

O Lord, Messiah, hasten thy coming.

J. P. WEETHEE.

"Too Many of Us!"

A TRUE STORY.

"Mamma, is there too many of us?"
This little girl asked with a sigh.
"Perhaps you wouldn't be tired, you see,
If a few of your children should die."

She was only three years old,—the one
Who spoke in that strange, sad way.
As she saw her mother's impatient frown
At the children's boisterous play.

There were half-a-dozen who round her stood,
And the mother was sick and poor,
Worn out with the care of the noisy brood
And the fight with the wolf at the door.

For a smile or a kiss, no time, no place;
For the little one least of all;
And the shadow that darkened the mother's face
O'er the young life seemed to fall.

More thoughtful than say, she felt more deep
And pondered in childish way
How to lighten the burden she could not share,
Growing heavier day by day.

Only a week, and the little Clare
In her tiny white trundle-bed
Lay with closed eyes, and the sunny hair
Cut close from the golden head.

"Don't cry," she said—and the words were few,
Feeling more than she could act out—
"You won't have to work and be tired so
When there ain't so many of us."

But the dear little daughter who went away
From the home that for once was pitied, showed the mother's heart, from that deeper day,
What a place she had always filled.

The Bethlehem Story.

About six miles south of Jerusalem, on the road to Hebron, a gray ridge of limestone runs east and west for about a mile. Its northern and southern slopes are steep, and, in many parts, terraced for the cultivation of the fig, the vine, and the olive. These terraces sweep round the hill, like great steps in a gigantic staircase, leading up to the little village which crowns the crest, and bringing up to it, from fertile plain and sunny slope, corn, and wine, and oil, in such rich profusion as to give it the happy name of Bethlehem—the Home of Bread. That quiet height on the hill is enshrined in great and glowing memories. It is the city of David, for he was born there, and when a boy, played in its streets, and wandered among its terraces, and explored its hills and vales, and sealed its cliffs, and with sling and stone frightened the eagles, and killed the kites, and when he returned hot and dusty from a long day's ramble among these eastern hills, and exploration of their lonely caves, oh, the delight and the refreshment of a long, deep draught from the well beside the gate. When a lad, he fed his father's flocks among these hills, and in their solitudes he smote the lion and the bear, and their rocks first echoed back the strains of those sweet songs whose heavenly melody has ever since been ringing in the human heart. And it has glories greater than these. There the Word was made flesh. There the Bread of Life, of which if a man eat he shall never die, came down from heaven. That little village became, through the great mystery of godliness unfolded there, storehouse of spiritual food for a famishing world, the Bethlehem of the human race. How this took place the Scripture informs us. Joseph, a carpenter who lived in Nazareth, a village in the far north, had come to Bethlehem because the Roman Emperor had ordered a census of Palestine to be taken. He and his wife, though their lot was so lowly, were both descended from David, the great king of Israel, and this was why they had to go to the city of David to be taxed.

The journey was made in easy stages, and was not unpleasant, for it took place at that sweet season when it is a delight to be abroad in the green fields and sunny air. This is perhaps the most pleasant season in the Holy Land. Then the gentle breezes, wandering over budding vineyards, thymy slopes and flowery fields, whisper whence they stole their fragrance, and from rocks and groves the voice of the turtle blends with the songs of birds as they vie with each other in their blithesome welcome of spring. Through scenes like these Joseph and Mary journeyed southward till they came to Bethlehem. There was none to receive them when they arrived, for though the best blood of Israel ran in their veins, they were neither rich nor famous. As the foungers at the gate watched the new arrivals they little thought that the present stir up and down through all the Roman Empire had taken place for the express purpose of bringing these two to Bethlehem at that particular time. Little did the keeper of the khan imagine what majesty was seeking housero om at his door, what high honor was being pressed upon him with all the importunity of nature's neediest hour. He lost his opportunity. The claims of his first-come guests could not be set aside by the pleadings of this poor carpenter and the piteous necessities of his wife, and sad at heart and full of fear, Joseph was thankful when for his weary wife he found shelter in the stable. Soon the daylight faded and the darkness fell. As the night wore on the unusual bustle in the streets grew less and less. House after house was wrapped in darkness, till at last all was still, and over the neighboring heights the stars hung out their silvery lamps like guardian signals over a sleeping world. But on these hills were humble shepherds watching their flocks from prowling thieves and ravening wolves. Around them the stillness of the balmy air was still more profound than in the streets of Bethlehem. The droning flight of a passing insect, or the nibbling of a wakeful lamb could be distinctly heard. But in the twinkling of an eye all was changed. As by a flash of lightning night was lost in bright, mysterious day. Full in the heavenly radiance of that light they beheld an angel form, clothed in a majesty that cast them to the ground, and filled their hearts with fear. But he spake to them in tones of love, and gave them a message of peace: "Fear not, for I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all the people, for there is born to you this day, in the city of David, a Saviour which is Christ the Lord, and this is the sign unto you—ye shall find a babe wrapped in swaddling clothes lying in a manger." This he spake, and when he ceased the pent up music of heaven rained down upon their ravished ears. The radiant glory melted into song, and all the hills resounded with the strain, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will towards men." Oh, the ineffable delight of that overpowering melody! It thrilled their souls with a rapture so deep, so pure, so strong, so sweet, that whether in the body or out of the body, they could not tell. But only for a little while did the full chorus of Christ's body-guard burst upon their ears. All too soon, the bright forms ascended to their fair home and their ceaseless praise before the throne of God. Upward, still upward did the glory float; fainter and fainter fell the music, till at last all was hushed and all was dark. The most glorious and most gracious manifestation of angelic praise was only a holy and blessed memory. But when the shepherds came to themselves they remembered the words of the angel, and said one to another "Let us go to Bethlehem, and see this thing which is come to pass which the Lord hath made known to us." Leaving their flocks, they hastened to the village, they hurried through the streets towards the khan, and seeing a light in the stable, they entered and found the sign the angel spoke of: "A babe wrapped in swaddling clothes lying in a manger," and by that sign they recognized the Savior. In helpless infancy and spotless innocence, the Christ, the Lord, the glory of Israel, the light of the Gentiles, the King of angels, the Son of God, lay in a manger For the angelic vision faded, they have found Immanuel—God with us. Incomparable mystery! Unfathomable love! Well may all whose eyes and hearts are open to them bow before that babe in grateful adoration and profoundest reverence.—*A. B. Mackay, D. PUTNAM.—At Cartwright, Wis., Jan. 9, 1887, Elder Wm. B. Putnam, aged 79 years and 5 months.

His health had been failing for the last two years, so that he had been unable to preach much, only holding services on some extra occasions. The sickness proving fatal dated back three months or more. He leaves a wife and six children to mourn his loss.

Elder Putnam was born Aug 8, 1807, in the town of Bradford, Orange Co., Vt., and resided there during his early life. Was married to Miss Esther Brown, a lady of fine qualities of mind and more than common ability. In 1836 he came to Chicago as it then was, new, and much of the land a swamp, and though he took up some land, he only remained a year when he returned to his family in Vermont. In some of these years, the writer does not know the exact date, he was converted to the doctrine of the second coming of Christ as taught by Brother Miller. In 1845 he again came west and located on Rock Prairie, Wis. But disposing of his new farm he is found moving up to the pinery on the Wisconsin River, seventy-five miles above Stephen's Point. In this wilderness—his family containing the first white women there—our brother now constructs a dam across the noble stream and builds a saw mill. The name of this place was called Merrill, but since been known as Warren's Mills. For some twelve years he remained in this place, making his lumbering a successful enterprise. Disposing of his property here he moves to the Chippewa Valley, in 1857, and settled on a small stream called Elk Creek. But few white people had found their way into this country yet, and the fondness of these people for religious meetings caused them to go many miles to get together for worship. Many of these meetings were held in private houses, and, in some instances school houses, if there were any convenient.

But another question had to be settled. Who should feed the flock? There were one or two at this time who had officiated in this place, but a great want was felt. Our deceased brother was induced to try this work. He made the effort, his first subject being the "Kingdom." The brother made a success and the Lord blessed his effort. The meetings were held in the several towns joining each other. One of these was Bloomer, this being the place where he first enlisted in this great work, where he first commenced to do battle for the Lord. We mention this town as the brother was wont to allude to it as the Old Battle Ground where he began his work. In answer to the question of pay he used to say, "The gospel was free, without money and without price." He seemed to be an hireling, but looked for his pay later as we shall see.

Thus for years our brother traveled over these prairies in winter's cold and summer's heat to publish this free gospel, and the glorious news of a soon-coming King, and like one of old he labored with his hands for his and his family's support that he might not be chargeable. One would suppose that the brother's discourses would have suffered for want of study, there being so much of his time occupied in plowing and sowing, or in other words, the common duties of the farm; but to the contrary, he showed himself to be "a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth."

ANOTHER MOVE.

Thinking to better his condition, our brother changes his location from Elk Creek to Bloomer, and at that point at one time not his deeds be remembered in the coming day? "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of my brethren, ye have done it unto me." His last illness was long and very distressing, but he bore his sufferings with remarkable patience. He did not regard death as a friend, but an enemy, and struggled against him as long as possible, but surrendered at last as all mortals must excepting those faithful ones who shall be alive when the great Life Giver comes. Elder Miles, of Wolcot, N. Y., being here, preached the funeral discourse, and our father was laid away in the silent grave to await the dawning of the great awakening day.

Four score years he lived,
The doer of many worthy deeds.
A cheerful face he always wore,
Which we, alas! shall see no more.
He careful was not to complain,
And give unnecessary pain.
That generous heart has ceased to beat;
Those kindly words no more will greet
His children and grand children's ears,
Who are left still in this vale of tears.

WAIT.—At Edinborough, Erie Co., Pa., Dec. 16, 1886, Adin Wait, aged 80 years, 11 months and 4 days.

He was born in Genesee Co., N. Y., Jan. 9, 1806. His parents moved to Fredonia, Chautauqua Co., N. Y., when he was quite young. In 1827 he married Phoebe Austin, by whom he had ten children, four of whom still live. In 1849 he moved to Washington Tp., Erie Co., Pa., living on a farm several years, and finally moved into the little village of Edinborough, where he continued to reside till the time of his death. He survived his wife over a year, who died Sept. 16th, 1885. His parents, who were Presbyterians, had the ceremony of sprinkling performed upon him when he was a babe, but it does not appear to have been any advantage, as he never made a public profession of religion, and finally adopted a very different faith from that taught in the catechism, a faith which denies the immortality of the soul, the endless existence of the dead in hell fire, etc., and affirms that immortality is the gift of God through Jesus Christ. In a word he became in belief what is called an "Adventist," but was never baptized. However, his house was open for the entertainment of the preachers of that faith, who found there a hearty welcome and a hospitable home. Many persons of that faith have often been fed from his bountiful table, and many times has he hitched up his team and taken loads of persons to hear that kind of preaching; also he gave of his substance to help support the preachers. When the church house was to be built he contributed liberally toward the expenses and was a great help in the enterprise. Will

"IF THE FOUNDATION BE REMOVED."

Could I but think
There is no powerful, careful guiding hand,
To guard us as we hang upon the brink
Of imminent destruction, I could stand
Aghast with terror at the very thought,
To what a pass we're brought.

Could I but know
That nonsense force had thrown out all this frame
Of shining worlds, and whirling let them go
To wreck them in the ruin whence they came,
And we as aimless maggots for a time
Breed in earth's slime.

Then farewell hope,
And truth, and right, and joy, and peace, And love,
In foul Egyptian darkness here we grope,
Engulphing floods beneath and clouds above,
Our requiem piping in the tempest's scream,
And Force supreme.

It cannot be,
Still the poised magnet of the heart holds true.
And through the rifts in battling clouds I see
Beams of eternal promise shining through.
Distinct I hear amid the tempest's noise,
The still small voice.

Ye dotard fools,
That pore o'er theology in a microscope,
And build "cosmogonies" of "cells" and rules,
Without a Ruler and without a hope;
The lessons that your vision hath confused
Hath made you blind.

WILL THE DEAD EMERGE FROM THE GRAVE IMMORTAL?—No. 3.

A Discussion in which Carrie Williams affirms they will, and the Editor denies—claiming the dead will emerge Mortal and be Judged before they receive Immortality.

I must again give a little time to your second rejoinder before proceeding in my regular line of argument.

I. I will observe that according to our best authorities, and the universally accepted use of terms, I referred to Sacred History as the Bible,—to Profane History, all aside from that. If mortal resurrection is mentioned in either the one, or the other; why do you not at once give chapter and verse—book—author—page etc., and not continue to circumnavigate the point at issue, to the utter bewilderment of those who are seeking to know the truth.

I seek neither support nor consolation from profane history for the position I hold to on resurrection, for I am abundantly sustained in it, by the word of the living God. In Acts xxiv. 15, R. V. Paul says: "Having hope toward God, which these also themselves accept, that there shall be a resurrection both of the just, and the unjust." This text does not say whether the unjust shall be raised mortal or immortal, neither does any text in the Word that I have yet found. But Paul, in speaking of those who are asleep in Christ says; they shall be raised incorruptable, 1 Cor. xv. 5, 2.

2. Mr. W. You desire that I should confine myself to Scripture language. It is all-sufficient for me. And I request you to refrain from unscriptural phrases in the future. There is nothing said in the Word, of Christ "emerging" from the tomb and afterwards undergoing a process of "immortalization." It is all unfounded and absurd presumption, thus to pervert the plain teachings of revelation. Christ gave up his mortal life, rather than deny his paternity.

He became the Son of God with the power of an endless life, when he came forth from the grave. To assume that he was a second time endowed with mortal life, is to deny the witness that God has given us of his Son. Your readers must see, that you can here do nothing to defend your position, and hence you fly off to the two classes. You say many emerged from the grave before Christ. Who were they? Was there any called forth from the corruption of the grave but Lazarus? It was not prophesied of Lazarus that he should be declared to be the Son of God with power (the power of an endless life) by, or through a resurrection from the dead. It was so prophesied of Christ, and that word was fulfilled when he came forth from the tomb. I did not, nor do I deny that "is risen" is from the Greek egeiro. Why do you try to make believe I did? All you say on this point has nothing whatever to do with the case in hand.

In 1 Cor. xv. 20, we learn: "But now hath Christ been raised (egeiro) from the dead, the first fruits of them that are asleep." Here we have a positive assertion from Paul, that Christ was raised from the dead, not from a "lower nature" and that fact constituted him the firstfruits of them that are asleep. These Scriptures you cannot neutralize by your vain speculation. Please give your readers one example from out of the Book, where the word "egeiro" refers to the growth or ascension from a lower to a higher nature.

3. Sir, what do you mean by saying "it is not a question of words?" Are not words signs of our ideas? If words have no true definite signification, why do we acknowledge standard authority as to their use?

Now though I believe every intelligent reader must understand Paul's address in Acts xiii. I will once more revert to it. He presented these facts. 1. Christ was at his birth raised up or manifested to the children of the prophets. 2. That he was raised from the dead into that incorruptible condition wherein the promises made to David, might be fulfilled in him. And these promises reached out into the eternal future. This is the gist of the second prophecy. Now Sir; I ask you, Could the promise made to David of a deathless heir to his throne have been fulfilled in Christ while in a mortal condition? You and your readers must see, unless you are willfully blind that it was his resurrection from the dead that placed him in that position. The third prophecy refers to the fact that he was taken out of the death state before corruption had taken hold of him.

The sixth proposition I have made perfectly plain and need not reiterate.

4. Yes, I say the word "for," in John xx. 17 has not the sense of because; it has the sense of "verily" according to Young. The sentence is complete. It requires no connective to unite it with what follows. The word "Touch" signifies to hold on, to embrace, (See Young) which only confirms the thought I first expressed, i. e. Jesus wanted no delay, in getting the glad news to his disciples. While he was with them, he told them what he had to endure—his humiliation, his sufferings, his death, also of his resurrection and ascension. When he talked with Mary, he had passed through all save his ascension. He said to her, Touch me not, do not take hold of me. Verily I have not ye ascended. I am still with you. Go to my brethren and say to them, I ascend, or go up to my Father, etc. Tell them that this last which was told of me shall be fulfilled even as all that came to me before. This is the plain Scriptural exegesis of the subject.

5. The word "anabaino" translated ascend, has nowhere the sense of changing from a lower to a higher nature. It is an unwarranted assumption. Readers, please look up the texts to which I referred in my previous articles on the subject. See also Luke v. 19, where the same word anabaino is rendered went upon, "They went up on the housetop," etc. Now Mr. W., give as many texts to prove your position as I have to prove the truth, or else surrender this point.

Rom. viii. 11, presents no difficulty. Dear readers please turn and read carefully this chapter. See there is no mention of resurrection, no reference to it till verse 17. Paul is herein contrasting two conditions of mind—the carnal mind and the mind of Christ, or the spirit, he shows the insufficiency of the Law, and the all-sufficiency of accepting Christ by faith, and living in his spirit. Then in verse 11. But if the spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead (not the lower nature) dwell in you, he that raised up Christ Jesus from the dead shall quicken, i. e, preserve your mortal bodies by his spirit that dwelleth in you. The word zoopoieo here rendered quicken, signifies "to give or preserve life." To say that it here means to give another mortal life, after the resurrection, is to do fearful violence to the plain, and united testimony of the Word. To accept it as the sense demands—"to preserve your mortal bodies," all is clear as noonday. We have many promises, many assurances of God's watch-care over us, if we abide in Christ. In this sense he preserves our mortal bodies, by or through his spirit that dwelleth in us.

I now again turn to 1 Cor. xv.

The first stone in this pyramid is,—"Thou foolish one, that which thou thyself sowest is not quickened except it die: and that which thou sowest thou sowest not the body that shall be, but a bare grain, it may chance of wheat or of some other kind, but God giveth it a body even as it pleased him, and to each seed a body of its own." 1 Cor. xv. 36, 37, 38. Our best lexicographers define the word sow (and sown is but the past participle of the verb sow) "to scatter as seed upon the earth, to plant by strewing, to plant in any way." They define plant, "to put in the ground and cover as seed for growth."

Although Paul addressed the Corinthians, personified as a "foolish one," he did not thereby indicate that their folly consisted in a lack of agricultural knowledge, for this he well knew they possessed. He referred to the fact that they questioned God's power. They knew that what they sowed, was not quickened except it died. It was necessary that the life principle should be put in the ground—sown—for unless there be a life principle in grain it cannot be quickened into a new form of the same life. The first new form of the life that appears is the upper sprout,—then the lower sprout. The bare grain sown gives all its substance to these sprouts at which stage of growth the old grain as such, is dead, having been quickened into a new form of life. But note, it is precisely the same kind of life i. e., a perishable life. Does Paul here leave the Corinthians to suppose that all this is the work of chance or that there is no fixed law to rule and govern these things? Nay verily. On this first stone he lays down the principle he is trying to establish in their minds, viz: the Almighty power of Jehovah, and therefore he says, "but God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to each seed a body of its own,"—the same kind previously that was sown, put into the ground and covered up; then resolved into sprouts—roots, rootlets, stalks, blades, heads, blossom in the heads, then in the milky condition; and finally, the perfect solid ripe grain precisely the same as that which was sown. "To each seed a body of its own" (kind). Wheat does not produce barley neither does oats produce rye. This is the work of God. Can you not see, that in all this there is wisdom and power infinite? This is Paul's reasoning.

The Corinthians well knew, and so do we, that all through this long process there was no absolute cessation of life. Life was transferred from the grain to the sprout and so on all through the whole process. So that if Paul thought to illustrate the resurrection by grain sowing or raising, he made a sad mistake; for instead of that, he clearly illustrated the doctrine of "transmigration of souls"—and hence the immortality of the soul. Transmigration teaches that the soul is continually passing from one state of existence to another. Mr. W., are you willing to admit all this? You are compelled, either to take the whole or else admit that Paul is only illustrating God's power. "God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him." Jehovah's power equals his pleasure. With this divine seal Paul indelibly stamps the first stone in this grand pyramid, and then goes on with the structure, with this same thought in mind, i. e. that all the wonderful unfoldings of nature, are but manifestations of God's power. "All flesh is not the same flesh," 1 Cor. xv. 39, second stone "there is one flesh of men," third stone, "there is another flesh of the beasts," fourth stone, "and another flesh of birds," fifth stone, "and another of fishes." What did Paul introduce these several manifestations of living power for, so nearly alike, and yet so widely different that each kind is adapted to its own peculiar species, if not to show that they were all the work of an Omnipotent hand?

Sixth stone "there are also celestial bodies," seventh stone "and bodies terrestrial." Here again Paul shows that these two kinds of bodies are respectively adapted to separate existences. One to a heavenly, or a superior, and the other to an earthly or inferior life. Why Paul did you call their attention to these things? To illustrate his power in yet another unfolding of his great work. It is all of him, all that we behold is "as it pleased him." His power equals his pleasure. (The other stones will follow in due time).

EDITOR'S REPLY.

1. Mrs. W. says that by "Sacred History" she means the Bible, and by "Profane History," all aside from that. "Her question in her last letter was: "Why is there no mention of mortal resurrection in church history, either sacred or profane." Now putting this question and the definition of terms together, we have from Mrs. W. a declaration that mortal resurrection is not "mentioned" in the Bible; and not in history till the nineteenth century. As our friend has ceased seeking support and consolation in "profane history," and taken our advice, viz: keep to the Law and Testimony, to this we will confine ourselves, and we cannot do better than examine the first text Mrs. W. gives, Acts xxiv. 15. "There shall be a resurrection both of the just and the unjust. Now Mrs. W., your text says that there shall be a resurrection of the unjust. Is this a "mention" of mortal resurrection, or not? You are bound to answer yes, therefore why did you say that there was no mention of mortal resurrection in the Bible? Now answer this, or admit your mistake frankly. Daniel xii. 2, says some shall awake to shame and contempt. Is this a "mention" of mortal resurrection? Jesus says, John v. 28, 29, All that are in their graves shall hear his voice, and some forth "" they that have done evil unto a resurrection of damnation." Is this a mention of mortal resurrection? Lazarus was raised from the dead, Jno. xi. 23, 25, 44. Is this a mention of mortal resurrection?

2. I have not expressed a desire that Mrs. W. confine herself to Scripture language. She may use what terms she pleases providing they convey the ideas expressed in the Scriptures. To fuss about using the exact words merely, is what many do who ignore the real teachings of the Word; and thus they "strain at a gnat and swallow a camel." Mrs. W. complains of my using the word emerge, because it is not Scripture language, but this is childish. The word emerge means to come forth, and the Savior says, "All that are in their graves shall hear his voice and come forth." "Undergoing a process of immortalization," is a phrase of Mrs. W's. own invention; We never used it, and our friend's clumsy use of it only serves her "utter bewilderment." Yes Mrs. W., once more you stumble into the truth, when you say that Jesus was the Son of God with the power of an endless life, when he came forth from the grave." This however is not in harmony with what you have started out to prove, viz: that the dead emerge from the grave immortal. If Jesus emerged or came forth from the tomb immortal, he had the power of an endless life before he came forth, whereas you now have it that he became immortal when he came forth. My statement that many emerged from the grave before Christ, is challenged. What a bad memory Mrs. W. must have. She is challenging her own statement. Turn, my friend, to the last part of your first article.

You say there: "Others, many others, had been raised to mortal corruptible life."

You say now, "Who were they? Was there any called forth from the corruption of the grave but Lazarus?

In your last letter you say:—"Before entering upon the ground indicated in my last, I wish to call attention to a few items you failed to notice.

1. Why there is no mention of mortal resurrection in church history, either sacred or profane.

Now Mrs. W., if as you say there is no mention of mortal resurrection in church history, either sacred, by which you say you mean the Bible, or profane, by which you mean all history outside the Bible, then how did you discover that "others, many others, had been raised to mortal corruptible life"—referring to those who were raised before Christ? A witness trying to bolster up a bad case, must have an extraordinary good memory, if he does not entangle himself in the meshes of his own fabrication.

Mrs. W. does not read carefully, or she would not say that I tried to make believe that she denied the words "is risen" are from egeiro. If she will look again she will find that what I said was that she had "passed unnoticed" the fact, and she evidently had, for it is noticeable that she has no more to say on the words "is risen" as proof that Jesus was immortalized when they were uttered by the angel. In her straits she mutters: "All you say on this point has nothing whatever to do with the case in hand."—A very forcible argument(?). Our friend continually quotes the expression "Christ was raised from the dead" and adds, "not from a lower nature." Why does she say this? Do you, Mrs. W., deny that Christ was raised from a lower to a higher nature? Was he not first, sin's flesh, lower nature? Did he not ascend from that to the divine (higher) nature? Does not Paul in treating of the resurrection in the very chapter you quote from say that the natural (lower nature) is first, and afterwards that which is spiritual—higher nature? We can but pity our friend, to see how she runs beyond herself in her utter bewilderment." Still we are not without hope, because bewilderment is the experience of every one, when they find the old shattered ship in which they have for years been tossed about, sinking beneath them. If our friend will but keep presence of mind enough to take a sure step into the life boat, we shall rejoice, and give God the glory.

3. Mrs. W. asks: "What do you mean by saying it is not a question of words?" Look again my friend and see if you have quoted me correctly. My statement is that "it is not a question of mere words." Why do you leave out the important little word mere, and then make so much ado about words being "signs of ideas?"

4. Finding that her invention, that Jesus forbade Mary to touch him "lest she be overcome by her feelings" will not do, our friend now says as we said, that the whole thing, as far as Jno. xx. 17 is concerned hinges upon the meaning of the words "for I am not yet ascended." So now she claims that the Savior meant that he had not made his bodily ascent to heaven. Why should he desire Mary to go and tell the disciples that he had not gone to heaven when he would be with them about forty days before his ascension? Why we ask, send Mary to tell them, I ascend to heaven, when he would be with them to be seen and handled, and for them to witness his ascent? Is it not evident to any candid mind that when Jesus said, "Go and tell my brethren * * I ascend unto my Father" that the ascent here spoken of would take place before he would see his brethren himself? Therefore we argue, that as he did not go to heaven before he saw his brethren, the ascent could not have been to heaven, but to the Father nature.

5. It has been claimed by our friend that the use of the word anabaino rendered ascend, is confined to a bodily change of places from a lower to a higher. She says (see p. 227) "By reference I find * * every instance where the word occurs, it refers to some certain definite object changing places, changing from a lower to a higher place." It is evident that one friend's "reference" was not very thorough, or she would not have made such a reckless statement. I said last month, that I claimed no more for the word anabaino than I did for the word ascend, and gave instances where the latter is used in the sense claimed for the former. Now let us see if the word anabaino is not used in other parts of Scripture just as I have claimed it is in Jno. xx. 17; and also if Mrs. W. is correct in the above statement. "Why do thoughts arise in your hearts?" Luke xxiv. 38 The word arise, in the foregoing is from the same word as ascend is in Jno. xx. 17. Now Mrs. W., just show us your "definite object changing places" in this case. "And the thorns grew up," Mark iv. 7; "But when it is sown it groweth up" (ver. 32). What "definite object changing places" is there here? Suppose this read "And the thorns ascended," would you conclude that there was a removal of the thorns and the mustard seed from one place to another? Do you not see that the growing up or ascending in these cases is not a change of places, but a growth or ascension from a low state to a higher state, and that the ascension is within the thing itself? The same word is rendered spring up, Matt. xiii. 7; and sprang up in Mar. iv. 8. In Rev. xi. 12 we have the word occurring twice, rendered come up and ascend; and the ascension is thus arising, not from a lower place to a higher, but an ascension of the "two witnesses" to power. John symbolically, was (and will be in reality) the subject of ascension just as Jesus was, Rev. iv. 1. He saw a door open in heaven (the new heaven wherein will dwell righteousness, 3 Pet. iii. 13,) and he heard a voice "which said, Come up hither." ("Ascend hither," Diaglott).

Now in what sense did John ascend symbolically? and in what sense will he ascend really? His answer is: "Immediately I was in spirit." When John with all the worthy ones shall be invited to "ascend up hither," they will "immediately" (in a moment in the twinkling of an eye) be in spirit nature, by being raised spiritual bodies, by being changed in a moment in the twinkling of an eye, or by being made "partakers of the divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust." This was the ascension of which Jesus was the subject between the time he commanded Mary to tell his brethren "I ascend to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God," and the time he met his brethren himself.

There is little else calling for reply this month. The make-shift to which Mrs. W. resorts to evade the force of Paul's words in Rom. viii. 11 only shows what human nature will do to evade the truth. That Paul promised the brethren that the spirit would "preserve" their mortal bodies is so absurd, and so directly opposed to the teachings of the Scriptures that it scarcely needs notice. Still we will give it the attention it deserves in our next. As to the stones Mrs. W. is getting from 1 Cor. xv. she reminds one of little children building toy houses. We think now the way will be open for getting into that chapter in our next.

THE COMING AGE,

—ITS—

Nature and Proximity.

—By J. P. WESTHEM —

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with enhanced ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are inquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar events, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, following careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the COMING AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand is the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

Selections

AN APPEAL TO THE CHILDREN OF GOD SCATTERED ABROAD.

We have, in the judgment of the writer, reached the "last days" and the "perilous times" painted in such a graphic manner by Paul in his 2d letter to Timothy, chap. iii. We are on the threshold of that greatest day so solemnly and impressively portrayed by the Lord in Joel, when "the powers of heaven shall be shaken, and men's hearts failing them for fear, as they look on the things which are coming on the earth." Luke xxi. 25, 26. The visible churches are languishing and perishing; superstition and rationalism holding divided dominion—a form of godliness without the power—while in the world at large atheism is rampant, and profligacy abounding. There was a man of God nearly two thousand years ago, who, in the midst of a great argument, broke out in this manner:

And that, knowing the time, that now it is high time to awake out of sleep: for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed. The night is far spent, the day is at hand: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armor of light," Rom. xiii. 11, 12. The great man had long enjoyed the fulness of life Divine in communion with God, but was hastening on to the greater salvation; to the presence of the Lord Jesus; to the bloom and blessedness of immortality; to the glories and triumphs of the everlasting kingdom. It was not necessary that even inspired men should know the whole mind of God. The season for manifestation in perfect glory was hidden in the prerogatives of God, whose wisdom comprehends, with unerring unity and infallibility, the beginning and the end. But still the language of Paul was true on the large reckoning. The greater part of the awful night was for ages in store. It has been a long night of blasphemy and profaneness, of crime, sin, and suffering, of spiritual disease, and spiritual darkness; but to-day was at hand. O precious coast if so, how much nearer are we to the supreme sunrise, to the revelation of that day sublime for which all the shadows flee away.

Peter is one with Paul in his use of the fine image. He sees a secret people of the pilgrim order walking by lamp-light in a dusky place, waiting for Divine splendor; declaring the dawning of the golden day, and the rising of the day star in each believing heart.

Now, if we look for such things, where are we standing? Suppose that this very day, or this very night, the Lord himself should descend from heaven with a shout—with the voice of the Archangel and the trumpet of God—how many of us are ready? Would it be the glorious meal of life and transport; or the loathsome and desolation—a horror which cannot be spoken?

It is surely certainty which we all need to work in the secondary matters of this life. We desire and contribute we look carefully after the title deeds of our homes and fields; and our marriage vows and covenants with men have to be guaranteed by proper witnesses; the rights of house and land and press are all fenced and guarded by proper securities. Our greatest concern should be our greatest certainty. Are we standing in a right relation to God for time and for eternity? Are we constitutionally in a condition of Sonship, enjoying the undeniable witness of the Holy Spirit, having established fellowship with the Father and with the Son, and being heirs of all the property of God?

Beware lest any man dream of security in the midst of ruin and destruction, for the churches give an uncertain sound, and men known not how to prepare for the battle. We have to come back as wondering and believing children to the documents of God, where we can hear the voice of absolute truth.

Feeling deeply our responsibility before God, let us bring the matter to a direct issue. It is quite common in these days of confusion for a number of minds to be practically over hardened, that they may live utterly in God. The position is a safe one; but it is the safety of superstition, and so becomes fearful. In the light of Divine revelation such a situation has a horror of great darkness brooding over it. Such gloom, such fears, and miseries were utterly unknown to Apostolic times; passionate prayers were under conviction of sin, found freedom and life in quite early centuries. On the great day of Pentecost, when the church first came into existence, "there shall we do?" Those days from Abraham were very significant: Repent, and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ for the remission of sin, and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit," Acts ii. 38. On that very day three thousand souls found Divine forgiveness and life in coming through the appointed path of God—the baptism of washing of regeneration. In like manner Saul, directed to Damascus to learn the will of God, hears the message of God through Ananias. And now why tarriest thou? arise and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord;" in the manner his burden and blindness passed away, forgiveness was realized, and he was filled with the Holy Spirit. The ancient ordinances, whereby men were planted in the spiritual kingdom of God, were restored to its right place in the churches, or the wrath of God will descend with fierce retributions of the unfaithful. We have to be buried with the Lord by baptism into his death—devoting ourselves to death as he did—that we may rise first, into the beauty of holiness; and, second, into the practice of immortality—Rom. vi. Hence we can then express with the voice of power—"Let us draw near with a true heart in the full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience and our bodies washed with pure water." Heb. x. 22. Christ loved the church and gave himself for it, that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the Word; that he might present it to himself a glorious church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing, but that it should be holy and without blemish," Eph. v. 25-27. In the spiritual new creature all stand complete before God, run over by blood and washed with water. It is by not beginning at Jerusalem that so few people appreciate the witness of the Holy Spirit as the seal of our present acceptance in the Beloved, and our earnest of future glory. This great revival belongs essentially to Sonship. If we men become Sons—as we "learn in ancient days, and might be well known now, if men would read with open eyes the Word of God: "Ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ," Gal. iii. 26, 27. Hence to such persons it could be said: "And because ye are Sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father." Gal. iv. 6. So the ancients formed a peculiar family—supernatural and divine, where the rich man and the poor man, the master and the slave, the Jew, the Greek, and the Barbarian, found themselves one. All earthly distinction disappeared, and the brotherhood of eternity stood manifest in the fatherhood of God. It is indeed certainty which we all need; and as the seal of God can only follow the accomplished reality of Sonship, we must come back with the simplicity of children to the pure testimonies of the Divine Record. Following the inspired men who laid the old foundations of the house of God, which is the pillar and ground of the truth. In such a manner we arrive at the Rock of Ages, and the ground is no longer shaken under our feet.

Now, dear ones, who are thirsting after God, let there be a genuine revival. We may not conceal from you that modern revivals find no favor in our eyes. The old superstitions are always held fast, especially that worst one of the Ritualism of the babe in the great names of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit—a profane, unauthorized, unhallowed proceeding, without foundation in reason or revelation, and the prince of all false life.

How a revival can be lost or accomplished for human weal and the glory of God is beautifully set forth in Ezra and Nehemiah:—

I. The people were called to fasting and prayer both by the river of Ahava, and likewise in the Holy land, confessing and deploring their sins, and earnestly seeking light and counsel from the Most High.

II. They solemnly gathered as unity to hear the eminent Scribe read the holy law of God, which had fallen into neglect. From morning to midday the law was read, and they were caused to understand the meaning. Hence the Temple Service began to shine out clear, and the distinguishing ordinances of adoption were honored, such as the Feast of Tabernacles and Passover—great chaunels of blessedness and life.

III. They were called upon to put away all their foreign wives and all the filthiness of the land, that there might be a godly seed and a sanctified people.

IV. Then they renewed their Covenant with God, confessing with the heart, and subscribing with the hand, to be a holy people, keeping all the commandments of the Lord. The ways of God are everlasting. It is substantially in this way only that we can abide out as a recovered people, prepared to rebuild the temple of the glorious one—the Jehovah of Israel and of the race. Only in such a fashion can we accomplish a Godly Revival, and prepare a people for the glorious appearing of our great God and Savior.

In no fanatical movement, or excitement of the flesh, can we render any true service to humanity or do anything for the name and honor of the most high God. As we have indicated, all the foundations must be laid in truth, intelligence, and holiness unto the Lord. Plans must be perfected—resources secured, and the entire renunciation of all the evil traditions of men. In the midst of such a searching work all counsel for daily walk will follow by spiritual necessity. Now then, beloved ones! in whatever street of modern Babylon you happen to live at present, arise out of slumber! "Awake thou that sleepest, arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." Put on the armor of righteousness and of God, and fight right onward to the City of God, and the kingdom of his glory. We are all in a heavenly condition, far away from the central splendor and the fountain head of Power Divine; but there is no reason why we should have such leanness and poverty of soul. We want more piety from the countenance of the Father; more power from the Holy Spirit in the inner man; more manifestation from the Divine and most honorable Son; and all are waiting that we may besiege the Eternal Throne, and then the river of the highest life will flow down in the midst of us. As we seek and find the good old ways God will reveal his majesty, his holiness, and his glory in two places where we gather for worship, with great signs and tokens of his presence.

*This paper was written by the late George Storrs, and a few days before his death he requested that the MS. should be printed and circulated among the various religious bodies.

ATONEMENT.*

In what sense is the death of Christ an atonement for sin, and why is he called the "Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world?" Questions of deepest moment gather around the doctrine of Atonement—a doctrine which has been sometimes so handled as to repel and drive many away, not only from the cross, but from the crucified Savior. The following questions and answers are here suggested in the hope of presenting this doctrine in a light which is at once Spiritual and reasonable, and in harmony with those other great truths concerning the Christ of God and our relations with him which are embodied in the words "Incarnation" and "Regeneration," with which the doctrine of atonement is inseparably connected. When we speak of atonement we speak of an act of reconciliation by means of which man is brought back to God. But in order to understand this doctrine we must admit the following facts.

First. That sin had cut us off from eternal life in God.

Secondly. That the sentence, "Thou shalt die," is not an arbitrary decree, but a moral necessity.

Thirdly. That in order "to save man's soul alive," sin must be put away and death overcome: death can not be avoided; "it is appointed unto men once to die."

The atonement is for the putting away of sin and the overcoming of death. "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world, "The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all;" and, "I will ransom them from the power of the grave;" "O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction." The words point to Christ as the Sacrifice for sin, and as the Ransom from the grave. But it is urged, and very truly, that God freely forgives all who repent and trust in his mercy. John's baptism, for instance, was a baptism of repentance unto remission of sins.

QUESTION. What further need is there, then, for any atonement for the remission of sins?

ANSWER Because of death; death as a moral necessity following upon sin, cannot be removed by the will of the Almighty, unless he remove at the same time the law of sin and death.

Q. What, then, is meant by forgiveness, if it be not the removal of the punishment?

A. Forgiveness is the disposition of God towards the sinner. When God forgives, he does remove the punishment. He provided salvation through the slain Lamb from the foundation of the world. God did not love the world because Christ died; but Christ died because God so loved the world

Q. But does not God pardon sin repentance without the shedding of blood?

A. He does; but that does not make Christ unnecessary as man's salvation. Through this line of precedent until you the forgiveness of sins, neither is there salvation in any other; for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved."

Q. On what, then, does man's salvation rest; on his repentance and trust in God's mercy, or on the death of Christ?

A. On both. Without repentance and faith Christ's death is void; without Christ's death, repentance and faith are void.

Q. But you say God forgives when men do not know Christ, as in the old dispensation?

A. Yes; but not without Christ. They may not know how they are saved. The sinking man does not always know how he was rescued, or who rescued him. So those who are saved by God's mercy will find that all the glory thereof is due to the Lamb of God, who hath redeemed them by his blood.

Q. Why, then, do you preach Christ, and the doctrine of faith in his atonement, if men can be saved equally without the knowledge of it?

A. It does not follow that because many may be saved without knowing Christ, that many more are not saved through knowing him who would otherwise be lost. The preaching of the cross of Christ is a manifestation of the great love of God, and is "the power of God unto salvation unto everyone that believeth."

Q. This much I can allow; nevertheless, cannot God forgive and save through Christ without our being called upon to believe your horrible doctrine of a human sacrifice? Can we not interpret the cross as the power which draws men to God by virtue of its moral application as a manifestation of love?

A. Yes, as a manifestation of love, indeed; but, remember, the death of Christ would be no manifestation of love if it were not also a manifestation of salvation. The love consists in the saving. Your dying would be no proof of love to your friends if it did them no good. We can understand how love is ready to lay down its life for its friends, and greater love hath no man than this. But why? because they are benefited thereby. We cannot imagine anyone delivering himself up to violent death on purpose to be killed, and expecting that his friend will see in the mere fact of his doing so a proof of his love! But we can well imagine, and often witness, one life sacrificed for the life of another.

Q. But can you imagine that the death of an innocent man does save the guilty in any other way than by this example of submission and obedience to the will of God? Can you imagine God having any satisfaction in the cruel death of a pure and innocent being? or could God require such a sacrifice to satisfy his justice?

A. We do not believe that God required it to satisfy his justice, but he rather gave it to satisfy his mercy.

Q. How could anything so unjust satisfy his mercy? Can you believe that God has any satisfaction in the death of the innocent than he has in the efforts and repentance, however feeble and faulty, of a creature born in sin?

A. We do not believe that God has any satisfaction in the blood of the innocent; on the contrary, we believe that it was an exhibition of the sorrow of God, that the very heart of God was torn and riven when the rocks were rent, and there was darkness over all the land

Q. And yet you believe that the death of Christ was the punishment of our sins laid upon him?

A We do. "The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all." "He was made sin for us." Salvation by copying the example of Christ, leaves it still a doubtful issue depending on ourselves, and is no guarantee for the putting away of sin.

Q And can you make our salvation depend upon anything else without a shock to your moral sense? I cannot reconcile myself to the impossible idea of man's having any moral right to cast off his own responsibility and claim another's death as a savor for his sins and a guarantee for his acceptance with God.

A. If you regard Jesus Christ as a mere man, you may well maintain an honorable independence, and decline to have any interference between your sins and your God. But if you regard Jesus as himself God—as having a Divine right to say: "Thy sins be forgiven thee;" "Young man, I say unto thee, arise;" then your moral right to cast your responsibility on him, and to hide your sinful soul under the cover of his redeeming love, is not only clear but peremptory.

Q. Yes; I indeed concede that between myself and my God there is no room for self dependence. But though I accept Jesus as my Divine Savior, I cannot conceive of any such settlement of my salvation as rests upon the sacrifice of another's death doing service for my own. If the sinner deserves death, let him die, and not a substitute.

A. Yes, indeed, if the sinner deserves death, let him die, and not a substitute; even so sinners do die. Christ's death is not a substitute. He did not die instead of us; if so, how comes it that we die also? This is not a doctrine, but a fact.

Q. But if the sinner dies himself, and if death and suffering is the punishment due to his sins, what need is there of any other to die for his sins? If he dies he atones for his own sins.

A He is so—and what then? Man pays the debt due to his sins and dies; but having paid it, wherein is he richer? He is the more naked, unclothed, bankrupt! The payment of the debt exhausts all his resources, for it takes his life; and what has a man more than his life? But it does not exhaust the resources of the God-man. The Kinsman Redeemer has more than enough to pay the debt; he has the redemption money to buy back the lost estate.

Q What was the redemption money?

A. The principle of life—the Spirit which quickeneth—the power of his resurrection. He rose as the Conqueror of death

Q But how shall the victorious death and resurrection of the Holy One be justly ascribed to the guilty one? Is not this substitution?

A. The victory of Christ is not ascribed to the believer, it is given; it is not imputed. It is imparted. He gave himself a ransom for all. God has given to us his only begotten Son, and eternal life in his Son.

Q. But why say he gave life to be a sacrifice of atonement, and that the virtue of his death is imparted to the believer?

A. Because the doctrine of atoning sacrifices is taught throughout the whole of the Old Testament, and applied to Christ in the New.

Q. What teaching would you draw from the Old Testament sacrifices?

A. That the atoning sacrifices were but types and shadows and prophecies of the Messiah, whose one great sacrifice would be a propitiation for the sins of the whole world.

Q. What do you understand by the doctrine of atoning sacrifice?

A. I would first answer this question by saying what our doctrine is not; for the ideas connected with these words have been so largely taken from heathen corruptions of their truth that the Christian doctrine has suffered reproach. Do not imagine that when we speak of "propitiation" we believe in an angry God appeased by blood—or a God who can look with complacency on the sufferings of an innocent victim, or the wrath of the Father set against the tender pity of the Son: these horrible and revolting ideas are wholly repudiated by us. The object of sacrifice, we believe, was to set forth in symbolic act that victory over sin which is the only way of deliverance and restoration to God. The victory over sin is through death. Sin and death are closely represented in sacrifice. Sin is confessed and symbolically transferred to the goat by laying on of hands; it is then slain, and thus the offerer has "made an atonement for his soul." The sinner's restoration to God depends upon another's death; yet the death of the Lamb is not instead of, but legally the same as his own.

Q. I do not see my shadow of justice in this legality. It seems to me a mere counterfeit and piece of mental or "legal" jugglery. You say the death of the lamb is the same as the sinner's death, but it is not the same. The irresponsible lamb cannot morally atone for sinners.

A. It is true that it is not the same in the type, but in the antitype it is so. The type is the shadow, not the substance—these things are but figures of the true, but the body is Christ; and between Christ and the believer there is identity of being—union; life in life which is real, vital, spiritual, not a mere imputation or legal reckoning, as in the case of the type. The Lamb of God is not an irresponsible being. The Incarnation teaches us that Christ came in man's nature; the doctrine of Regeneration teaches us that man becomes a partaker of the Divine Nature. The new birth makes us a new creation in the Second Adam—very members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones.

Q. But what connection has this with propitiatory sacrifice for the forgiveness of sins in the death of Christ?

A. The connection is very close indeed. The lamb of sacrifice belonged to the offerer; it was his own. Its life was his, its death was his, its very flesh became, by his partaking in the sacrifice, part of his own body. Apply this to Christ, and you will see the connection. If Christ is yours, if there is a vital union between his life and your life, between his death and your death, then there must be a vital union with him in his resurrection. And as truly as he has taken you into union with himself so does he bring himself into union with you. Your sins, your punishment, your death he takes unto himself. Herein he represents you and gives you the right to be fully represented in him. You might have died in sin and risen no more; so now you may die in Jesus and rise again by the power of his resurrection. The whole mystery of godliness is enfolded in these words: "Christ in you, the hope of glory."

Q. But what right have we to appropriate Christ as our own?

A. Not by right of nature, not by right of purchase, but by right of gift. He gave himself a ransom. Can you not truly say that God has given to you his Lamb? And do you not see the absolute need we have of another to deliver us from the power of sin and death? We are not able, but he is able to save. The strong swimmer plunges into the flood, and the sinking one is carried safely over in his arms. Dear brother, will you not accept the Lamb? And do you not see how beautifully the truth concerning this wonderful atonement opens up the whole mystery of God that was hid for ages—now made manifest: "Christ in us," and its complement, we "in Christ." Born again by the quickening Spirit—the bond of union between the Father and the Son, which also unites all the sons as one in Christ. Do not, dear brother, stumble at the word "propitiation." It is simply that Jesus, our Brother, has made it all right for us. He could not save us from the grave, but he will go down into it with us, holding us so closely that even there we cannot be separated from his love. Do not stumble at the word "atonement." It is simply that sin is an awful barrier between us and him, and he not only delivers us from its punishment in death, but purifies us by his own spirit We are in the position of those who have already died for their sins, and risen again justified. The newness of life in the Spirit is far higher than the life of the lost paradise. Life in Christ lifts us into heaven itself—gives us access to our Father full and free. It gives us power to overcome. It opens to us an abundant entrance into all the fulness of his love.

Q. But is nothing needed on my part? Is all this given though I remain as I am?

A. All this is given, but not taken, if you remain as you are—refusing it. No outward act is needed; it is not baptism or sacrament which unites to Christ, but faith. "We are the children of God by faith," and so simple is faith: it is the position of a soul before God, who, hearing and believing the Record which God hath given of his Son," accepts the gift as it would accept any other gift. It is not the word of spoken acceptance, it is not the laying hold of the tangible gift—you accept an offer in your mind before you utter it or act on it. The maiden accepts the lover's offer in her heart before she answers by word or sign; but the outcome of the acceptance is that she is his for evermore. Dear brother, if Jesus Christ gives you himself, will you not take the gift and give yourself to him? In accepting the gift you accept the Holy One; you choose not life merely, but holiness; not escape from penalty hereafter merely, but from sin now. He is not a substitute, exchanging places with you. He is a Representative, standing where you stand. His blood did not remove God's anger from you to him; but it removed your sins and all the long train of sorrows they had brought to you out of the way for ever. The stripes were laid on him—even your stripes—and all the cruel pain and all the terrible sorrows of death laid hold of him—your sins and your punishment—because you could not bear it, and he could. He won a sinless victory over temptation, over the world, over pain and sorrow and death, and he overcame them all. And you, too, shall have these tribulations to bear. But be of good cheer, he has overcome the world.—R., in Rainbow.

*It is with especial pleasure we insert this short article on a very great and solemn subject, not as though the many were not here and more perhaps a little open to criticism, but because of the interesting, frank and winning way in which the writer's thoughts are set forth. In fact, the earnest and practical spirit pervading the piece disarms criticism. We are pleased to say we have another article in hand from the pen of Mr. James Holding, on "Atonement in Type and Antitype." This we propose printing next month; and if after that it should seem important that any thing further be added, the way will be open for our trusty contributors to supply the need. Mere verbal controversy on such a theme would, in our judgment, be out of place.—ED. RAINBOW.

THE RESTITUTION

Terms—TWO DOLLARS A YEAR

Payable in advance. Three and Six Months the same rate.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the doctrine of restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and baptism such as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Conference Notice.

The Second Quarterly Conference of the Church of God in Indiana will be held at Rensselaer, Ind., commencing Friday, Feb. 4, 1887, and continue over the following Sunday. Brethren and sisters, this is your appointed meeting—do not wait to be urged to attend and aid in its work, but esteem it as one more privilege of assembling together, and by a united effort push forward the cause of our Master. As Brother R. S. Driggins, President of the Conference, is in the South for the winter, I have been requested to urge Brother J. L. Wince, First Vice President, to attend.

RENEW TODAY.

THE selected articles on the first page are well worthy of a careful perusal. The first in order is from the Messenger of Glasgow, Scotland, and the next from the Rainbow, London, England.

IN the translation of Job xxxiv. 3 as printed last week, "Because the ear proveth the value of words and the throat tasteth in eating," for the word tasteth read tasteth. Take a pen and convert the letter "l" into a "t" by crossing it, will be a sufficient correction.

THOSE best posted in European politics are of opinion that Russia is not only waiting, but intriguing for a collision among some of the Greater Powers, so, that, while they were engaged in the work of mutual slaughter, she could be left free to wind up the Eastern Question in her own way. A war between England and the United States would materially favor the Czar, as England would then have her hands more than full. It is our earnest prayer that no war may take place between these two governments.

EDITORIAL BREVITIES.

MAN CREATED.

"I will praise thee; for I am fearfully and wonderfully made: marvellous are thy works; and that my soul knoweth right well. My substance was not hidden from thee, when I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth. Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being imperfect; and in thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them." Psa. cxxxix. 14-16.

If we apprehend the design of the plan of redemption to be the exaltation of humanity, as respects the church of the living God, to the plane of the Divine, thus bringing celestial perfection out of what might be termed a moral chaos, we, at the same time, are led to apprehend from the Scriptures of truth, as bearing upon the mystery of the creation of man, that man, as at first constituted was the very masterpiece of the lower creation, with which he is so wonderfully and mysteriously connected. Created man was the consummation of the creation—the sublime genesis of created generations—as redeemed man, when clothed with immortality, glory and incorruptibility, will be the sublime genesis of the new creation, and the glorious consummation of "all things made new." That the genesis of man, in the grand evolutions of the creative work, is what the Psalmist alludes to, is thus forcibly and beautifully set forth by Prof. Taylor Lewis in a chapter, "The Essential Ideas of Creation," introductory to Lange's Commentary on the Book of Genesis. Speaking in this particular chapter of the Hexameron, or Creative Days, he says of the sixth, in its closing work, "Each day, as a beginning by itself, contains the incipient powers and elements of its peculiar work, but does not exhaust those energies. The light is still evolving on the second day; the fluids are still parting in the third; the firmament, though having its auroral light before, is becoming still brighter in the fourth; vegetable and animal life are coming to still greater perfection in the fifth and sixth.

May not the same be said of man? On the sixth day, his "bringing into the cosmos" becomes complete; the divine allocution, "Let us make man," receives its accomplishment, and the process by which his material and physical structure is educed from the earth is finished; but may we not suppose that the preparation for this last and crowning work, and so the work itself, runs through all the previous cycles? "Thine eyes did see my substance, yet unfinished, and in thy book all my members were written, the days they were fashioned, when there was not one in them." This remarkable passage may apply primarily to the individual generation; it doubtless includes it; and yet there is something about it which seems to indicate a wider and a deeper application to the origin of our generic physical humanity, and to its first germ or material, as it lay in the formlessness of the chaos.

The Septuagint has rendered גלמי Psa. cxxxix. 16, by a word very similar to that by which it describes the tohu, akatergastos nun, my unformed or unwrought, Vulgate: imperfectum meum, my unmade. But the most striking resemblance is suggested by the יומים, the days, which our translators have rendered "in continuance," thereby greatly impairing the force and significance of the language. "Thine eyes saw it then unfinished" during all the days in which it was receiving formation, יומים יצרו, when they were being formed, or written down in thy book, ולא אחד בהם. These last words have puzzled all the commentators. If the passage may be referred to the primal formation of humanity, then it would be, not only a fair view, but even the most legitimate one, grammatically, to refer אחד, as also the pronoun in בהם to יומים just preceding, "during the days they were formed, and even when there was no one (no first day) among them." "Even before the day" (compare Isa. xliii. 13) God was writing or preparing this book of the human record; it dates from the very foundation of the world. Eph. i. 4; Heb. iv. 3; Rev. xiii. 8.

The full formation of man in the sixth day does not oppose the idea that the powers and evolutions of matter that were finally sublimated into the imperishable germ of the human body, and the types from lower forms that finally went into the human physical constitution, were being prepared all the days. This was his being formed out of the earth, that is, out of nature in its evolving series. Here, too, it may be said (though with the diffidence that becomes every attempt to penetrate these creative mysteries), we have some light upon that dark and puzzling language, "When I was made in secret and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth," Ps. cxxxix. 15,—in inferioribus terræ—in profundissimis naturæ. The common explanation that refers this language to the maternal womb does not satisfy, and it has no exegetical authority in any similar use of such a metaphor in the Bible Hebrew. It becomes more easy, if we regard it as the womb of nature, the earth out of which the Lord God formed man. In the language, too, of the thirteenth verse תסכני (compare Ecek. xxviii. 14, 16. הסוכך כרוב—intexuisti, Luke i. 35), "thou didst overshadow me in my mother's womb," there is a striking resemblance to the image of the spirit brooding or hovering over the formless tehom. It is not strange that the author of this most sublime Psalm should have had in view, either primarily or suggestively, this remoter generation. Man, generically, in his appointment to dominion, is clearly the subject of Psalm viii. 4, 5, 6. Why should his generic origination be thought too remote an idea for the profound and contemplative cxxxixth?"

To this learned and beautiful quotation we may add that the Hebrew verb, rendered "curiously wrought," means to variegate with beautiful colors, to embroider with the finest needlework, and thus shows that creative energy, in man's formation, exercised the most consummate skill in elaborating the human framework. From Physiology we learn, that of the sixty-five chemical elements or simple bodies that are known to exist, fifteen enter into the composition of the human body.

Into the CREATED MAN God has inwrought, in the most delicate manner, these fifteen simple and uncompounded elements, and then infused into the perfected organism the mysterious principle of life—vitalized the organic form that he had so wonderfully elaborated from elemental principles, whose origin is co-ordinate with the primal creation of all matter. Into the REDEEMED MAN will be inwrought incorruptible principles, as the process of the new creation through the resurrection from the dead, and into this reorganization will be infused the divine vitalization of spirit-life, placing man redeemed on that lofty plane of existence occupied by the Son of God, man's glorious Redeemer.

MAN REDEEMED.

God hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name: That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." Phil. ii. 9-11.

It is God's eternal purpose to place his only begotten Son at the very summit of power and glory in the universe. We can form but little conception of the glorious natures and conditions of some of the higher orders of beings in the heavens. But whatever may be their rank in point of exaltation, yet far above them all God has exalted that loved Redeemer, who, although pre-eminently the Son of God, is, nevertheless, a kinsman of ours. How wonderful that humanity should be thus exalted; that a nature at first lower than the angelic should at last be placed at the very head of all creation. The divine and the human have been united in the person of God's own dear Son, and hence the exaltation of the human. On this wonderful theme L. C. Baker sublimely expatiates in his able work entitled The Mystery of Creation and of Man.

"The word was made flesh, died for our sins, and was raised again in the power of an endless life, the Type and Fount of pure and indestructible manhood, set in the highest heavens, the model and goal to which he would bring us. The being clothed upon, then, with this glorified humanity at the resurrection, is as essential to this plan of ages as is the keystone of an arch. The stock of this human family is the noblest tree that has blossomed out on the field of the universe: the grains in whose cell are stars; and that stock has yet ripened but one fruit, one Risen Man, the corn of wheat that fell into the ground and died and rose again, the germ of springing harvests that shall make this wide field glad with golden sheaves, and vocal before God with perpetual joy. It is this embodied immortality, this incorruptible manhood that bears the stamp of God's own image, to the production of which he has been working through all the ages, for whose manifestation the whole creation now waits as an expectant mother travailing to bring to light the kingly race whose birth shall be her rest and joy. And through this race, not of disembodied spirits, but of men, who shall come to their immortal manhood at the redemption of their bodies, shall the designs of God in creation be unrolled to the ages to come."

Selections.

THE LAND SHADOWING WITH WINGS.

In your journal of the 1st instant, you have a short editorial under the above caption, wherein you inform your readers that, of late, several sermons have been preached from the 18th chapter of Isaiah, which runs thus:—

"Woe to the land shadowing with wings, which is beyond the rivers of Ethiopia. That sendeth ambassadors by sea, even in vessels of bulrushes," etc.

In your remarks, you say that "it seems now to be generally conceded, that America is the land which the prophet Isaiah saw in his vision," and that "indeed there can be no doubt of it, as this is the only continent lying beyond the rivers of Ethiopia." In reply to this I would observe, that though it may be thus "generally conceded," the text and context will not admit of such a construction.

General concession may give a quietus to "things seen and temporal," but is always to be put to the question in relation to the politics of the kingdom and throne of David, which is to be "built to all generations." Psalm lxxxix. 3, 4, 24, 26, 29, 36, 37.

The 18th chapter of "that great prophet," Isaiah, has manifest reference to the Israelites, the natural subjects of David's kingdom which, for 2,400 years past, has been "trodden down," and its territory "spoiled" by the Chaldeans, Persians, Macedonians, Romans, Saracens and Turks. This chapter is part of a prophecy which commences at chapter xvii. 12. It begins with "Woe to the multitude of many people," and "to the rushing of nations;" for "God shall rebuke them and they shall flee far off, and shall be chased as the chaff of the mountains before the wind, and like a rolling thing before the whirlwind"—verse 13. These "nations," Ezekiel tells us, are "Gog, the land of Magog, Rosh, prince of Mesech and Tubal," in alliance with "Persia, Ethiopia (Cush), and Lybia, all of them with shield and helmet (a Tartar host); Gomer, and all his bands; the house of Togarmah of the north quarters, and all his bands; and many people with Gog"—a Russo-Tartarian host, which "shall" rush to the battle of their overthrow "like the rushing of many waters," even against the Israelites, partially resettled in the country promised to their fathers. At this "evening tide" shall Jacob be in trouble, Isa. xvii. 14, for then "will be a time of trouble, such as there never was since there was a nation even to that same time:" and at that time Israel "shall be delivered," Dan. xii. 1; for "before the morning he," the autocrat, "is not. This is the portion of them that spoil us, (Israelites), and the lot of them that rob us." Isaiah xvii. 14. In view, therefore, of this "consummation so devoutly to be wished" by Israel, and by all that love him for Messiah's sake, who shall judge among the nations sitting on the throne of his father David, Jehovah makes proclamation by the prophet to the power which, in his providence, he has appointed as Israel's protector in the affair of their partial restoration to the land of their fathers, "which is the glory of all lands." This protecting nation is insular and maritime, having possessions "beyond the rivers of Khush." "Ho, to the land, shadowing with wings!"—protecting with its power as a bird protects its young under the shadow of its wings; "which is beyond the rivers of Khush"—not "the undiscovered land," but "beyond the rivers" which water the tract of Asia, lying between the Tigris, Caspian Sea, and Persian Gulf, and known as Khushistan—the ancient Asiatic Ethiopia. Now, Mr. Editor, if you take the bearings of the shadowing land lying beyond Khushistan, you will find that a line drawn in a northeasterly direction from Jerusalem, where Isaiah was when he made this prophetic invocation, will run through Khush, Afghanistan, and the Punjaub, and strike the Himalaya mountains, which bound the Anglo-Indian empire on the north. This protecting nation, whose territorial empire is thus indicated, as the nation of the sea which cannot send "ambassadors" unless by sea. There is no exception to this fact; whereas in relation to the United States, its government can, if it please, send ambassadors overland to all the states of South America. British ambassadors cannot move from their sea-girt isle except by sea; and they are pre-eminently "swift messengers," being despatched for the most part in steamers. Hence I conclude that the protecting power is not America, but the maritime arm of Britain, whose Indian territory lies from Jerusalem "beyond the rivers of Khush," the preservation of whose ascendancy in Hindoostan is entirely connected with the future destiny of the territory of David's kingdom; and the Jews, the "merchants of Tarshish and the young lions thereof," see Ezek. xxxviii. 13, under the Holy One of Israel, are the Cyrus and his hosts of their restoration in these latter days, even as the autocrat of all the Russias is the modern Pharaoh, who "shall rush like the rushing of mighty waters" against them, to his own discomfiture and utter destruction. In that time shall the present be brought unto the Lord of Hosts of a people scattered and peeled, and of a people terrible from this and onward; a nation meted out and trodden under foot, whose land (Palestine) the rivers (overflowing desolations) have spoiled, to the place of the name of the Lord of Hosts, the Mount Zion." This is so faithfully descriptive of the nation of Israel, in its origin and subsequent fortunes, as to need no comments by way of illustration. "This chapter," as you well remark, "is a study of itself, and contains most pregnant matter for deep reflection and consideration; but clearly the first word is mistranslated." As yours is a Sunday paper, I submit these remarks as not unworthy the perusal of your patrons, Gentile and Jewish; nor inappropriate even to those whose minds are absorbed in the pious exercises and observances of the day. The religion of Messiah is inseparable from the politics of these latter days. In hope that the ensign of Israel's independence may soon be unfurled upon their native mountains—that David's throne and kingdom may be speedily restored—and that "Messiah the Prince," both son of David and Son of God, may sit and rule thereon, as king of Israel and emperor of the world.—Doctor John Thomas, in N. Y. Times, in 1847.

Letter Drawer.

ST. JOSEPH, MO.

To the Dear Ones Scattered Abroad:

I beg to say a few words by letter that I may thus express thoughts not suitable for other style of writing. Many of the letters recently appearing in THE RESTITUTION have been very comforting and encouraging to us who are so isolated from all of like precious faith. It is but right that we should speak often one to another of our hopes and fears as well as of our progress and attainments in the divine life. We are exhorted to add to our faith, virtue, and to virtue, knowledge; nor are we told that the time will ever come during this mortal state when we will have gained so much of heavenly wisdom that we can add nothing thereto. The sacred mine from which we have to dig is large and deep and wide, yet it measures not to the utmost our Father's divine purposes, for we read, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive the things that God hath prepared for them that love him." These glorious wonders will be unfolded to us in the Father's own good time. Let us rest in his love, let us trust implicitly in his wisdom, knowing that he who hath promised is also able to fulfil. Let us be ready always, so that when the Bridegroom cometh and calleth for his chosen ones we may be ready to exclaim, Lo, this is our Lord, we have waited for him and he will save us.

When any brother or sister writes of suffering affliction, my heart goes out to them in sympathy and I wish I could do something to help them to bear their heavy burdens. I was especially touched by two letters from invalid sisters within the past few months. I wanted to say to them at least a few comforting words by letter, but their address was not given. Dear ones, this seems (to me at least), like talking in the dark. We can not see where you are, and if we happen to have any precious little treasure, a word of encouragement, or exhortation, we cannot find you to bestow it. Would it not be well to tell us where you are? I have received many letters, precious words of cheer that came to me in a round-about way because the senders did not know just where to find me. In closing let me say, "In the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength." Let us accept him (in his word) as our guide, even unto death. Your sister looking for redemption.

CARRIE WILLIAMS.

[It should be remembered that nearly all of our "Letter Drawer" is extracted from private letters—never intended for publication—and given a place simply to show the condition, the hopes and fears, of the waiting ones scattered abroad. It is therefore deemed best to withhold the address and sometimes even the name of the writer. However, a request sent to this office, accompanied with a stamp for return postage, will be cheerfully acknowledged with the desired information concerning any correspondent.]

Editor Restitution:

I had a present of a dollar yesterday and I hasten to send it to you for THE RESTITUTION. I am feeble and can walk but little, and the dear truths it contains cheer and comfort my old heart as I pass down to the grave. I wonder my life, so useless, has been spared to see another year. Could I live a thousand years I would try and live for Jesus and the good of mankind. I should miss my paper if I could not receive it, so I send pay for six months longer. I love to read the letters from brethren and sisters of like precious faith. They kindle in my old heart the enduring love of God which is ever fresh and overflowing from the great heart of our God and Jesus our best Friend. And the more I read of his divine attributes, the more I cling to his loving and powerful hand, and I am safe beneath his sheltering wing. God bless all the household of faith, and may we meet on the evergreen pastures of Eden restored.

HARRIET COLBY.

Editor Restitution:

Enclosed please find two dollars for my subscription to THE RESTITUTION for 1887. It is now some years since I began taking this paper. I find now I cannot do without it. Its weekly visits are really refreshing, it has shown to me the errors of modern theology. Under its teaching how clear the Bible is, things that once looked dark appear now as clear as noonday. Man would make God a monster who is not satisfied without sending souls to eternal torment. I thought at one time this was taught in the Bible, but now, I find they are only inventions of men, and are nowhere to be found in God's Word, and are only the same lie told by Satan to our first parents.

Hoping we shall meet in the kingdom, I remain your Bro.

WILLIAM SMITH.

HENRY CO. INFIRMARY, Ill.

Ed. Restitution:

I can let you know that we are still numbered among the living. Am very thankful to you for sending us your welcome RESTITUTION. It is a God-send to us poor and infirm folks. We are both of us over seventy years old. I am not able to write any myself, and Mrs. Johnson is very nervous, else I would have a good deal to write to you about. Hope that you will keep on sending us the paper for a little while longer, as we can not very well do without it. I am a firm believer in its teaching. We don't expect to wander very much longer in this world, but we believe that Christ has a place prepared for us in his heavenly kingdom.

Yours Respectfully,

JOHN KLINEFELT.

NOW is the time to renew.

Youth's Column.

Boys Make Men.

When you see a ragged urchin
Standing wistful in the street,
With torn hat and hair in tangles,
Dirty face and bare red feet,
Pass not by the child unheeding;
Smile upon him. Mark me, when
He's grown old he'll not forget it;
For remember, boys make men.

Have you never seen a grandsire,
With his eyes aglow with joy,
Bring to mind some act of kindness—
Something said to him, a boy?
Or, relate some slight or coldness,
With a brow all clouded, when
He recalled some heart-pang unhappiness
To remember boys make men?

Let us try to add some pleasure
To the life of every boy;
For each child needs tender interest
In the sorrow and its joy.
Call your boys home by its brightness
They avoid the household when
It is cheerless with unkindness.
For remember, boys make men.

—Youth's Companion.

Sunshine at Home.

Many a child goes astray, not because there is a want at home, but simply because home lacks sunshine. A child needs smiles as much as the flowers need sunbeams. Children look little beyond the present moment. If a thing pleases, they are apt to seek it; if it displeases, they are apt to avoid. If home is a place where faces are sour, and words hard, and faultfinding is ever on the ascendant, they will spend as many hours as possible elsewhere.

A Quaker had this for his motto. It will do to paste up where we can see it: "I expect to pass through this world but once. Any good thing, therefore, that I can do, or any kindness that I can show to any fellow human being, let me do it now. Let me not defer nor neglect it, for I shall not pass this way again."

"Strength for Today."

"Strength for today; it is all that we need,
For there never will be a tomorrow."
"As thy days, so shall thy strength be."

In turning over the leaves of a cast-aside paper, I found a little hymn by an unknown author, that greatly pleased and helped me.

I read it and re-read it, and then sent it to a little friend, with the thought, that perhaps it might help her as it had helped me. And now, I am going to tell my little friends of THE RESTITUTION about it and how I think they can please God, by keeping the two lines of the hymn in mind.

You see God only gives one day at a time; the tomorrows, are never ours.

Cannot we do right one little day? It looks to me as if it might be an easy thing to do, and when we remember that God has divided the day into very small moments, and that only one of these is given us at a time, in which to do right, it seems still easier.

Don't you think we ought to be ashamed of ourselves if we cannot be good, while sixty seconds are speeding by?

"As thy days, so shall thy strength be."
The dear Future says!

Is it not a beautiful thought, that as each day comes, God is going to help us? If the day is hard to get through, he will give us the more strength; strength measured out according to our need.

We do not need to shed tears, nor to let wild angry thoughts go rushing through our minds. When the hours of trouble and perplexity come,—it is only for today, and there is promised, "strength for today!" God will stand by our side; he will take our hands; he will lift us out of the miry places, and set our feet upon the rock; he will establish our goings.

If we are good as the moments go by, when night comes there will be nothing to trouble us as to a misspent day; and when life comes to an end, we can say, "It is all right." "God has been my strength all the way," and I can go to the grave in peace, knowing that when the Savior comes, he will awaken me to live forevermore with him in his glorious home."

Dear Children:

Although the scene I am going to write about happened about eighteen hundred years ago, yet so vivid does the Scripture light up its histories of truth and beauty, that we imagine the interesting stories cannot be so old. As Jesus passed a certain place, which name signifies, "A thorn or briar," he entered a village, and as he journeyed along his attention was suddenly aroused by the loud cry of ten men, who stood a good way off. His sympathetic ear caught the sound, and soon his kind eye glanced upon the sad little group, who lifted up their voices, and said, Jesus, Master have mercy on us. Jesus said, "Go, show yourselves unto the priests." These ten men were lepers, and according to the law given to Moses, this was the first command to show themselves to the priests, for no doctor could cure this dreadful, loathsome disease which entirely excluded them from the society of other people, and those afflicted were called unclean, supposing it to have been inflicted by God for some crime, as was the case with Miriam who reproached her brother Moses, with Gahazi who in a dishonest way procured clothes and money, and with Uzziah who profanely presumed to offer incense. Perhaps the ten men had never observed the law, and Jesus who came to fulfil it, giving more honor to it than those for whom it was written, desired them to seek the cure as Jehovah had commanded, as in keeping God's commandments there is great reward.

I would like to give you a faint idea of the sufferings of the poor leper. The afflicted person becomes hoarse, his blood mingled with whitish particles, and the serum or thin part of the blood is so dry that vinegar poured thereon, boils up, and salt applied does not dissolve. the body becomes so hot, the hair becomes stiff, and if plucked, brings away rotten flesh with it. His eye becomes red and inflamed, similar to those of a cat. His tongue becomes dry, black, swollen and ulcerated, and his face resembles a half-burnt coal, furrowed with hard knobs, greenish at the bottom and white at the top. The parts infected become insensible and at last being rotten, fall off, the itching is unbearable. Think my children, how imploring must have been the loud voice of these ten lepers who knew none but God could cure them. They were afraid to come near Jesus fearing he might catch the disease, for no one but the priests could examine them without being affected by it. And when they came near any one, they had to cry aloud, Unclean, Unclean. But the Lord made a way under the law of Moses in which the leprous Jew could be cleansed. It is written, And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, This shall be the law of the leper in the day of his cleansing. He shall be brought unto the priest. And the priest shall command for him that is to be cleansed, two sparrows, alive and clean, cedar wood, and scarlet, and hyssop. One of the birds was to be slain in an earthen vessel over running water. The life of the other bird was to be spared, but must be dipped in the sacrificed blood of the slain bird in the earthen vessel, killed over living, or running water, and mixed with the blood must be the wood, scarlet, and bitter hyssop. Seven times the leper was sprinkled with the blood, and the seventh time, which means perfection, the leper was pronounced clean, and the living bird was let loose in the open field. As there is no remission of sins without the shedding of blood, so was it with the leper. The clean, or unblemished bird represented our Redeemer whose innocent blood was shed for the unclean. The wood whispered the cross, the scarlet, sin, the hyssop, the bitter cup which he prayed, if possible may pass from him, but if the blood of the innocent flowed, living water of life shall go out from thence. The bird bound by the law, or the one held in the hand of the priest could not have its freedom, unless dipped in the atoning blood of the sacrificed one, and even then could not soar heavenward until the unclean was proclaimed cleansed. The mission of Jesus was to heal the sick and cleanse the leper, and when he saw the ten were so ready to obey his word, he healed them as they were on their way to the priest. O, how astonished they were when they had lost all pain, and the flesh became healthy, and their bodies full of life. One of the little group, who was not an Israelite, but a stranger from the covenants of promise, rejoiced so greatly when he saw he was healed that he instantly turned back, and with a loud voice glorified God, and fell down on his face at the feet of Jesus, giving him thanks, and Jesus said unto him, Arise, go thy way; thy faith hath made thee whole, but the nine returned not to give glory to God. You will perceive, my dear children, that Jehovah's way as taught by Moses, was a figure of that which is true, which makes Jesus Christ the end of the law for righteousness to all who believe him.

Your affectionate Teacher,

E. COFFMAN.

THE HOLLOW OF HIS HAND.

When tossed upon the billows,
Afar from friendly land,
I will look to him who holds me
"In the hollow of his hand."

Though restless be my pathway,
By night the heavens spanned,
I will trust in him who holds me
"In the hollow of his hand."

Though raging winds may drive me
A wreck upon the strand,
I will cling to him who holds me
"In the hollow of his hand."

Though deadened is this fainting ear to me,
By hist'ning winds unfanned,
I will wait on him who holds me
"In the hollow of his hand."

When strength is spent in toiling,
And wearily I stand,
I will rest in him who holds me
"In the hollow of his hand."

When by the swelling Jordan,
My feet in sinking sand,
I will cry to him who holds me
"In the hollow of his hand."

Ah, there in him in walking,
Even through a desert land,
In knowing that he holds me
"In the hollow of his hand."

EXCAVATION OF THE GREAT SPHINX.

The last occasion on which the Great Sphinx was cleared down to the level on which the paws rest was in honor of the opening of the Suez Canal in 1869. The ever drifting sands had, however, reburied it almost to the throat when Professor Maspero, during his last year of office at Boulak, began again the work of disinterment. This work has now been going on, somewhat intermittently, for more than twelve months, and is at the present time in active progress under the direction of Professor Maspero's successor, M. Grebaut. A tramway has been laid down from the Sphinx to the edge of the Pyramid plateau, passing close under the west face of the granite building popularly, though incorrectly, called the Temple of the Sphinx. Along this tramway light trucks convey the sand to the point at which their contents are discharged, the trucks being loaded by Arabs of both sexes and all ages, who carry the sand upon their heads in large flat baskets, ascending and descending all day long from the excavations below to the tramway above, and vice versa. The means look curiously inadequate, but the results are astonishing. Already the entire fore part of the great stone monster is laid bare, and already the huge chest, the paws, the space between the paws, the altar in front of them, and the platform upon which they rest are once more open to the light of day. Nor is this all. Between the Sphinx and the Pyramid plateau, a vast space has also been cleared, thus bringing to view a fine flight of steps some forty feet in width. These steps, which are described by Pliny, were uncovered by Caviglia in 1817, but have been entirely lost to sight for nearly seventy years. A second flight of steps and the remains of two Roman buildings were also found by Caviglia, and will again be brought to light if M. Grebaut continues the work in this direction.

To the right of the Sphinx—that is to say, in the direction of the granite temple, to the southward—a further excavation is in progress, the result of which will probably confirm the surmises of those who believe the Sphinx to stand in the midst of a huge artificial amphitheater hewn out of the solid rock. This gigantic work would of course be contemporaneous with the Sphinx itself, which Mariette attributed to the mythic ages before the advent of Menes, the first King of the first dynasty, and which Maspero considers to be, if not actually prehistoric, at all events the oldest monument in Egypt.

From the level of the area below the great flight of steps (which lead down, and not up, to the Sphinx) one now measures the whole length of the huge human-headed monster, whose battered countenance stands out against the cloudless sky 100 feet above. The space between the paws is 35 feet long and 10 feet wide. This space was anciently covered into a small sanctuary lined with votive tablets, only one of which—the famous stela of Thothmes IV.—yet remains in situ. This stela records how the King, when upon one of his hunting expeditions, lay down to rest at midday in the shadow of the Sphinx. He there fell asleep, and dreamed a dream in which the venerable image conjured him to clear away the sand in which it was nearly buried. Then the Prince awoke and "made silence in his heart," and vowed to do that which the god had commanded. The lower part of this tablet is obliterated, and Mr. W. M. Flinders Petrie, who visited the spot about a fortnight ago, reports that an important part of the fourteenth line, containing the name of Khafra (Chephren), has scaled off since the last time the inscription was copied. The tablet stands fourteen feet high, and is cut from a block of the same red granite of Assouan, whereof the neighboring Temple of Khafra is built. There seems, according to Mr. Petrie's report, to be very good reason for concluding that the pious Thothmes, notwithstanding his respect for the memory of Khafra, actually pilfered this very block from Khafra's own temple, for in the back of it there are two pivot holes—or rather sockets for letting in pivot-blocks," precisely similar to the pivot-holes which are to be seen in the lintel stones and doorsills of that building. The granite slab between the paws is of the same quality, and most probably came from the same convenient quarry. This last, however, is of Roman work, very roughly executed.

The paws of the Sphinx, as they now appear, are a restoration of Roman date, being used in comparatively small slabs, apparently in Roman times; and these slabs have again been repaired by cutting away the weather-ed surface and making a fresh facing. Like the legs of the Colossi of the Plain and those of the great statues of Abou Simbel, the paws of the Sphinx are covered with the Greek scrawls of idle travellers; but these graffiti are mostly of a late period, and so slightly scratched that few are legible throughout. Such as they are, however, Professor Maspero has, it is understood, devoted himself to the ungrateful and difficult task of translating them.

M. Grebaut's excavations are not limited to the clearance of the Sphinx only. Various interesting tombs have lately been discovered in the vicinity of the Great Pyramid, and to the westward the face of the Libyan Cliff has been reached where it forms the natural boundary of the Pyramid plateau. Some good early rock-cut tombs, with built fore-courts, have been found in the face of the cliff, in two of which the walled-up recesses, or secret chambers, called "serdabs," which were constructed for the safe keeping of funerary portrait statues, are yet intact with their contents. One contains a monolithic group of four figures representing the deceased, his wife, his brother, and a child. In another has been found a beautiful alabaster altar, sculptured in bas-relief with likenesses of one Ra-nu; and on the walls of another records the name of Assa-f, the successor of Menkera (Mencheres), of the fourth dynasty. By far the most interesting of these recent tomb discoveries is that of the sepulchre of a certain "Satou Re," or "Royal Son," named Kuhin khaf (the glory of Khufu), who was probably the son of the builder of the Great Pyramid. The doorway of the inner chamber of this tomb is decorated in bas-relief with the earliest representation of a column yet discovered. The shaft is shown to be cylindrical, tapering slightly toward the top, where it ends in a ring surmounted by an inverted capital resembling the usual lotus capital, but without the graceful curvature of outline which distinguishes the lotus order. The base of the shaft is finished by a rounded drum. In this interesting doorway we have the profile portrait of a perfect column base, shaft, torus and capital complete, thus showing that as an architectural feature the column with all its members was already fully developed at the time of the fourth dynasty. The celebrated tombs of Beni Hassan, in which occur the earlier columns previously known, belong to the twelfth dynasty, and are about 1,200 years later than the era of Khufu.—London Times

FROM JERUSALEM.

October 27, 1886.

Letters from America arrived yesterday and cheered us much. We are praying for the peace of Jerusalem, may God bring it soon.

You must be having a hard battle over there; but the battle is the Lord's. Moses complained that the Lord laid all the burden on him, and so he did. Moses was a type of Christ, and Christ of his true followers.

Our cause is the King's cause. We ought to overlook persecution now. In building a beautiful structure every stone is necessary and must fill its place. But we are looking forward to the finished building, forgetting for the time how essential every part of the process is in erecting it.

Every stone is necessary; but, of course, each stone has its value. If the stones should get to wrangling among themselves to see which should occupy the most conspicuous place, it would certainly make confusion for a time. Some stones may be very beautiful and some, even ornamental; but those away down in the base are, after all, the most necessary as being the foundation upon which all the structure stands.

Let us therefore be contented to fill the place God has designed us for. He will surely make no mistake.

We have had a sirocco for the past five days, with terrific heat, but today at 1 p. m. the wind changed to the northwest, which has produced a most healthful and delightful change, with signs of rain.

Our markets are filled with grapes and figs, but they are now becoming rather scarce. We see everywhere huge, red, ripe pomegranates, very beautiful indeed; and such immense pumpkins, which remind us of pumpkin pies. They are as nice here as in America. This vegetable is eaten here fried like potatoes, and is really delicious.

Now I have an idea I would like you to consider well and let me know what you think of it. It is to draw up a plan which will put before the people the necessity of making a hospice, a temporary home for Americans who are coming here; some as pilgrims and some to remain.

All nations, that is all European nations have hospices, hospitals, etc., for pilgrims, except America. I have thought that if we could put this matter before the people in the right light, that perhaps means sufficient could be raised to purchase a lot and make it free forever; and then build thereon a suitable building for this purpose.

We are now having the refreshing night mists spoken of by Hosea, xiv. 5, "I will be as the night mists unto Israel." We read about the clouds dropping down dew. This is never seen in the Western world.

The night mists really drop from the clouds; but never in the daytime. This is the reason of our having cool nights. The days are hot; but these mists fall in the hot season in summer and in the fall, which cool off the atmosphere wonderfully.

This reminds me of Jacob's faithful labors for his wives and flocks, nearly 4,000 years ago. "Thus I was; in the day the drouth consumed me, and the cold by night; and my sleep departed from mine eyes." Gen. xxxi. 40.

You must not understand the dews here to be anything like what you have in America. It is a sort of invisible, copious mist, or rain, that falls in abundance every night at 12 o'clock, when the wind is west or northwest. At this time our dew clouds are wonderfully beautiful in the morning—billowy forms and silvery white; so bright and soft that I love to watch them till they are sucked up by the rising sun.

You say our cause is of God. Yes it is; and that is why the devil is so troubled about it. His business is to be an adversary to truth and right; but the crown will be all the brighter for opposition.

Nov. 9th. We have had a splendid rain more than a month earlier than usual I think. About two inches have fallen. The farmers are plowing and sowing their grain, and it looks as though the good Lord was remembering his beloved land and sending a blessing on it.

Summer now prevails more than half the year. But notwithstanding this long prevalence of warm temperature the heat of Jerusalem is much more endurable than at any portion of the Atlantic coast of the United States from Maine to Texas. This is due to a northwesterly breeze which uniformly springs up as soon as the ground becomes somewhat heated, about eight or nine o'clock in the morning, and continues till ten at night.

"The greatest amount of rain tabled in any year during the period of observation is 36 inches, which fell in the year 1860-61. The average annual fall of rain throughout the United States is about 45 inches. In California it averages only about 20 inches per annum."

Thus we see that we have about one-fourth more rain in Palestine than in the Atlantic portion of the United States; and two and one-half times more than in California, even at the lowest estimate.—Mrs. A. E. Davis, in New Age, Attalla, Ala.

THE TIME OF THE END.

This is a very important subject and it is well for us to understand the order of events as they are presented to us in the Scriptures. Without knowing something of the order of events that are evidently soon to occur in this world, we may be intensely interested, looking for something to occur immediately, when there are other important events which will occur previously to the one we are expecting. In regard to the second coming of the Lord Jesus, we are evidently nearing the time when the Lord will come into the air which surrounds this, our globe, and raise up his own people who are, by him, counted worthy of the first resurrection, and to change the living ones who are found worthy to obtain that great favor, into immortal beings; that both living and sleeping ones may go out together and meet the Lord in the air. The exact time knoweth no man; watch ye therefore.

There is another great event that is to occur at the same time, or about the same time, and that is the exact time when the children of Israel shall come in possession of their own promised land. "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the time of the Gentiles be fulfilled." Luke xxi. 24. Jerusalem is yet trodden down of the Gentiles; it is yet made desolate by the abomination. This will continue for a set time. Selah Merrill's statement as presented in THE RESTITUTION of Jan. 13th, by Brother Colegrove, tells us the present condition of the Land of Promise. We will make one quotation: "Everything in Palestine is embarrassed and restrained by the jealous and despotic Turkish Government, and there has been of late a marked increase of restriction and impediments to the settlement of the country. Turkey is opposed to Jewish colonization. More than a hundred schools have been recently discontinued." Now when this treading down Gentile rule shall cease, we shall all know it. The Israelites will know it and be will be the one to go in and take possession. He will then improve the country, build up the waste places, plant vineyards, build houses and cities, and dwell safely in unwalled villages. For this certainly is their prosperous and peaceful condition when Gog from the north countries shall come up against them to take a spoil. Ezek. xxxviii 8, 11, 12.

It is proper to say here that this will only be a partial gathering of the Jewish people, as many of them will remain scattered among the nations until after the Lord actually appears to his own ancient people and they receive him. When this abomination that continues the desolation shall come to an end, according to Daniel, we understand the first resurrection shall occur. Michael shall stand up for the children of the people and a time of trouble begins. "Come my people enter thou into thy chambers and shut thy doors about thee; hide thyself, as it were, for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast. For behold the Lord cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity; the earth also shall disclose her blood and shall no more cover her slain." Isa. xxvi. 20, 21.

While the saints are called out of the world into their chambers for a little while, the Israelites will come into possession of their own land for safety, while the Gentile nations will suffer from wars and pestilence and famines. "I will call for a sword upon all the inhabitants of the earth. The Lord hath a controversy with all flesh. Evil shall go forth from nation to nation, and a great whirlwind shall be raised up from the coasts of the earth. And the slain of the Lord shall be at that day from one end of the earth even unto the other end of the earth, they shall not be lamented, neither gathered nor buried; they shall be dung upon the ground." Jer. xxv.

At the close of this great tribulation or I should say to close up this time of trouble among all nations, Gog with all his bands, with a great army from the north parts, shall come up against the land of Palestine, against God's ancient people, and cover the land with a cloud. It shall be in the latter days. And it shall come to pass at the same time when Gog shall come against the land of Israel, saith the Lord God, that my fury shall come up in my face. And I will call for a sword against him through all my mountains, saith the Lord God. Every man's sword shall be against his brother, and I will plead against him with pestilence and with blood, and I will rain upon him and upon the many people that are with him an overflowing rain, and great hail stones, fire, and brimstone. Thus will I magnify myself and sanctify myself; and I will be known in the eyes of many nations, and they shall know that I am the Lord. Ezek. xxxviii. This is the battle of Armageddon. We need not expect that great battle until that time, nor need we look for it outside of the land of Judea.

This great battle is vividly described by the prophet Joel. "For behold in those days, and in that time, when I shall bring again the captivity of Judah and Jerusalem, I will also gather all nations, and I will bring them down into the valley of Jehoshaphat, and will plead with them there for my people and for my heritage Israel, whom they have scattered among the nations and parted my land." iii. 1, 2. Just at this time the Lord will appear with his saints, those he has gathered to himself at the beginning of this great tribulation. The length of time of this tribulation is thought by many to be seven years. It may be a space of forty years. Let the time be longer or shorter, it is certainly before us, and the busy and wicked world knoweth it not.

As Gog and Magog with all their hands are besieging Jerusalem, the prophet Joel describes the return of the Lord and his saints in this language, "Thither cause thy mighty ones to come down, O Lord." He also continues and says, "The Lord also shall roar out of Zion and utter his voice from Jerusalem, and the heavens and the earth shall shake; but the Lord shall be the hope of his people, and the strength of the children of Israel." vs. 16. Zacharish giving an account of the same, says, "And it shall come to pass in that day that I will seek to destroy all the nations that come against Jerusalem. And I will pour upon the house of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem the spirit of grace and of supplication; and they shall look upon me whom they have pierced." xii. 9, 10. "And one shall say unto him, what are these wounds in thy hands? Then he shall answer, those with which I was wounded in the house of my friends." xiii 6.

While the Jews are in such distress from being besieged by an immense Russian army, the Lord returns and destroys the army. The Jews will look upon their great Deliverer and make inquiries of him, and he fully convinced that he is the one that they and their fathers have said, "We will not have this man to rule over us." He will there in great mercy, which he has promised that people, pour upon them the spirit of supplication, and they will then repent of their great sin in much sorrow. To resume:

First 1. The fall of the Turkish power.

2. A partial restoration of the Israelitish nation.

3 The rapture of the saints. The first resurrection. The meeting of the Lord in the air.

Second. The period of distress of nations. Probably seven years, or it may be forty years.

Third. 1 The great Russian invasion of the promised land, associated with European and Asiatic nations.

2. The return of the Lord and his saints.

3. The destruction of the invading and besieging army.

4. The recognition of Jesus by the Jews. They are convinced.

5. The spirit of supplication poured upon them. Their repentance.

6. The restitution of the rest of the children of Israel.

Following these things will be the subjection of the Gentile nations, and their being brought into the kingdom of the Lord of the whole earth. This period, ushered by the two great events, the rapture of the saints and their return to the earth with their Lord, is the connecting link between the gospel age now nearing to a close, and the kingdom of heaven which shall follow and fill all the earth, and restore the people who submit to the government, to the Adamic state or condition before the fall. This is the kingdom for which we are to pray and expect.

The Book of Jubah, called Jub, Son of Zare, Son of Hragnel, Son of Henav, Son of Isaac, Son of Habraam.—According to the Septuagint.

CHAP. XXXV.

1. And Eliuo, taking up the discourse, still further saith,

2 What is this thou hast signed in a judicial way? Who are thou, that hast said, I am just (right) in the sight of the Lord?

4. I will give thee and thy three friends an answer.

5. Look up towards the heavens and see; learn to understand the clouds, how high they are above thee.

6 If thou hast sinned, what are thou going to do about it? And if thou hast transgressed many times, what canst thou do to affect it?

7. On the other hand though, since thou art just, what will thou render unto him, or what shall he receive from thy hand?

8 Thy irreverence is that of a man like to thee, and thy righteousness is that of a son of man.

9. When elevated of abundance they will cry out; they will call for help from the arm of the multitude.

10 And he hath not said, where is the God who made me, who act in order the guardians of the night;

11 Who drew a line of demarkation between me and the four-footed of the earth, and the flying things of the heavens?

12. There shall they cry out and they will not hearken even to the roars of the wicked.

13. For the Lord doth not purpose to look at out-of-the-way places, though he is the Almighty seer

14. Of those who are consummating their transgressions, and he will save me; and do thou judge in his sight whether thou art able to praise him as he is.

The report of an interview with Consul Merrill evidently is a damper for some of the friends. While Mrs. Davis and others of her spirit saw hopeful signs of the speedy regeneration of Jerusalem and the Holy Land, Consul Merrill sees little or nothing of any such indications, and so far as appears is not much interested in this matter. The fact that first class Consuls are a new thing in Jerusalem, or that 1843 was the first time in modern history the Christian governments established them and made a new era for that city, is forgotten. He says commerce does not call for railroads; neither did it call for Consuls, but the time to favor Zion came and with it Consuls, and some one says they were kings in Jeshrun and could and did protect those who wished to reside there. In former days the Turks would care nothing for Consuls—no one was safe from violence. The commerce of the Holy City did not produce the bloodiest war of our times between Turkey, Russia, England, France and Sardinia, but disputes relating to Jerusalem did. "Ye that make mention of the Lord keep not silence and give him no rest until he establish Jerusalem, until he make it a praise in the earth."

Conference Report.

Thinking perhaps the brethren of like precious faith would like to hear the report of the Michigan Quarterly Conference, I will enclose the following. We met according to announcement at Byron Center, Jan. 21; meeting called to order by Brother Musse, Vice President. There was a goodly number present in spite of the inclemency of the weather. The preaching was principally done by Elder W. Houser and B. W. Woodward, though Elders Winchester and Bennett worked nobly for their Master, and in the several prayer and social meetings nearly all took part, telling of their hopes and their joys, and all felt that God's presence was with them. One sister made a start for that eternal home. May the good Lord help her to go on in the straight and narrow path that we may meet her beyond the shores of sin, death and sorrow.

Conference closed with the commemoration of our dear Savior's death and sufferings. Brethren let us be faithful, for the King in his beauty will come. Are you doing the best you can? Have you made your robes white in the blood of the Lamb? If not, now is the time, while Christ, earth's great Attorney, is ready to plead your case before the high courts of heaven. For soon these mortal eyes are to look on Christ and that immortal land, these mortal hands clasp the hands of loved ones on the other shore. These mortal ears are to catch the strains of the golden harp touched by angel fingers, and these feet are to walk the golden streets of the New Jerusalem.

K. N. WOODWARD, Sec.

BILL.—At Millbrook, Mich., Jan. 7, 1887, Richard Henry Hill, only son of John and Ida Hill, aged 10 years and 4 months.

His death was caused by injuries sustained from catching his foot in a horse-power while helping his father out feed. Richie was a bright boy, full of ambition and business beyond his years, modest, quiet and thoughtful. Brother and Sister Hill feel almost crushed by this dispensation of our Father's providence, and have the heartfelt sympathy of the brethren and sisters and friends. But they have hope of soon seeing Richie where sin and the curse will never part loved ones again. Sermon by Brother John Bower; text, 2 Kings iv. 26.

Jewish Conversions.

Professor Tholuck expresses the opinion that more Jews have been converted to Christ during the present century than during the whole of the Christian era previous. Dr. Pierson makes the following interesting statement in the Homeletic Review.

In one way or another, according to a recent writer, as many as 1,500 Jews leave the Synagogue for the Church of Christ every year. It is estimated that there are 3,000 converts from Judaism in the Church of England, and more than 100 of them ordained clergymen; in London (Trinity Sunday) five more were ordained. Rebbi Zadoc-Kuhn, of Paris, thinks that Judaism as a religion is on the wane. Sooner or later the Jews will merge with the populations among which they dwell. "This admission," says the Grand Rabbi, "is painful to me; but the fact is undeniable." The influx of Jews from Roumania and Russia into Jerusalem continues. Judging from Jewish emigration to Palestine during the last four years, the return of the Jews to their own land is happening before our eyes. The financial power they wield in this country and England is well known. M. Drumont states that they control the railways and banks of France, and, with a single exception, all the great journals of Paris. The secret of the late Tonquin war that cost France $150,000,000, is said to be that the trade of that country had been farmed out to a Jewish syndicate.

Any one sending us a new subscriber for 1887, and the subscription price of $2.00, may select books or tracts to the amount of 75 cents from our list, and they will be sent them free, postpaid. Sample copies of THE RESTITUTION furnished on application.

The CHRISTIAN HYMNAL.

The above is the Title of our New Hymn Book, which will contain about one hundred and sixty pages. The book will be handsomely bound in Cloth, printed on good paper, and nice clear type. We expect to be able to present the book to our friends in a very short time. Single copies will be sold at 75 cents each. One dozen copies at 60 cents each. In lots of fifty at 50 cents each.

PLEDGES.

We want to know how large an edition to print, and for that reason now ask our friends to send us pledges the number of books they want, and we can thus get an idea of the number it will be necessary to issue. We do not want your money now, only the number of copies you will take. Send at once. Address

EXPLANATION OF LABEL MARKS.

Some having complained that they do not know what the marks on labels mean, we will just say, "Jny" means January, and when it is followed by a figure "6" and reads "Jny6" it means your subscription expired the first day of January, 1886. "Feb" February, "Mar" March, "Apr" April, and "May" are well understood, but "Jun" meaning June seems to confuse some, and to be taken to mean January. "Jun" means June. "Jul" is July, "Aug" August, "Sep" September, "Oct" October, "Nov" November, and "Dec" December. The figure following the month stands for the year, "1" means 1881, "2" means 1882, etc. A postal card of inquiry will bring you any information you wish.

The church of God at Cleveland, O., will hold meetings at Odeon, st. every Sunday (D. P. in Bland and Heller's Block, Room 66, 67 & 68 Osborn Street, Corner of Bolivar, north of Central Market. Seats free. Brethren from abroad of like faith and all searchers after truth are welcome.

"The Gospel of Our Salvation and Kindred doctrines—as life only through Christ—Resurrection of the dead—Second coming of Christ—The Elect, sons of God, etc., will be faithfully preached every Sunday morning at 10.30 A. M., to which services we heartily invite the seeker after divine truth. This service will close at 11.30 after which the church will meet for conference, "breaking of bread and prayers." 178 Grand st., cor. East Expr., Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE BURDEN-BEARER.

Christian, when thy way seems darkest,
When thine eyes with tears are dim,
Straight to God, thy Father, hasten;
Tell thy troubles all to Him;
Not to human ear confiding
Thy sad tale of grief and care,
But before thy Father kneeling,
Pour out all thy sorrows there.

Sympathy of friends may cheer thee
When the fierce wild storm has burst
But that only can console thee
When it breaks upon the first:
Go with words, or tears, or silence,
Only lay thee at his feet,
Then shalt prove how great his pity,
And his tenderness how sweet

Think, too, thy Divine Redeemer
Knows, as thou canst never know,
All the deepest depths of anguish
All the weight of human woe;
And though now in glory seated,
He can hear the feeblest cry—
Even hear the stifled sighing
Of thy dumb heart's agony.

All thy griefs or like are witnessed
Needful is each one for thee;
Every tear by him is counted
One too many there cannot be;
And if while thy heart is breaking,
Thou canst own He way is right,
Then each bitter tear of anguish
Pearl long to the Jewels bright.

Far too well thy Savior knows thee,
To allow thy life to be
One long, even, sunless journey—
One unruffled, tranquil sea:
He would have thee fondly nestle
Closer in his loving breast:
He would have that we should seek for Rest
Where alone is perfect rest.

Though his wise and loving purpose
Clearly [illegible] not,
Still believe with calm assurance,
All will work for good to thee:
Therefore when thy way is gloomy,
And thine eyes with tears are dim,
Straight to God, thy Father, hasten,
Tell thy sorrow all to Him

"SCIENCE AND HEALTH."

"Science and Health" is the name for a book of over 500 pages, by Mrs. Mary Baker G. Eddy, President of the Massachusetts Metaphysical College. It is the exposition of her mode of curing all disease, sin and death. While reading it through we were struck with many statements that are true in themselves, although we cannot accept the applications of them by Mrs. Eddy. Her key to the Scriptures is so thoroughly artificial and clumsy as to render it of no value in determining their meaning. In common with many other expositions which we have read, to us it would prove a perfect hindrance rather than a help. Falsehood lies at the bottom of the science, as it is assumed that the terms, sin, disease and death are names of things which have no real existence and that their cure is effected the instant the patient is made to believe that there is no such disease as he supposes he is suffering from. As Mrs. Eddy claims that her science is divine, and is perfect harmony with God's revelation to man, it calls for the attention of all who believe that revelation. We have been instructed to prove all things and hold fast that which is good. This advice presupposes that we can prove all things and discern that which is good from that which is bad.

Let us try to apply this rule to the case before us. There are three things, viz., sin, disease, and death treated of in this book. First in order is sin. What is sin according to Mrs. Eddy? On page 14 she states, "Sin, sickness and death are comprised in a belief in matter. Because spirit is real and harmonious, everything inharmonious—sin, sickness, death—is the opposite of spirit and must be the contradiction of reality, must be unreal as Scripture states it, dust returns to dust, the unreal relapses into unreality."

According to this statement, "Sin, sickness, death, are compressed in a belief in matter." Sin is a belief in matter so that every one who believes in matter sins or is sick or dies as the case may be. Apart therefore from a belief in matter, there is neither sin, sickness nor death in existence. According to Scripture death has existed and reigned over mankind for nearly six thousand years, but we have not found where the cause of death is attributed to a belief in matter.

In Gen. iii. 17 we read, "And to Adam he said, because thou hast hearkened to the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree of which I commanded thee, saying, thou shalt not eat of it, cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life; thorns, also, and thistles shall it bring forth to thee, and thou shalt eat the herb of the field; in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread until thou return unto the ground, for out of it wast thou taken; for dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return."

This passage contains the best refutation that is possible of the science of Mrs. Eddy. The sin of Adam, as confessed by himself was first his hearkening to the voice of his wife and second, his eating of the tree of which God commanded him, saying, thou shalt not eat of it. These two acts, not beliefs, hearkening to his wife in preference to his Creator, eating of the tree of which he was forbidden. Hearkening here has the sense of obeying, and therefore Adam was obedient to his wife and disobedient to his Creator. If he believed in matter in the sense defined by Mrs. Eddy it is not charged against him.

His sin, therefore, as recorded against him, was disobedience of the command of Jehovah his Creator. Paul in the New Testament affirms the same thing when he wrote, "Wherefore as by one man sin entered into the world and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men for that all have sinned." Rom. v. 12. Again he says, "For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead." 1 Cor. xv. 21. Under the old and new dispensations, therefore, it was accepted that death came by man as the wage for his disobedience. Mrs. Eddy has classified sin, sickness and death together as if they were the effects resulting from belief and in themselves having no real existence. It is impossible for us to accept of her statement and also of the Scripture one, as in the Scriptures nothing is more clearly denied than that sin is a cause and not an effect, simply, whereas she makes it an effect the same as sickness and death.

A mistake as to the disease leads to a mistake in the attempt to cure it. Disobedience being a criminal act no physical operation is needed to cure it. Disease and death are both the wages of sin and hence to forgive sin is equal to heal the disease which was inflicted because of it, and to heal the disease is equal to forgive the sin. Such is the teaching of Jesus upon this matter. But (said he to those who denied his power) that ye may know that the Son of man hath power upon earth to forgive sins, he said unto the sick of the palsy, "I say unto thee, arise, take up thy bed and go thy way into thy house." Mark ii. 10, 11.

The power to heal the sick and the power to forgive the sin which was the cause of the disease, reside in the same one. But sin is not a disease; it is a crime which calls for punishment in every case. Every man can stop the practice of sin at any moment he pleases; but no man can either cure disease nor deliver himself from death if he has sinned. Just as the scar marks the place of a wound, so does the sickness remain even though forgiven and healed. Sin is a human act against God, sickness and death are divine acts against man. To affirm as Mrs. Eddy repeatedly does that sin, sickness and death, are human acts, manifests confusion in the very rudiments of Divine Science.

Jehovah reserves to himself the infliction of punishment for sins against him. "See now (he says) that I, even I, am he and there is no God with me; I kill and make alive. I wound and I heal, neither is there any that can deliver out of my hand. For I lift up my hands to heaven and say I live for ever. If I whet my glittering sword, and mine hand take hold on judgment I will render vengeance to mine enemies and will reward them that hate me. I will make mine arrows drunk with blood, and my sword shall devour flesh; and that with the blood of the slain and of the captives from the beginning of revenges upon the enemy. Rejoice, O ye nations, his people: for he will avenge the blood of his servants and will render vengeance to his adversaries, and will be merciful unto his land and to his people. Deut. xxxii. 40, 41, 42, 43.

Nothing can be clearer than his other statement in chap. xxviii. 15. "But it shall come to pass if thou wilt not hearken unto the voice of Jehovah thy God to observe to do all his commandments and his statutes which I command thee this day, that all these curses shall come upon thee, and overtake thee." Among the enumerated things are consumption, fever, inflamation, extreme burning, the boils of Egypt, emerods, scab, and itch, madness, blindness, and astonishment of heart, of which it is affirmed "The Lord shall smite them, verse 27. These statements are so simple and frequently repeated in different forms that a child can understand them. Take one more closing appeal by Jehovah, "I call heaven and earth to record this day against you, that I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing; therefore, choose life, that thou and thy seed may live," Deut. xxx. 19.

Seven hundred years after we find the Lord expostulating with their descendants. Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth; for the Lord hath spoken, I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me. The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib; Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider. Why should ye be stricken any more? Ye will revolt more and more, the whole head is sick and the whole heart faint, from the sole of the foot even unto the head there is no soundness in it; but wounds, and bruises, and putrifying sores, they have not been closed, neither bound up, neither mollified with ointment," Isa. i. 2.

Seven hundred years after Isaiah, when the Lord Jesus appeared, he effectively illustrated the Divine Salience of removing sin, disease and death. He, however, treated each of them as real and not as the effect of any belief. He forgave sins, he healed the sick, and raised the dead to life. Before Mrs. Eddy has any just claim to be a co worker with him she must abandon the untruthful affirmation that sin, sickness, and death, are unreal, and simply the effects of a belief in matter. We do not can bring back from the death state, one who has been really dead, her claims to the possession of the Divine Science for healing the sick, sin and death which have been visited upon the human family for their sins will be entitled to a respectable hearing; but to treat the uniform experience of mankind for six thousand years, as unreal, is to classify herself with those who of old healed the hurt of God's people slightly by affirming health and peace where they are not.

The First Resurrection.

According to Paul's letters to the Thessalonians, when Christ comes the suffering children of God shall find rest, and Jesus shall be glorified in his saints, and admired in all them that believe, 2 Thess. i. 7, 10. Then the dead in Christ shall rise first, and those who are alive shall be changed in a moment in the twinkling of an eye, and be caught up together with them in clouds to meet the Lord in the air to be with him for ever, 1 Thess. iv. 16, 17; 1 Cor. xv. 51, 52. We also find occasional expressions with reference to "a better resurrection," a "resurrection of the just," Heb. xi. 35; Luke xiv. 14. The Lord makes mention of a resurrection in which all will not have a part, but only those who are "counted worthy," and specifies it as the resurrection which is not to be among the dead (tes anastaseos tes ek nekron, Luke xx. 35). And the Apostle Paul counts all things but dross, that he might gain Christ, and that by any means he might attain unto the "out-resurrection," "out from [or from among] the dead" (eis ten exanastasin ten ek nekron)—thus Tischendorf, supported by overwhelming manuscript authority, Phil. iii. 8, 11.

Against this translation it is objected that the preposition ek, with the primary signification out of, or from, at times is used almost without any meaning, when it occurs in composition as here, especially in latter Greek: and that exanastasis, if out of is included in it at all, may mean out of or from the earth, as the sphere or region of the dead, and hence the whole expression means simply the resurrection of the dead. But that such a translation robs the text of its true significance seems to us evident for the following reasons:—

1. The primary meaning of ek so generally and tenaciously clings to it, that it cannot very well be entirely got rid of where some element can enter the thought as the sphere or cause out of which or from which the thing spoken of could come. In the phrase ek nekron the dead may be thought of in mass. Out of that mass a resurrection takes place. In Paul's expression, where ek occurs twice, the same idea is then strengthened, so that we have an out-resurrection, not from the earth, but as he himself says, "out from the dead." A similar expression occurs in Acts xx. 6, where pharisaic teachers are mentioned, which according to the text "out-rose" (exanestesan), i. e., rose out from the company to which they belonged—the church—and proclaimed unphrisaic doctrine. Here Dan. xii. 2 may be considered. Even were this passage to be translated as it generally is in our Bible, it does not contradict the doctrine of two resurrections, separated by a long period of time, since here, as often in prophecy, the element of time is entirely excluded. But this passage may indeed aid our interpretation, since it may be literally translated thus: "And many from among the sleepers of the land of dust shall awake: these unto everlasting life; but those unto shame, unto everlasting abhorrence." Here we find the preposition min, out of, from, (primarily in a partative sense, as when a part is taken out from the whole), combined with the plural of ge'hon, one also plural of geh, sleeper: hence many out of, or from among the sleepers, shall awake. The sphere from which the awakened come is the sleepers, the dead, not the earth. And since this is an awakening from among the sleepers, it follows that some remain who do not now awake, but later, as indicated by the connection, and as seen in Rev. xx. 5, 12, 13.

2. Whenever the resurrection in general is spoken of, ek is never used, only anastasis nekron, the resurrection of the dead. But the preposition ceases in reference to Christ's resurrection, 1 Cor. xv. 12, 20; 1 Pet. i. 3, which was out from the dead, and also of the raising of Lazarus, Heavens out from the dead, John xii. 1.

3. It is evident that Paul needed not to exert himself to attain unto the resurrection of the dead merely; for to it all must come, even the most ungodly. But he needed to be in fullest earnest in order to be sure of a part in the resurrection of those "who are Christ's at his coming." It is therefore of this resurrection he thinks, and which he calls "the out-resurrection, out from the dead," indicating thereby its priority in time. Thus the Bible teaches a double resurrection; one of the righteous, at the coming of the Lord; and one of the dead, at the final consummation.—Dr. Edgren of Adventist Union College, Chicago.

EARL OF ROCHESTER.

The witty Earl of Rochester happened to be in company with King Charles II. his Queen, Chaplain, and some of his ministers of State. After they had been discoursing on public business, the King, of a sudden, exclaimed—"Come, let us unbend our thoughts from the cares of State, and drink as a glass of wine, which cheereth, as the Scripture saith, both God and man." The Queen hearing this, modestly said, she thought there could be no such text in the Scripture: and that the idea seemed to her to be little less than blasphemy. The King replied, that he was not prepared to turn to chapter and verse; but was pretty sure that he had met with it somewhere in the Scripture reading. The Chaplain was appealed to and he was of the same opinion of the Queen. Rochester suspecting the King to be right, and being no friend to the Chaplain, slipped out of the room, to inquire among the servants if any of them were conversant with the Bible. They named David, the Scots cook, who always carried a Bible about him; and David being called, recollected both the text, and where to find it. Rochester ordered him to be in waiting, and returned to the King. This text was still the topic of conversation; and Rochester moved to call David, who, he said, he found was well acquainted with the Scriptures. David appeared, and being asked the question, produced his Bible, and read the text (Judges ix. 13) The King smiled, the Queen asked pardon, and the Chaplain blushed. Rochester now asked the doctor if he could interprot the text, since it was produced; but he was mute. He therefore requested David to interpret it, who immediately replied, "How much wine cheereth mine your lordship knows; and to show you how much it cheereth God, I beg leave to remind you that, under the Old Testament dispensation, there were meat offerings and drink offerings. The latter consisted of wine, which was typical of the blood of the Mediator; which, by a metaphor, was said to cheer God, as he was well pleased in the way of salvation that he had appointed; whereby his justice was satisfied, his law fulfilled, his mercy reigned, his grace triumphed, all the divine perfections harmonized, the sinner was saved, and God in Christ glorified." The King was agreeably surprised at this unexpected and sensible exposition: Rochester applauded and after some sarcastic reflection upon the Chaplain, very gravely moved that his Majesty would be pleased to make the Chaplain his cook, and the cook his Chaplain.

Professor Ewing, of Strasburg, has, amid many dangers and with extreme labor, traveled through the heart of Arabia, in order to search for old inscriptions. He reports some interesting items concerning the water in that great country. For eight long months he did not see a drop of flowing water, with the exception of one small shower, and only at the end of his route did he meet with a living well at El Ola, whose water, however, flows only 300 metres and then is lost in the sand. All other water disappears in the ground as soon as it falls from the clouds. As pumps are unknown, ditches are dug, and in these, as also in bags, the water is kept. All those places where experience of the past has taught that water can be kept all the year round have been taken by the few villages scattered about as their own property. Thus, for instance, Hajel, the capital of the Shammar country, a city of 13,000 inhabitants, possesses about seventy wells with an average depth of thirty metres. These are all "drawn" by camels, which draw the leather buckets out of the wells by means of ropes over wooden rollers. The water in nearly all of these wells is very warm, and before it can be used for drinking it is cooled. The greatest and most famous well in Arabia is that of Teima, in the Hedjaz. This well is mentioned already in Isa. xxi. 14: "The inhabitants of the land of Tema brought water to him that was thirsty." The Bedouins asked the professor if they had such wonderful fountains in Germany. When the answer was given that in this land there were more than 4000 rivers and streams of all sorts that never dried up, and that the whole land was like a garden, the obstinate Tema said, "If all this is true that you say concerning your country, why then did you ever leave it? And then, where there are no camels, no dates, no Bedouins, and where there is no liberty to wander back and forth over the whole land, is that a country worth having?"—Old Testament Student.

The Law, the Covenants, and the Sabbath.

—By L. C. THOMAS.—

Title page.—The Law, the Covenants; and the Sabbath. Also an Epitome of the Great Salvation; and an Appendix including various other subjects, in brief.

The perfect unchangeable moral law is considered and shown to be the basis and spirit of the old Mosaic law, now dead in its entirety. The law of Moses and law of Christ are compared and contrasted, and the relation of both to the old and new covenants is treated at some length. The Sabbath question is carefully and lengthily examined, and presented and treated in a somewhat new light.

The work also includes the consideration of Sunday, conditional immortality, the gospel, return of the Jews, the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, punishment of the wicked, the state of the dead, the new birth, the one faith, the one hope, the image of God, nature of Christ, the name, the religion, morality, christianity, etc. This work contains 330 pages. Cloth bound. Price $1.00. Orders may be sent to THE RESTITUTION Office.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXVI. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, FEBRUARY 9, 1887. NO. 6.

THE RESTITUTION

Terms—TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

Payable in advance. Three and Six Months the same rate.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for that salvation.

HAPPY IN DEATH.—No. I.

"The end of every man is declarative of the end of every man."—Ancient.

Those who are Christians indeed have peace with God in their hearts, and may well expect it to abide with them during life's closing moments. It will cause their end to be tranquil, even in the midst of corporeal suffering. Friends look on without surprise, for they count on such an exit as the befitting termination of a godly career. It is a solemn time, and a helpless one, so far as finite aid is concerned. Then, what virtue is in religion will be strikingly discovered, enabling him who has chosen Christ as his eternal friend to meet the last crisis in this stage of his being with a resigned and trustful spirit. God's grace is sufficient for life, and may we not be positive that it is equally sufficient for death? Countless testimonies have been given by those around whom the final shadows were gathering, that the Divine words and grace were then as powerful as they had found them cheering and invigorating while engaged in active Christian duty, or in bearing trials that made them acquainted with anguish, and sometimes in the mind.

But there is said to be a higher state than that of peace, which from its very nature is always serene. Peace with God never takes the form of elevated or beatified emotion. Its type in nature is the ocean when sunny and unruffled by the tiniest wave. But the higher state is described as having a triumphant ingredient in its composition. It seems a foretaste of Paradise; every care is banished, and only something like angelic rapture is known. Let us call this happiness, or intense happiness—a condition far above the peace already spoken of, and which may be described as the ordinary characteristic of a saintly death. The other is exceptional, and those who have risen on its heights are held to have been especially favored by him who is supposed to have, even here, special marks of approval for an order of his worshipers.

The condition we have described as "happiness," is not always attended, however, with the striking peculiarities noted by us. Essentially more positive than mere peace, it may not ascend to triumph or Elysian ecstasy; nevertheless it is always exquisite and absorbing. The whole being appears to be enveloped in a celestial atmosphere; earth fades from the view, and unseen, transcendent realities, like an immediate Divine afflatus, hold mastery over the thoughts and the imagination.

This exalted consciousness, as might have been expected, has received its glorification in poetry. One Author, taking it, without warrant, as a general characteristic, represents "the dying Christian" as saying to himself,—"I mount, I fly," thereby not merely intimating a conviction that he was about to spread his wings heavenwards, but that while contemplating his ascension he was on an elevated plain of blissful emotion.

In this life the man of sincere piety finds himself near his God, a most enviable privilege, he sometimes the sense of nearness will be more complete when he enters the "Land o' the Leal," and now that he is only, as he thinks, a brief distance from the delectable coast, is it not an anticipation capable of dilating his inmost being with ethereal transport? All do not mount to the fellicity of the anticipation, but when it is an unquestioned hope, how can any one fail to be enraptured as he endeavors, with what mental vigor still remains with him in the decline of physical power, to realize the import of the words,—"Nearer, my God, to Thee?" Thus, we venture to write, is the natural order of things, by Heaven's favor, if the expectation, whence the joyous feelings have their birth, has an explicit warrant in the Volume of Truth. Then "the soft pillow-reach leave, home, brothers Loved

Another element that may yield its own measure of felicity during the eventful crisis, is wrought into these sad kindred lines: —

"A murmur waft-d from that glorious shore,
Of streams that water banks for ever fair,
And voices of thy loved ones gone before,
More musical in that celestial air."

If the murmurs and voices are heard on some propitious moments in life, they are more likely to be audible when the dying are in urgent need of solace from behind the impenetrable curtain. The assurance that "the loved ones gone before" are so close at hand, that their tones of sympathy and exultation may be distinctly recognized across the narrow intervening space, may well uphold one laid low in his last extremity, and impart to his mind an illumination and joy, above and beyond everything hitherto known. It appeals to the heart, and, as with a spell of enchantment, one bold and electrify the tenderest sensibilities, which suffered acutely in the past, and still yearn for a renewal of the intercourse, rudely broken when perhaps everything was gleaming in roseate hues. Holding firmly the belief on which the poetry stands, one is certain to be affected by it, in proportion to the inherent strength of the creed, and the impressibility of him who exposes himself freely to its influence. Even were it a fancy, and nothing more, it has all the weight and vital energy of a fact, because it is not viewed as a fond and delusive product of the imagination, but as an actuality in the arrangements of the universe, and the destiny of the human race.

Experience of this nature, it is expedient to remark, is not necessarily Christian, or even pious, for while many who love Jesus hold the faith it involves, and partake of its correlated joy in life and when vitality is all but exhausted, others who utterly ignore Christianity, and have at most only a speculative recognition of a Supreme Power, come not behind any of the godly in the bright expectation of meeting again, and soon, those who have preceded them in the awful transition from time into the unseen world, and still remain imperishably dear to their hearts. In some cases, greatly to be deplored by every pious soul, this is not so much a possible ingredient in their welcome chalice on the eve of departing hence, as to all appearance, the totality of what comfort they share in crossing the bourne from which no traveller returns. Not God, not Christ, but their loved ones in the heaven of their choice and hope. Painful as the fact may be, there is, as we judge, no lack of power in their belief to exalt anticipation.

Were a professing Christian, when near dissolution, to say to his friends, "I am so happy," they would likely feel that the strongest possible evidence of his salvation was left to console them in their approaching bereavement. The happiness would be taken as a demonstration that all was well with him. Each of them might even form this inward prayer, "May my last end be like his!"

Here there rises to my memory a case exactly in point, and it may be profitably to narrate it briefly in this place. It was that of a man, far advanced in years, and who, after months of suffering, lay for a short time previous to the closing event exempt from all pain, and in a state of emotion remarkably pleasant. To those attending on him, he again and again said, "I am so happy;" and the expression of his countenance exactly corresponded with its inmost consciousness, as revealed by himself. He had no fear of death, and, in fact, rested quietly enjoying the most delightful sensations. Those waiting on him drew great solace from his condition of mind; he was dying happy—remarkably happy—what more could be desired? Conversing with one who had watched with tender anxiety at his bedside till all was over, the writer of these pages learnt the above details, and a little more that should not be omitted. It was notable that the individual referred to never assigned any reason for his happiness; he merely said "I am so happy," and while he was in that state life went out as gently as could be desired. "Did he never on any previous occasion intimate what consolation he had in view of dying?" "Oh, yes," was the reply; "I recollect he did tell me how comforting it was to him, now that his end was near, that he had been so successful in life, that he had brought up his family well, and that he would leave ample means to those who had long been his care." There was, it will be observed, no mention of the Savior more than if he had not been needed, or never heard of; and from anything I gathered at any period from himself, or from those most intimate with him, he furnished at no time any evidence that he was living for God and with hope in the world. And yet his end was a happy one, and the happiness was, I confess, a mystery to me. It has occupied my thoughts on many a day, and the result of my inquiries into such a phenomenon may help others to understand the matter, and perhaps suggest a timely warning to some who have thought a happy death is necessarily a Christian one, in the proper sense of the word. W. G. MONCRIEFF.

[To be Concluded in our next.]

To the Church of God in Christ Jesus, Greeting.

"For as in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive." 1 Cor. xv. 22.

The above text embodies two very important and leading thoughts, to which I wish briefly to call your attention; hoping thus to lead some at least, into the light of the truth who are in danger of falling into gross error by misapprehension of the truth here taught.

The first clause—"For as in Adam all die," is so comprehensive and absolute in its grasp, that it may not be set aside, or misunderstood. But there are thoughts leading out from this positive assertion of inspiration which seem to be generally overlooked, but which, when duly considered, must prove enlightening to those who desire the truth for its own sake.

First, then, I suggest, How came we all to be in Adam? To that query there can be but one reply, viz. We came to be possessed of Adamic nature—natural, human bodies, through generation, i. e., begettal, conception and birth.

Second, I suggest, How is it that all who are in Adam,—in the Adamic nature—die? To this I reply that the Creator has ordained as one of his immutable laws, that "like begets like." Adam was a mortal dying man, and hence all who have, or ever will come into existence by natural generation from him through his descendants, must of necessity possess just such a nature as their progenitor. No one looking out upon the living world will deny the fact, that generation is the only possible means by which anyone can get into Adam—become possessed of the Adamic nature. However near in point of instinct or intelligence, the higher orders of animals may approach the human, they are never by inspiration, nor yet by common consent, acknowledged to stand on the human plane. The impassable gulf has ever been, and so will continue to be, an impregnable barrier between them. The race will continue to die; simply because they are of mortal nature, incapable of continued existence.

Note here, before we pass on that no other branch of the animal creation is embraced in this clause of the text, because they did not enter the Adamic nature through the only means ordained, viz: generation.

Now let us consider the next clause, "So also in the Christ shall all be made alive." All who accept the Word of truth as the Revelation of the Most High, admit that Adam was the beginning of the present human creation. Through transgression he proved unworthy an endless existence, and thus came death into the world; which was created to abide forever. God, whose ways are "known unto him from the beginning" designed an agent through whom the descendants of Adam might be re-generated, and thereby, qualified to enjoy endless life upon an ever abiding earth.

That agent he gave promise of in Gen. iii. 15, as the seed who should prove the final victor over all evil. And Jehovah manifested this agent; when in the "fulness of time" he brought his only begotten Son into the world through the agency of woman, and constituted him the beginning of a new creation.

The means Jehovah ordained whereby the children of Adam might be regenerated, or brought into the Christ nature, was simply faith in his Son, John vi. 40. "For this is the will of my Father, that every one that beholdeth the Son and believeth on him, should have eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day. 1 John iv. 8. Herein was the love of God manifested in our case, that God hath sent his only begotten Son into the world that we might live through him," John xvii. 3. And this is life eternal, that they might know thee: the only true God, and him whom thou didst send; even Jesus Christ. We must know Jehovah as the only living and true God; and Jesus Christ as his only begotten Son, as the Word made flesh.

When we hear, receive and believe these words of truth, we are begotten by the Spirit. The germ of future life which we grasp by faith is hidden with Christ in God. We cherish and nourish it as it develops into works of love. These earthen vessels, our mortal bodies, are not fitted to retain this immortal life germ, this "incorruptible seed," and so by faith, our faith in the Word, our future life is hid with Christ in God, and when "Christ who is our life shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory." We are begotten by the word of truth, we are spiritually gestated by works of faith, and labors of love; and when our Life Giver appears, we will be born into a new and endless life. But observe, this birth can be only for those who were begotten by his words "unto a lively hope," or hope of re-living by faith, and only by faith do we get into Christ; and become partakers of the divine nature. Hence it is those and only those, who are in him who shall be made alive. This truth is forcible. The reading is plain. As in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive. As well might we say that all the animal creation are in Adam and die in him, as to say, that all the human creation are in Christ, and will be made alive in him. All the animal creation came not into the human, by generation. Neither have come, nor will come, all the human into the spiritual creation by regeneration. And yet "God is love." Supreme love. "Justice and judgment are the habitation (the continual dwelling etc) of his throne." We should all remember that "his ways are not our ways, neither are his thoughts our thoughts." His ways and thoughts are infinitely higher: even as the heaven is higher than the earth. He is Omnipotent and works everything after the counsels of his own will, which is divine, and his judgment, which is unerring. He has ordained and revealed to us the means, and the only means, and it is free to millions and millions of earth's inhabitants. Yet the very large majority, who could, if they chose, will not read, will not hear, will not believe, the message of love sent down by the Father. And suppose you, lovingly speculating souls, that the All Wise did not, and does not know who will accept his offer? Think ye that any soul has ever felt—or that any ever will feel after him in vain? Nay verily, his power equals his pleasure. The way has been opened and will continue to be open; and the light will shine into every soul worthy of eternal life. And in humble gratitude, they have bowed, or will bow, and accept the only means which Jehovah has ordained for entering into life. Even faith in his Son. But some will say, what of those who have never heard the word of life? I reply the Omnipotent sees and knows all things; nor is his power limited. His justice is supreme and his love and mercy, boundless, endless, and sublime. And if he has provided a means whereby life eternal may be attained by our race, he has not, and will not, fail in his purpose of bringing to that light every son and daughter of Adam whom he has seen or will see, worthy of life eternal. The promise was given in the very dawn of human history, Gen. iii. 15. And of him who was promised John said, "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world." The sin that brought death was unbelief. The promise of the victor gave to the world a new object for faith to grasp, and whether that faith looked forward to the Coming One, or back to him who came, it was accepted by the Almighty, All Wise Father. And though he sees fit to blot out of life all who fail to accept his offer, and they become as though they had not been, for he has said, "Man that is in honor and understandeth not is like the beasts that perish," what is man that he should find fault? Or the Son of man that he should seek to be wise above what is written? Let us remember that in his sight the nations are "but as the dust of the balance."

The text at the heading speaks of two races—First those who come into Adamic—natural life through natural generation, and birth. And second, those who will come into spiritual life by spiritual begettal of the word of truth, and regeneration into spiritual life. There is nothing revealed to us of a third means of bringing into life; or a third kind of life, and hence Postmortem probation is a groundless speculation, indulged in by those who seek to measure God's ways by our ways, and who have not studied away down into the depths of the Spirit of the Word, and there beheld the all-sufficiency of the Creator's power and purposes. It behooves us all to see to it that our faith be circumscribed by the written Word of Jehovah; and that we seek not to become wise above what is written. In the love of the truth as revealed. Your Sister.

CARRIE WILLIAMS.

THE RESTORATION OF JERUSALEM.

Christ limits the treading down of Jerusalem to the ending of Gentile time. Luke xxi. 24. Paul speaks of the fulness or ending of Gentile time being when the Deliverer shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob. Rom. xi. James locates the restoration after God has taken out a people for his name from the Gentiles, saying after this I, Christ, will return and will rebuild again the tabernacle of David which is fallen down; and I will build again the ruins thereof, and I will set it up, that the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles upon whom my name is called." Acts xv.

Zechariah says the branch (Christ) shall build the temple of the Lord.... and he shall bear the glory and he shall sit and rule upon his throne. Zech. vi. (being a priest and king after the order of Melchisedek.) God has promised him the throne of his father David. The heavens are to receive him until the times of restitution, when he will come with all his saints who have been gathered to him, in the air. His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, and it cleaves apart and there is a very great valley. It shall be one day. At evening it shall be light. Living waters go out from Jerusalem, and the Lord shall be King over all the earth. Men shall dwell in it, and there shall be no more utter destruction; but Jerusalem shall be safely inhabited. Zech. xiv. In Ezekiel's restored city waters come from the temple, and trees with fruit every month for meat and leaves for medicine, grow on its banks. Ezek. xvii. A fountain comes forth from the house of the Lord. Joel iii.

The house of the Lord, temple, Zion, tabernacle, etc., are often used interchangeably for Jerusalem. Look upon Zion, the city of our solemnities. Thine eyes shall see Jerusalem, a quiet habitation, a tabernacle that shall not be taken down; not one of her stakes shall ever be removed. Isa. xxxiii. 20. Here Zion, Jerusalem and tabernacle mean the same. This city is never to be removed nor taken down.

These Scriptures teach that at Christ's second coming with all his saints there is a portion of the land cleansed from the curse about the locality of Jerusalem. Behold I create into a new heavens and a new earth. . . Be ye glad and rejoice forever in that which I create, for behold I create Jerusalem a rejoicing and her people a joy, and I will rejoice in Jerusalem and joy in my people, and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying. This city where there is no more weeping as formerly, and the great valley where it is located, are so much of the new heavens and earth forever restored from the curse, but the outside world is yet under the curse and unsubdued. Christ has commenced his rule in the midst of his enemies. Psa. cx. The heathen shall know that I do sanctify Israel when my sanctuary is in the midst of them forevermore. Eze. xxxvii. 28. They that pass by shall say this land that was desolate is become like the garden of Eden, and the heathen that are left round about you shall know that I the Lord do build the ruined places and plant that that was desolate. I the Lord have spoken it, I will do it. Ezek. xxxvi.

These Scriptures and many others, teach that the restitution is a gradual work, and that the parable of the mustard seed fitly represents the kingdom of heaven, being small at the beginning, but is to increase till the kingdom and dominion shall fill the whole earth. The leaven is to leaven the whole lump. The stone smites the image on the feet and becomes a great mountain and fills the whole earth. It commences in the days of these kings and consumes them all and stands forever. Dan. ii.

God, by the mouth of Isaiah, has said much concerning the restoration of Jerusalem. Isaiah xl. is wholly on this subject. God personifies it, saying, "Arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee. Darkness shall cover the earth and gross darkness the people, but the Lord shall arise upon them:.... I will glorify the house of my glory. The sons of strangers shall build up thy walls and their kings shall minister unto thee; for in my wrath I smote thee, but in my favor I have had mercy on thee, therefore thy gates shall be open continually. I will beautify the place of my sanctuary and make the place of my feet glorious. They shall call thee the city of the Lord, the Zion of the holy one of Israel. Where as thou hast been forsaken and hated so that no man went through thee, I will make thee an eternal excellency.....For brass I will bring gold, for iron silver, and for wood brass. Violence shall no more be heard in thy land, wasting nor destruction within thy borders. Thy sun shall no more go down nor thy moon withdraw itself; for the Lord shall be thy everlasting light and the days of thy mourning shall be ended."

This description of its eternal excellency, its glory, its beauty and its everlasting light, makes its perpetuity unquestionable. Isa. liv. gives an idea as to the grandeur of its structure: "O thou afflicted, tossed with tempest and not comforted; behold I will lay thy stones with fair colors, and lay thy foundations with sapphires, and I will make thy windows of agates, and thy gates of carbuncles, and all thy borders of pleasant stones."

At the end of the age or thousand years, this camp of the saints, the beloved city, witnesses round about the final destruction of sin and evil. The new heavens and earth are now perfected, and there shall be no more death neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things are passed away, and all things are made new, and there is no more curse. Then John was shown by the angel the bride, the Lamb's wife and was shown that great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God. Men differ very much as to its literality; many claiming it is a symbolical representation of the bride, the church, that John was called to see. But allowing it to be literal, God, the great architect of the universe, who could see the end from the beginning, will bring harmony and perfection out from all his works and teachings.

Its leading feature, as described by the angel, was its vast proportions, surrounding far more territory than any city yet known. In taking this view the only conclusion we can come to is that these immense walls are to surround, enlarge and be made one with this exalted and redeemed city, which has long been the joy of the whole earth, the city of the great King. Psa. xlviii. There is but one locality, one Zion, one Jerusalem on earth, God has desired and chosen for his habitation. Psa. cxxxii. The same true and water of life, the same shining and glorification and the same open gates and national honorings spoken of by the angel, had been in existence here and enjoyed as a divine blessing for generations, being the crowned metropolis of the world. Much is said and sung of the New Jerusalem, but little is said of it in Scripture. Little is said and sung of Jerusalem redeemed, but much is said in Scripture of its eternal excellence, its perfection and glory, its everlasting light and perpetuity.

A Flight of Thought.

As one evening I sat in the yard viewing the wonders of the starry heavens, and admiring the wonderful wisdom and power of the Almighty in balancing and running the great machinery of the universe, keeping every planet in its proper place, while darting through space with a velocity far beyond our comprehension; and while I contemplated all this and contrasted the beauty, the harmony and grandeur of the scenes before me with the dark earth on which we live, where sin corrupts and death casts its dark shadow over the fairest and brightest hopes of our being, and if it can be possible that there is no bright future for the race, can it be the great mass of mankind were created ever to remain in total ignorance of the way of life? Is there no hope? Did God make a failure in creating man, that the vast majority are eternally lost?

While I was thus musing on these things, the dark shades of night closed around me. Then all of a sudden I saw in the darkness a light. Its soft, mellow ray illuminating in every direction, growing larger and larger until as far as the eye could reach I saw one luminous plain in the center of which was located the most beautiful mansion ever beheld by mortal eyes. And upon the front shone out in golden letters, "The Tabernacle of God," and over the wide expanse I saw fields of golden grain, dotted with orchards of the most delicious fruits of every description that heart could wish. I saw store houses and dwellings all corresponding with the grandeur of the surroundings. This vast plain I saw teeming with humanity, working for the common good, under instructions storing away the golden harvest for the good of all, for all were supplied out of the abundance as they had need. Everything was carried on in perfect order under general leadership in the most complete harmony, while just above the horizon shone forth in blazing characters, "The Great Restitution." Then I remembered the prophets had spoken of these things long time ago. And this was only the outline of the future glory which will far outstrip our most vivid imaginations.

I awoke from this strain of thought to find I was still among the dark shades of earth surrounded with almost perpetual darkness as to the future, the great plan of God in the creation of the world, the destiny of the race, the means by which God designs to accomplish his great work in carrying out the promises made to Abraham, saying, "In thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed." There are but few that get a glimpse of the glorious future and are wafted as on the wings of the wind into the paradise of God, and bask amid the golden rays of eternal glory while their faith strikes deep into the glorious promises of God, drawing full drafts from the great fountain of God's store house of things both new and old, while others grope on in perpetual darkness, feeding on the husks of vain imagination, caring for none of this thing.

Editor Restitution:

Enclosed you will find two dollars to extend my subscription to THE RESTITUTION for another year. I have taken the paper since the year 1868. Oh, what a welcome visitor it is to me. We are here in a new country and alone in the faith. May God bless you with strength and wisdom to manage the paper in the future as in the past to the honor of God and for the edification of his people. Hoping to meet all of God's children in the kingdom, I subscribe myself yours in hope of eternal life.

MARGARETT HAYNES.

NOW at the commencement of the year is the time to renew your subscription.

THE THIEF ON THE CROSS.

ROTHERHAM'S TRANSLATION AND NOTES.

And one of the suspended evil-doers was defaming him, saying: Art not thou the Christ? Save thyself and us! But the other answering, rebuking him, said, Neither fearest thou God, in that thou art in the same judgment! And we indeed righteously; for we getting back the things worthy of those we practised: but this one practised nothing amiss. And he was saying, Jesus! remember me whenever thou mayest come in thy kingdom. And Jesus said to him, Verily, to thee I say, this day with me shalt thou be in paradise. Luke xxiii. 39–43.

Tregelles's alternative reading, "into thy kingdom;" but Sinai MS. has, "in." It is left for the reader to determine whether the words "this day" should be joined with the former part of the sentence or with the latter—in favor of may be urged (1) the fact that semeron, "this day," does not always stand first in the clause to which it belongs; (see Luke ii. 11; xxii. 34; Acts xx. 26; xxii. 3; xxiv. 21; xxvi. 29; (2) that being essentially a demonstrative word, it will bear any reasonable stress which may be laid upon it, whether it be placed before or after the words which it qualifies; (3) that it is far from meaningless if regarded as belonging to the opening words of asseveration (thou dost ask to be remembered then; verily thou art assured now. As on this day of my weakness and shame, thou hast faith to ask, I this day have authority to answer); (4) that the latter part of the verse is thus left free to refer to the very matter of the supplicant's request (thou dost ask to be remembered when I come in my kingdom; thou shalt be remembered then, and with distinguished favor; thou shalt be in my kingdom, in the garden of the Lord, Isa. ii. 3 (Sept. paradeisos) Ezek. xxxvi. 35; compare Gen. ii. 8 Sept. paradeisos); iii. 2 (Sept. paradeisos); Rev. ii. 7—in the most central part of the coming kingdom of which thou dost believe me to be the destined King.

"For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." 1 Cor. xv. 22.

There are different opinions on this passage of Scripture as to what is taught. The greater majority believe that man does not wholly die, notwithstanding the declaration that in Adam all die, and that the wages of sin is death, and that it is the penalty for Adam's disobedience and sin, and that in him, as our representative, we all die. "Wherefore as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." Rom. v. 12. "Therefore, as by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation (of death), even so, by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life," Vs. 18.

But says Paul, "Every man in his own order, Christ the first fruits, afterward they that are Christ's at his coming," (or presence), and reign of a thousand years; for Christ has purchased every son and daughter of Adam with his own blood. "For he by the grace of God tasted death for every man." Heb. ii. 9. So that it is evident by these and other Scriptures that what was forfeited and lost in Adam, is and will be restored in and by Christ. And when the restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets is finished, then cometh the end; when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. Some of our RESTITUTION friends are inclined to believe and teach that those only who stand in Christ by faith will be made alive in (or by) Christ; but Paul says there will be a "resurrection both of the just and of the unjust" and that "the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life."

Again he says, "For God will have all men to be saved (from the Adamic death is what I think is meant) and to come unto the knowledge of the truth, "That Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father, and that Jesus Christ gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time." Yes God has a due time to execute all his plans and this due time will be during the time of restitution. Wherefore Paul says, "God also hath highly exalted him (Jesus), and given him a name which is above every name, of things in heaven and things in earth and things under the earth, and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father." Phil. ii. 9–11. This, I think, is proof sufficient on this point and needs no further argument.

The Universalists are wont to claim this passage of Scripture as proof of a universal salvation, that, because all will be redeemed from the Adamic death, all will be in possession of eternal life, and as further proof to support this belief they will refer you to 1 Tim. iv. 10, which reads, "We trust in the living God who is the Savior of all men, especially of those that believe." But in what respect is he the Savior of all men? Why, in that that all will be redeemed from the Adamic death, and to them that believe he will be a special Savior; for here are two classes of saved ones, all the world, and believers too. All are saved from the Adamic death, and consecrated believers of the gospel age receive a special salvation. When, through the redemption provided through the first mentioned class, the world is saved from wickedness, degradation and death, and during the millennial age enlightened by the truth and brought to a knowledge of the love of God and restored to human perfection; if then they will not live in harmony with the law of God's kingdom, which is love, they will be destroyed from among the people. Acts iii. 23. This is the second death from which there will be no redemption. Christ dieth no more.

But, furthermore, the Lord says, in those days of restitution, "They shall say no more the fathers have eaten a sour grape and the children's teeth are set on edge. But every one (who dies) shall die for his own iniquity." Jer. xxxi. 29; read to the end of chapter, also chapters xl. and xli. of Isa. and Hebrews viii.

Now then I have been as brief as possible and have endeavored to give my reason for the position I hold on the above Scripture. I will pass to notice the order of the resurrection. "For some man will say, how are the dead raised up and with what body do they come?" This life is the seed time, and when Christ comes will be the harvest; and then God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body. And for this reason we are admonished of Paul when he says, "Be not deceived, God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption." (A corruptible body, a body that is not death proof, and can accept Christ, obey and live, or disobey and die the second death.) "But he that soweth to the spirit, shall of the spirit reap life everlasting," being of the first order and will be resurrected a spiritual, immortal being, like unto Christ's glorious body. "For this mortal must put on immortality." And blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection; on such the second death hath no power. Rev. xx. 6. But they shall be priests of God and of Christ and shall reign with him a thousand years. Oh, blessed privilege; who would not be moved to love and adore God our Savior, who has redeemed us with Christ's precious blood and granted us such favors. All glory and praise be to his name forever and forever. May we all be ready watching and waiting for Christ's coming and presence and be ready to enter in into our labor of love. Oh yes, our future life will be an active life, a life to bless all mankind.

The language of Paul to Timothy, see 2 Tim. ii. 15, Study to show thyself approved of God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth. This passage has rested upon my mind a good deal of late, especially after hearing the language and seeing the writings of some prominent men in the Advent Faith. It seems to me that there is more dividing than harmonizing the Word of Truth. For instance in a certain place where I held meetings over three weeks, my subject being our Hope, and on one of the items of the same, "The Resurrection," I quoted the words of our Savior, John v. 28, 29, referring to the resurrection of the good and the evil, a professed adventual brother after meeting, stepped up to me, and said, I don't believe with you, etc. I don't believe in the resurrection of the wicked, and handed me a paper, headed the "Herald of Life." Yes God has a due time to execute all his plans and this due time will be during the time of restitution. ## OLIVET.

The Lord has gone into the heavens,
The clouds are drawn over the shiest
And Olivet folded in shadow,
In silence and loneliness lies.
No longer the footsteps of Jesus
Its solitudes marred will trace,
And losing the light of his presence,
The earth is a sorrowful place.

A ministry tender, and holy,
That filled up his beautiful life,
Is finished—his loving disciples
Are called unto toiling and strife.
The angels in shining apparel
Who answered the look in their eyes
With grand and uplifting evangel,—
They too have gone back to the skies.

The death of their beautiful visions
No longer smears the eye;
And sweet for the ears of the lonely,
No song droppeth down from the sky.
But joy like a flower hath blossomed,
And open'd are the lilies of peace,—
And down in the hearts of the loving,
There singeth the gospel of grace.

Still tarries the Lord in the heavens,
The toilers are sleeping below;
And Olivet lieth in shadow—
But darker the world in its woe.
Still, Faith, in the mockery silence,
Sings sweet to the hearts of sad men,
The words of the two shining angels,
That Jesus is coming again.

"THE GIFT OF LIFE: WHO SHALL OBTAIN IT?—No. 1.

The life we now live is a gift from the Great Author of our being, our Creator, in whom "we live and move, and have our being;"—but it is not "the Gift of Life" to which we refer. The present life is brief, transient, evanescent; "it is even a vapor," says the Apostle James, "that appeareth for a little time, then vanisheth away." Such is man in his present condition of mortality—"his days are as grass:—as a flower of the field, so he flourisheth. For the wind passeth over it, and it is gone;—and the place thereof hall know it no more."

It is not of this ephemeral life that we speak as "the Gift of Life," but of another yet to come; one which God has promised to give to all who will obey certain conditions which he has aid down as the ground of its bestowal. This is "the Life," so dignified in Scripture with this paramount title, because it is the "Life Everlasting." In this sense I could adopt the words of the late Mr. J. Baldwin Brown:—"I thank my God through Jesus Christ my Lord, because I have learnt from him, through his death, to call that life, and that only, which is eternal." In that Eternal Life there shall be none of the cares, sorrows, diseases, and pains which are the constant companions of our present life; and most glorious of all is the declaration that "there shall be no more death." Now all the pleasures of life are haunted by this grim spectre—death; he stands at every turn to-waylay us; his impress is stamped in the decay which we see all around us, and we know and feel that some day, in the course of nature, we must succumb under his iron grasp. But in the Life to come, all this is changed. The pleasures of that life are for evermore; no haunting vision of terror shall dim the prospect near or far; that life shall be perfectly joyous and free,—for "there shall be no more curse;" all enemies shall be subdued, and "the last enemy—death—shall be destroyed."

That life is a "happy life," but the happiness of it is not the life itself, nor that alone which is promised, although many teach so. The happiness is only an adjunct of the life, albeit an important adjunct; for what would the value of Life Everlasting be without happiness? Nevertheless life is not happiness, but is a greater term, for how could it be possible to enjoy happiness without life? It would be simply impossible if we take life in its natural meaning. And why should we not? We know of no reason against it, save that it does not suit a theology which asserts that man is a deathless being, and therefore cannot be offered life in its literal acceptation. If this premise be correct—that man is an immortal being—there is no other way but to alter and explain away the use of the terms life and death in Scripture, and many others of similar import. Hence when we read that "the wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord," it is carefully explained to us, lest we should fall into a very natural error of believing what this text says, that death here means—well, several different things have been suggested, but at all events—not death; and life—means the joy and happiness which Christ gives us—but not life itself, for that we already possess. The words "life" and "death"—in themselves very simple and easy to understand, and in their very antithesis explaining each other—yet have caused a great deal of trouble to some learned men to expound, simply because their minds have been warped and trammelled with the old Satanic delusion as to man's nature—"Thou shalt not surely die." Mr. J. H. Pettingall, A. M., in his work, "The Life Everlasting," has noticed several of the meanings given to these words, amongst which I observe such as, "functional activity" and "vitalisedness" for life; and "false functional activity" and "unvitalizedness" for death; all which must seem very inane to a simple mind! We sincerely re-echo Mr. Pettingell's words:—"We certainly have a great deal of pity for the distress these Christian brethren labor under in getting at some definition of those two words—Life and Death—that will make them mean pretty much the same thing for both classes—that is, that will allow the dead sinner to live forever as well as the saint. No doubt they are very worthy brethren, and learned and able, and are doing the very best they can. The fault is in the cause they are trying to maintain. Nobody could do better at it. The Old Serpent himself could not prove what he said in the same line."

Now many good reasons might be given why we should understand life and death in their literal sense as used regarding the future destiny of man, but one only must suffice for the present, viz:—that in no other way is it possible to harmonize and make consistent sense of the Holy Spirit's utterances.

I do not deny that in some passages where "life" or "eternal life" occur, it would be possible to substitute "happiness" without committing nonsense. E. g.—"To be carnally minded is misery; but to be spiritually minded is happiness and peace." But that is not the way to settle this great question, neither would such a substitution of words be an expression of the truth which the Apostle was desirous of teaching. To carry out this principle of interpretation is to rob Christ of one of his chief glories as the World's Life-giver—the quickening Spirit and Lord from heaven, who is the Resurrection and the Life. If we wish to study this question aright, we must take the whole general tenor of the teaching of the Bible, and we shall find that the literal sense is that alone which can harmonize all passages, and which adds lustre to the name and work of God's Son, our Savior; which exalts him to his proper place as the Prince of Life.

For our satisfaction let us just consider one or two, passag. which demand the literal sense and no other.

John v. 10, "For as the Father hath life in himself; so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself." How meaningless and paltry would this passage become if we were to substitute "happiness" for "life!" But understood as it reads, it is in harmony with all our knowledge of the great God "who only hath immortality"—the Self-existent and Incrutable One—whose life was without beginning and is without end. Is man to be placed on the same footing as his Maker as regards the power to live? No; only One is deserving of that honor. To his well-beloved Son he has imparted this power of having life in himself, and the purpose to which the Son will devote this power shows that life itself is meant; "for as the Father raiseth up the dead, and quickeneth them, even so the Son quickeneth whom he will." "And this is the Father's will which hath sent Me, that of all which he hath given Me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day."

2 Cor. v. 4, "For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened; not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life." To substitute "happiness" here for "life" would be simply to destroy the beauty and sense of the passage. "Mortality" and "happiness" are no proper antithetical contrasts;—the one describes the physical condition of the person, and the other his mental state. But "mortality" and "life" (immortality) are the most natural contrasts language could give, and what is the truth of the passage? The Apostle was longing earnestly to be free from this mortal state—not by death—for he desired not to be "unclothed—but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life;" in other words, that he might experience that blessed change of which he speaks to these same Corinthians in his first epistle (chap. xv.), and to the Thessalonians (1st ep. chap. iv.), when the Lord himself shall descend from heaven, and the living saints shall all be changed; "behold, I show you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we (the living) shall be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." How could such language be applied to a deathless, immortal being? Impossible. We must accept these Scriptures in their natural sense, and then all is plain, and beautiful, and sublime.

One more passage as a sample out of many. 1 Tim. iv. 7, 8, "Exercise thyself unto godliness; for bodily exercise is profitable for a little; but godliness is profitable for all things, having promise of the life which now is, and of that which is to come." Now surely it would be manifestly absurd to understand life in its literal sense in the first case (the present life, about which there can be no dispute,) and not equally so in the second—the life to come? It is the only way in which we can understand the Apostle Paul's charge to his son Timothy, for further on in the epistle he exhorts him to flee certain errors which had been the ruin of others, and "to follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness. Fight the good fight of faith; lay hold on eternal life, whereunto thou art also called, and hast professed a good profession before many witnesses." Was it happiness that Timothy was in search of? Was he not as a true disciple of Christ already in possession of happiness? Would his heart, like those of the rest of the early disciples, not be full of that gladness, joy, and peace which came through believing? Was it even eternal happiness that he was in search of? Then he was already in possession of it (supposing him to be an immortal being), because the Lord Jesus solemnly assured his disciples that no man would be able to take away that joy which would be theirs in the moment of their becoming his. No; what Timothy was in search of was life, which should make the happiness endure forever. What need to exhort Timothy to struggle for something he already possessed? Why should he have made confession of such a hope, if he already possessed the thing hoped for—eternal life? And that this eternal life is not mere happiness but the life itself with all its concomitant blessings, is further evident from the commission which Timothy receives for the "rich in this world," chap. vi. 17, 19, —"that they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate; laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life."

Thus we see that this "eternal life" is by no means something of which a man is sure without effort. No; if he would obtain it, he must fight for it—struggle that he may lay hold of it—make it secure—in the time to come.—Robert K. Strang, in Bible Standard.

RESIGNATION.

"But as for me, my feet were almost gone; my steps well nigh slipped. For I was envious of the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked. They are not in trouble like other men, neither are they plagued like other men. Therefore pride compasseth them as a chain; violence covereth them as a garment. Their eyes stand out with fatness: they have more than heart could wish. They are corrupt and speak wickedly concerning oppression; they speak loftily. Therefore his people return, and the waters of a full cup are wrung out to them, and they say, How doth God know? and is there knowledge in the Most High?"

"When I thought to know this it was too painful for me until I went into the sanctuary of God. Then understood I their end. Surely thou didst set them in slippery places, thou castedst them down to destruction. As a dream when one awaketh, so, O Lord, when thou awakest thou shalt despise their image. Nevertheless I am continually with thee: thou hast holden my right hand. Thou shalt guide me by thy counsel. It is good for me to draw near unto God. I have put my trust in the Lord God."—David.

"If a man gain the whole world and lose"—What? Himself—lose his Life in the grave what profit? But ye poor and needy, meek and lowly, to whom the gospel is preached; and by whom it is believed and obeyed and lived up to—where is your life? "Hid with Christ in God"—hid at the very fountain head of life, and mind, and being.

A large thought, who can grasp it? We poor weak creatures of the dust, what can we do to thus save our life treasured away—to thus make it precious in the sight of the Most High God? We can do what he tells us to, give ourselves to him. We are bought with a price, the blood of his beloved Son. Dare we rashly slight such weighty obligation? Nay, verily; when buried with Christ in baptism we die to this transitory life and all its varied allurements, and arise to newness of life, that life which grasps the unseen things of faith.

Then we must walk in the straight and narrow way of faith and by patient continuance in well-doing seek for eternal life. Again, what life? The life laid up with Christ in God—the hidden, unseen life of faith. But why seek if it is already ours? It is ours only by promise. If by some sad misfortune our name be blotted out of the Lamb's Book of life—we have lost—lost to all eternity. "It is a fearful thing to fall in the hands of the living God." But the faithful and chosen few will not lose. Pity us not ye great and wise, and proud of this world! "He that loseth his life shall find it." Such death unto life, endless life is not for pity! "Not in the riches of Omnipotence is the chief glory of God. But in self-denying suffering love. And blessed are the men whom he calls to fellowship with him, bearing their cross after him with patience. Of such it is written: "Blessed are they that mourn for they shall be comforted,' when he comes whose right it is.

"Mental suffering is a prerogative of greatness, and there lies an exquisite joy at its core, for everything has its compensations. Nerves such as these can thrill with a high happiness, that will sweep unfelt over the mass of men. Thus he who is stricken with grief at the sight of the world's misery (as all great and good men must be), is at times lifted up with joy by catching some gleam of the Almighty purpose that underlies it all. So it was with the Son of Man in his darkest hours; the spirit that enabled him to compass out the measure of the world's suffering and sin, enabled him also, knowing their purpose to gaze beyond them; and thus it is, too, with those deep-hearted children of his race" (and adoption) "who partake, however dimly of his characteristics. That is it—purpose. The called out few may—in a measure, penetrate the future and see whither is tending the present order of things. They may grieve and sorrow for the suffering that is crying aloud to heaven from all parts of the earth, but they grieve not as those without hope. They see a brighter day beyond. Gibbon says, "The sublime science of astronomy, elevates the mind of man to disdain his diminutive planet and momentary existence." Indeed? Why should man disdain what God has in his infinite wisdom given him? The earth was made for man, and man was given this "momentary existence" to prepare to enjoy it. The Deity is never aimlessly indifferent in what he does. If the great minds of this cosmos are satisfied to disdainfully circumscribe themselves to this momentary life, he don't condescend to their advantage. But let them with the humility of little children, ask from the right source, what is his will and purpose in the earth? and he is gracious and easy to be entreated, and of tender mercy. For, "as I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live; turn ye, turn ye from your evil ways, for why will ye die,"—die to all eternity? Is it right to disdain anything the Deity has seen fit to create? The poet asks, "Do you then believe that the changing and dependent life of plants and animals is governed by law, like the movement of the stars?" The simplest answers, "Yes, a question! Is the strong and mighty hand which compels yonder heavenly bodies to roll onward in their carefully appointed orbits, not delicate enough to prescribe the conditions of the flight of the bird, and the beating of the human heart?" Yes, the Father hath an eye on the works of his hand, and interwoven in and out, and underlying and overruling all things in heaven and earth, a mighty purpose is being evolved. We may not always see it,—indeed it would be impossible for us to grasp it as a whole; but with much dwelling on, it becomes such a living reality that this fleeting shadowy life becomes a dream in comparison. The things seen are temporal, the things unseen—eternal. We know this life must fail; but God's promise cannot fail. If this life were all, we might indeed ask, Where is the Lord? But it is often those who have least in this life, whom he chooseth for his kingdom. Put thy trust in him and no matter what befalls thee now, he will make all right hereafter. "Let us say thus to ourselves—if it be the Lord's will that we die now, before growing old, let us die with serene and steadfast hope in resurrection from the dead, and future life. If on the contrary he wills that we live, let us live courageously, for it sometimes takes more courage to live than to die. Does the beloved Master for our good, smite, and we must suffer, then let us bear patiently and cheerfully, and not throw gloom and darkness around the path-way of others by complaints. We can sympathize more truly with heroic fortitude than with rebellious murmurs. But if it be his gracious favor that we enjoy pure, wholesome, godly enjoyment, then let us rejoice with thanksgiving and moderation, temperate in all things.

Let us earnestly give ourselves up entirely to his will in all things, not trying to choose our own way, but letting him make it for us day by day; lying passively in his hands, as clay in the hands of the potter, for him to mould and fashion us into vessels of his own design, fitted for his use and service in time to come.

"If the taunts and slights, or harsh words, of misjudgments of others wound us, let us remember that nothing of this kind can really harm us if protected by him; so that safely sheltered by his favor we need not allow them to touch us."

"If it could only be possible for more of us to do this, if we could keep all those thoughts in our minds at the time when we need them most, how different our lives would be—how much happier. Not with earthly happiness always, it may be denied, and trials and temptations be the daily portion: but with the peace and rest of abiding in him, the life hid with Christ in God, which many of us long for, but in our weakness, or willfulness, or worldliness fail to find, and walk with such uncertain steps—some times hopefully and bravely following him and rejoicing in the light, and some times stumbling and falling"—Ah me!

But—"the sword of truth is always unsheathed and her banner never trails in the dust. If her followers faint or falter by the way, others of more courage and endurance take their places. If the captains of her hosts prove false or faint-hearted, other and better soldiers are promoted from the ranks, and the battle still goes on."

"What do we live for? to sow by all waters,
Fruit-bearing seeds of deeds for all years,
To toil in the ranks with His sons and daughters,
Manfully striving with doubtings and fears."

Resignation—"Thy will not mine be done"—is the most difficult, but when gained the most beneficent of all the Lord's requirements. What peace, what quiet joy, what reliant trust! "As thy day so shall thy strength be." Are we ill? That is bad, still it might be worse, we might be blind also. Are we poor? That is a hardship, still it might be doubly worse, for we might be helpless also. Are we alone in the Lord's cause? Still, oh! still it might be a thousand times worse; for we might be without God in the world—without a Lord of light and love with whom to commune in silent and secret prayer, day by day. They who build their hopes on this life, build on uncertainties, shifting sand; but they who build on Life eternal, build on verity—the Rock of Ages.

"What do we live for? we live not to rest out,
Sheltered by standing aloof from the strife:
A thousand times better, more noble to wear out,
Battered and burned in the hot forge of life."

—Orianna Leslie Turney, in Christadelphian Advocate.

"SEALS" OF A SOLID CHRISTIAN.

In the Westminster Revision of the New Testament it is said of the house "built upon the earth without a foundation," that when the stream brake against it, "straightway it fell in." We occasionally hear the crash of some unhappy church member whose ill-built character has fallen in; others seem to be toppling over and threaten a fall every day. The reason is that they were either badly bottomed or badly built. They rested their structure on the loose earth of temporary excitement, of their own resolutions, or some other sad delusion. Their fall is a warning to others to beware as to where and how they build their hopes for this world and the next.

First of all, let those who are undertaking a Christian life dig deep for the solid foundation. Deep conversions make strong Christians. Throw out the rubbish and gravel of old sinful habits, and fasten your trust on the Rock of Ages. Christ crucified is the Corner-stone, and this foundation standeth sure. It was the ancient custom to put certain inscriptions on the corner-stone of edifices. Paul, in his second epistle to his son Timothy, calls such an inscription a "seal," and the use of the seal was to accredit anything as genuine. The great apostle tells us that the two certifying inscriptions of the base of every character founded on Jesus Christ are these, "The Lord knoweth them that are his," and "Let every one that nameth the name of the Lord depart from unrighteousness." Whatever other seals there may have been, these two are vital and significant. The first signifies God's recognition of his own redeemed child; the second describes what he requires of him. The first pertains to God's promise; the second to our performance. If the second is full of solemn caution, the first is full of solemn comfort. Let all those who hope that they have been converted recently, or are about making a public profession of faith, look sharply to find whether the foundation of their heart-house is (which they expect to live) bears both these inscriptions.

1. Jesus knows who are his true followers. It is very easy to be misled by bad advisers in an inquiry-meeting or elsewhere. It is very easy for pastors and church officers to be mistaken as to the real condition of applicants for church membership. We cannot read the hearts of others; and some people are very blind and careless in reading their own hearts. But we cannot deceive the Master. Not a single sheep that he has ever gone after and brought into his fold but what he is acquainted with intimately. "I know my sheep;" "My sheep hear my voice and they follow me." In my early youth, on a farm, I was a tender of sheep, and the flock recognized me very quickly, and pushed up to get their noses into the basket of oats or of salt. Some were so tame as to eat out of my hands. Those rustic experiences always come back to me when I read our Lord's sweet pastoral words about himself and his blood-bought flock. If you are a true convert, my friend, you will turn a deaf ear to all teachers of error, and to all tempters, satanic or human; you will be glad to take your salt and your fresh clover out of your Shepherd's hands and let him lead you into his green pastures.

Come humbly and honestly into his flock with the deep determination to follow Christ wherever he shall guide you. He puts his name upon you and knows everything about you. Not a bleat of distress will ever escape his quick ear. Jesus knows the voice of every one of his flock as well as a mother knows the voices of her children playing in the yard. "When I say my prayer," said a little child to her mother, "then Christ says, 'Hark, angels, I hear a little noise.' Then the angels all keep still till I get through and say amen." The precious and profound truth which is hidden from the sceptic and the proud scoffer has been revealed unto that babe in grace. The almighty Savior does hear the faintest "noise" of feeblest faith; but he loves to have us speak out loud and clear. Come boldly to the throne of grace that you may obtain mercy, and may find grace to help in time of need.

Jesus knows also your weaknesses, and the sins that most easily entrap you. Just how much of the old Adam you have to fight—just what a quick temper, or unruly tongue, or morbid melancholy, or nervous excitability, or sensual appetites, any of you have to contend against, the omniscient Shepherd understands perfectly. Pray do not surrender to these because they are "natural" propensities. The very object of divine grace is to give a better nature. If your friends and neighbors do not detect any improvement in you, then your new structure is a flimsy affair—such as speculators run up in our cities to sell.

2. For bear in mind that if the first seal on the corner-stone is rich in heavenly comfort and cheer, the second one is fraught with solemn cautions. Let him that confesses the Lord Jesus Christ depart from unrighteousness. You can not compromise by living for Christ on the Sabbath, and for self and the world during the week. You can not build half the house on gravel and the other half on the rock. Use the plumb-line of God's word every day, on every utterance and every act. If you build out of the perpendicular line of right, your character will soon "fall in." Nobody spies the cracks in the wall sooner than the sharp-eyed neighbor, who says, "I make no professions of piety, but my wall is as straight as yours." Do not be angry at his criticisms; profit by them. If your Master has his eye on you he means that the world shall have an eye on you also. Build such a structure of godliness, stone upon stone, that all men shall take knowledge of you, that you are based on the Everlasting Rock, and are growing up into a solid habitation of Christ through his spirit. The grandest evidence of Christianity is a Christian.—Theodore L. Cuyler.

The Jews of Herat.

Various Jewish papers have of late published some particulars about the Jews residing in that ancient city, which some persist in looking upon as the key to our Indian Empire. It appears that the Jewish community of Herat is one of the oldest aggregations of Jews in Central Asia. The Herat Jews believe that their forefathers immigrated into the country known to the ancients as Ariana and Bactriana, and now bearing the name of Afghanistan, prior to the forced transfer of the people of the kingdom of Judah to Babylon, and were consequently spared the painful sight of the destruction of the First Temple. Of this, however, there are no written proofs. The oldest Hebrew document belonging to the Jewish community of Herat is a scroll of the Pentateuch—sepharterah—dating from the fourteenth century, and the most ancient tombstone is not three hundred years old yet. The records of the city contain no reference to the foundation of a Jewish congregation, and the only interesting fact in connection with its past history is a statement to be found in those records, according to which Alexander the Great, while on his way to India, received a deputation from the Jews of Herat, to whom he expressed his gratification at the cordial welcome given to him by the High Priest at Jerusalem. The actual history of the Jewish community commences at the same time as that of the town itself, viz., about the year 408 B. C.

The Jews of Herat at present number about two hundred families, two-thirds of whom live in the town itself, and the rest in the suburbs and surrounding villages. In the small town of Shushan, on the Persian frontier, and also at Maimene, a town to the east of Herat, there resides many Jewish families. The Jews living in the villages between Herat and Merv, are, like the others, under the spiritual supervision of the rabbi of Herat, although these villages have, ever since 1883, belonged to Russia.

The language mostly spoken by the Jews of Herat is Persian, but the Turkish language also is spreading among them very fast. In the synagogues the discourses are delivered in Persian, and the children in the Jewish schools translate the Scriptures into Persian as well. Herat is the most cultured city of Afghanistan, and both the Jews and the Mohammedans of that city are much more instructed than those of the surrounding districts. It is stated that a small Persian library is to be found in nearly every Jewish house at Herat, and the rabbi, in his discourses which can hardly be called sermons, often quotes from Persian poets of note.

At Teheran and Bokhara, the Jews inhabit quarters of their own. It is not so at Herat, where they are spread over the entire city. They earn their livelihood chiefly by trade. One of their principal occupations consists in importing British goods from India, and conveying them further into Central Asia. But they do not confine themselves to commerce; almost all the handicrafts are represented among the Jews. In the Great Bazar at Herat, there are eight Jewish carpet weavers and merchants, ten watch-makers, four goldsmiths, six gunsmiths, five silk merchants, and eight clothiers. There are also five Jewish physicians in Herat; these have not attended any university, but owe their medical knowledge exclusively to private study. The principal Jewish doctor is one Nakum Samuel, who has a very extensive practice and is very wealthy; the best families of Herat give him the preference over the Persian doctors. It should be remarked that the Jews have no social standing at Herat, but are simply tolerated; yet they have to pay heavier taxes than the Mohammedans. They are, however, exempt from military service. The reigning Ameer, Abdurrahman Khan, is personally well disposed towards the Jews, but owing to the fanaticism of the Afgans, he does not venture to improve their condition.

EXPLANATION OF LABEL MARKS.

Some having complained that they do not know what the marks on labels mean, we will just say, "Jny" means January, and when it is followed by a figure "6" and reads "Jny6" it means your subscription expired the first day of January, 1886. "Feb" February, "Mar" March, "Apr" April, and "May" are well understood, but "Jun" meaning June seems to confuse some, and to be taken to mean January. "Jun" means June. "Jul" is July, "Aug" August, "Sep" September, "Oct" October, "Nov" November, and "Dec" December. The figure following the month stands for the year, "1" means 1881, "2" means 1882, etc. A postal card of inquiry will bring you any information you wish.

Any one sending us a new subscriber for 1887, and the subscription price of $2.00, may select books or tracts to the amount of 75 cents from our list, and they will be sent them free, post paid. Sample copies of THE RESTITUTION furnished on application.

SOME ONE.

Some one will reach the golden shore,
Where sorrow and death are felt no more,
Some one will sing the victor's song;
In the home of our God, with the glorified throng.

Some one will walk the golden street,
With harp attuned to anthems sweet,
Will eat of the fruit of life's fair tree.—
O say, is it not blessing for you and me?

Some one will lean on the Master's breast,
Some one in his loving arms will rest,
Some one will join in the street revelain.—
Worthy, worthy the Lamb that was slain.

Some one will wear a crown of gold,
In that land of bliss where none grow old;
Some one the victor's palm will bear,
Some one the Master's triumph share.

O glorious hope! can it be that I
May dwell with the angels—have the sky
Ah yes; for the Savior for me has died,
And by life is bid with the Crucified.

Proselytism as Related to Pharaseeism and the Apostasy.

"By their fruits shall ye know them." "Woe unto you Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! because ye compass the sea and the land to make one proselyte, and when he hath become one ye make him twice the son of Hell, a child of eternal condemnation that ye are."

Who were these Scribes and Pharisees other than that they were Jews? They were by virtue of their respective offices the conservators of "the oracles of God." They sat in Moses' seat. The injunction "to watch" esoterically and exoterically rested upon them with special import. They were "watchmen in Israel." To them were committed "the oracles of God." Who is "the proselyte" here referred to? Was he a Jew also? No, he was a Gentile: he belonged to the nations who, we are told, were at this time aliens from the covenant and estranged from God. Proselyting was converting him to "Judaism" and adopting him into the Jewish family or order of things. Was not zeal in this work a commendable thing? Why did the Christ reprove it in such unsparing terms then? Because of the fruits which showed the spirit of the work that was being done. Did it make the alien a better man and citizen? The answer is, "Ye make him twice the son of Gehenna that ye are.

What was the matter with the Pharisee? Remember he was a watchman in Israel. Whose interests was he really watching out for and whose ought he to have been? What did he tithe the mint and the anise and the cummin for and for whom? Was it for God or for himself primarily? Why did he neglect "the weightier matters of the law, namely its judicial import, its mercy and its faith?" Whose interests did this neglect subserve, God's or his own? Behold the exaltation of selfishness in an exaltation of form without the substance, an adherence to the letter without the spirit. We see it exemplified in these days in the proverb, "talk is cheap." The Jew apostatized (stood away from) from the spirit of God's word, while he superstitiously adhered to the letter of it, and God rejected him as the custodian of his word or "the oracles." The later apostasy presents the astounding phenomenon of an attempt to adhere to the spirit of the word committed to the Gentile church of Christ while the letter of it has been and is still being ignored, and this too notwithstanding all the warning in the Scriptures themselves against the seductive influences of counterfeit spirit and evil spirits and the methods by which they accomplish this work of deception.

Superstition in its worst forms is denounced as its heinous. Myths and fables and science falsely so-called, to be tested by the law of God's word, and nothing to be received hypothetically. Everything to be proved or tested. The general injunction is, "prove all things, hold fast to that which is good." How shall I know? "The tree is known by its fruit." There is a tree of knowledge as well as a tree of life. The axe has been lying at the root of this tree of knowledge ever since the Christ, the embodiment of God's wisdom and utility, came and announced the simple but perfect test, namely, "by their fruits shall (or will) ye know them," and if they do not bear fruit, what then? "They are being cut down." It is not sufficient that a fig-tree bears leaves, though the leaves be genuine and perfect fig leaves in every particular. Form is an essential element of beauty or good, but form only subserves fruit, and fruit there must be.

There is knowledge and knowledge. There is wheat and darnel (tares or counterfeit wheat) and the only absolute, simple test is fruitage or non-fruitage in due time. Of course the expert and the adept can tell at any stage of the growth the difference between the wheat and the darnel and the wild olive and the domestic, but not so the casual observer and the general public careless in their ignorance. But when it comes to fruit or results anybody can know and the fact is everybody does know. Try it.

Has superstition ever made any one any better or more useful than he would have been without it in the world? The Scriptures point out distinctly the difference between true reverence or piety and false reverence or superstition or idolatry which are really synonymous terms. Has the world ever been made any better or happier because of a superstitious belief in ghosts? Has the world ever been benefited by believing that "faith is the substance of things hoped for?" Any one's common sense tells him that faith does not inhere in things, but is a state or condition of sentient, animate, intelligent persons. The only question is whether this state is a real or hypothetical or purely imaginary state. A faith that is the result of mere hypothesis or things imagined to be but having no real existence, is the faith of idolatry or credulity. So far as the believer is concerned it is real, no doubt, but so far as bringing him into any true relation to persons or things it is all unreal and hypothetical.

Which is the worse delusion then, the hope that pins its faith upon works of law which are tangible and which have in some degree at least both human and divine sanction, or the hope that rests upon a faith whose evidence is pure hypothesis and divorced from common sense as well as revelation? And moreover what is the fruit? Ask the "Middle Ages," ask Europe, ask the Nineteenth Century. Ask yourself in all candor and honesty of purpose if the average pietest of today is a lover of truth and of average trustworthiness even. Who are the champion liars, embezzlers and betrayers of trusts today throughout the length and breadth of Christendom so-called?

What sort of fruit is this? Does it grow on the tree of "the truth as it is in the Christ?" Do you believe there can be a hypocrisy of spirit as well as the letter? Do you believe that Satan can and does assume the outward appearance and manifest the phenomena of an angel of light? Do you know the Scriptural distinction between the two ideas contained in the words "ghost" and "spirit"? The two ideas are as old as revelation and superstition. A ghost is a purely hypothetical creation, a product of a disordered or diseased imagination, and the Scriptures denominate it a fantasm (φαντασμα) all its phenomena, however absurd, misleading and fantastic belonging though to this natural order of things in which we live.

Spirit (or πνευμα) on the other hand belongs to another order of things and is therefore said to be either supernatural or subternatural or alien to this order of things according as its source is good or bad. The confounding of these terms in the Common English translation and in the preaching of the day is most misleading and pernicious only too manifest in the fruits. For the average Christian conception of God today is that he is a ghost; that his kingdom is a ghostly kingdom peopled now and to be peopled forevermore with ghostly saints somewhere in a ghostly heaven of ghostly psalmody, harps and palm-branches.

In the light of revelation could there be a more consummate Satanic delusion? Does applying the term "holy" to a false concept or a lie make it any less a delusion? Does it not become all the more a snare and pitfall for the ignorant and unwary? God does sanctify our imagination and through it thus sanctified we form right concepts and apprehend spiritual things in spite of this apostate teaching and practice. Possibly he still "winks at ignorance" as he did in the days of old and lays hold of the sincere purpose and desire of the heart as he did in Gideon's case. But the first work required of Gideon to prove this sincerity was to destroy the heathen altar his father had erected to Baal and to cut down its beautiful grove. And the same age flesh today at the foot of every such shady growth however stately in its venerable age. Yes, there it lies ready to the hand of any Gideon of the gospel of God and his Christ.

One such Gideon now would be the power of God unto salvation indeed against the alien hosts of apostasy. Gideon's (Gedeon) name translated remember means "One who prayeth Indeed." One who conceives of God as a real person and presence and not as a ghost without form or substance, as an Almighty (all-controling one). One cannot be divided into several ones. As one who had promised and covenanted and whose word was good and trustworthy. And he knew that such an one had called upon him "to come up to the help of the Lord against the mighty;" and he also knew that with this sort of a "calling" he would "get there" whether any one else went with him or not. And when by the divine mandate he went down into the heathen camp and heard the dream with its "exegesis and synkrisis," narration and interpretation, namely, he knew what dough mixed, kneaded and baked in God's oven could do if the emergency arose and required, and the camp of Midian the next day "took the cake" at his hand when the emergency did arise.

Deborah, a woman, led the way "there" too on another occasion and drove "the tent pin" home with "the mallet" of "the household of faith." When men fail him God can use women; and it begins to look as though this emergency was arising again. There are too many "Baraks" now leading "the royal people" "God's people" "hardened" with conceit and cowardice instead of courage and the dignity of their high calling in Christ Jesus. There are too many too, who follow "the loaves and the fishes" rather than "the Christ." There are too many too who follow a Christ of their own idolatrous imagination instead of "The Christ of God."

There are too many who make "mysteries" of the plain teaching of the Word of God. "Woe unto those who are making counsel deep, and not through the Lord; Woe unto those who are hiding counsel; and their works will be in darkness; and they will say, who hath found us out and who will comprehend us or what we are doing." "They will think to change appointed times even."

Look at the chronology of the apostasy, and make a note of it. "There are some among you who say that the resurrection is already past."

Examine the prevailing doctrine now of "going to heaven at death" and of "natural immortality" which does away with the necessity of any resurrection at all.

Consider it carefully. For "the mark of the wild beast is in its forehead and in its hand."

Look at another doctrine in the light of "Remember that the Lord your God is one Lord," and "If God is one" and "There is one God and one Mediator between God and men a man Christ Jesus," and Christ's own defense of his assumption of the title 'Son of God" in the words of the Psalmist David which he quotes verbatim, as follows: "Your Scriptures say (and your Scripture cannot be broken) Ye are all gods and offspring of the Most High." And "My glory I will not give to another," and "when the Son of man cometh in his own glory and the glory of the Father, with all his holy angels." And "I come not to do mine own will but the will of him who sent me."

Make a synkrisis (συγκρισις) of these passages. They are "barley cakes" of God's kneading, and they are even now rolling into the camp of the apostasy, and overturning its tents. "The sword of God (The word) and of Gedeon (one who prayeth this word)" is still the signal for battle, and great spoil awaits the victors.

For there is a promise that "The Strong One," "The Christ," will divide the spoil with the strong ones. Remember that the strong ones are those who are strong in the faith, not in faith merely. And see to it that your begetting is from above, and not from below so far as Spirit is concerned. "Be not deceived."

The Mysterious Name. Only the High Priest Could Speak It.

Once each year, on the day of Atonement, while the Jewish Temple at Jerusalem remained, the high priest was accustomed to pronounce upon the bowed and awe-stricken multitude of worshipers the blessing which contained the mysterious name of God. On no other occasion, and from the lips of no other person, could his name be spoken, and when the sacred city fell before the Roman armies, and the Temple itself was razed to the ground, the ceremony likewise perished and the name was lost.

A peculiar interest in this extraordinary name has always been evinced by scholars and antiquarians. There is something in the mystery that surrounds it, that appeals alike to the strict religionist and to the investigator whose only motive is the desire to explore the region of the obscure. What was this name that could not even be pronounced without blasphemy, and which has in consequence passed away from the knowledge of mankind?

As is well known, the consonants of this name are JHVH or YHVH; and since the time of the Hebraist Galatinus the popular usage has been to pronounce it Jehovah, following the example of that scholar. Yet no one believes this to be in any way correct, and the ingenuity of hundreds of commentators has been taxed to restore the original vowels. The name itself, however it was primarily pronounced, is one of marvellous antiquity. It is derived from a verb, but was almost forgotten in the time of Moses, and its origin is absolutely lost in the midst of an antiquity that makes the pyramids seem insufferably modern. It was the essentially national name given to the Creator by the Jews—the name by which they thought of him in the privacy of their own homes, in the presence of their own altars—too sacred to be spoken, save once each year and by the lips of the consecrated priest of the Most High. So hedged about was it with reverence that the Rabbins do not even dare to write about it, but allude to it mysteriously as "The Name," or "The name of the Four Letters," in which the Samaritans likewise follow them. Yet, although it seems so wholly Jewish some of the most singular coincidences are to be found in the usages of other ancient languages. In the Chinese, some thousand years before Christ, there are allusions to a "name of three mystical letters IHV," denoting that which none can comprehend. Among the Phœnicians the name had equal reverence; the Greek writers speak of the "great name" which they imperfectly give as IEUO or IAO; and an inscription in the adytum by the temple of Isis at the Egyptian Sais recalls the same dread tetragrammaton. It would seem almost as though this were the title by which primeval man was divinely taught to worship his Creator.

As has been said, the name, so far as can be learned, has never been pronounced since Titus destroyed the Temple at Jerusalem A. D. 70. Whether before that time it was ever in any way fully committed to writing is quite unknown. Some of the Rabbins who are unable to deny that the recorded miracles of Christ were actually wrought, declare that he accomplished them by accidentally gaining possession of a patchment in which "The Name" was fully written and which thus conferred upon its owner extraordinary and supernatural powers. Whether previously written or not, it must have been so recorded after Jerusalem fell, for no loans of individuals who preserved the true pronunciation for many centuries. Josephus in his "Antiquities," speaks of the name, but says that it would be unlawful for him to explain it. The Jewish Mishna speaks of a Jew named Kamzar who was aware of the sound of the letters. In fact, as late as the year 1050 the Orientalist Leusden met a Jew at Amsterdam who professed to be able to utter them correctly. His family, he said, had preserved the traditional pronunciation by means of writing. Leusden offered the man a large sum of money if he would utter the word just once, and his offer was accepted; but shortly after, and before the payment had been made, a terror seized upon him as to [illegible] his lips, nor could he be persuaded either by bribes or entreaties to perform his promise.

The secret therefore was regarded as wholly lost; nor, perhaps, would a spirit of reverence exist to be discovered, though even the most orthodox Christians regard the Jewish feeling about the name as nothing better than a superstition. Whatever one may think, the mystery that surrounds the whole subject appeals very strongly to the imagination, as is seen in the melancholy end of a well-known American scholar who devoted his whole life to an investigation of the name, and upon whose mind the question wrought so strongly as to produce insanity.

It may be of interest to give the various pronunciations that different scholars have considered the most probable. Cappel would have it Yahvoh; Hurst, Yehevah; Mercer, Yehveh; and Wright, Yahevoh; but perhaps the majority of Orientalists incline to Yahveh. In reading the Hebrew Scriptures the Jews themselves never pronounce the word at all, but substitute the ordinary Adonai or "Lord."

THE COMING AGE,
—ITS—
Nature and Proximity.
—BY J. P. WESTNEX.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a theme which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are inquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern invention, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar items, point unmistakably to the fact that we live in the near approach to the culmination of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving earnest study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the follies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the COMING AGE. Whatever can be gleaned from the inspired Word, combined with the deductions of correct events, it tells over the wonder-working hand of God in the history of bygone ages, and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that it is supremely important in watching and forthinking the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the developments yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great unerring Hand to work out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 300 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $1.00. Send to this office for this work.

The Law, the Covenants, and the Sabbath.
—BY L. O. THOMAS.—

Title page. "The Law, the Covenants, and the Sabbath. Also an Epitome of the Great Salvation; and an Appendix including various other subjects, in brief.

The perfect unchangeable moral law is considered and shown to be the basis and spirit of the old Sinaitic law, now dead in its entirety. The law of Moses and law of Christ are compared and contrasted, and the relation of both to the old and new covenants is treated at some length. The Sabbath question is carefully and lengthily examined, and presented and discussed in a somewhat new light.

The work also includes the consideration of Sunday, conditional immortality, the gospel, return of the Jews, the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, punishment of the wicked, the state of the dead, the new birth, the one faith, the one hope, the image of God, nature of Christ, the name, the religion, morality, Christianity, etc. This work contains 350 pages. ### HAPPY IN DEATH.—No. 2.

"The way of every man is declarative of the end of every man."—Cecil.

Starting in the examination I discovered singular facts bearing on the experience of those who had been partially drowned or strangled. One who writes with a scientific knowledge of the point, says:—"After the first agony of strangulation, hallucinations rapidly follow that are intensely pleasurable." Here is the recent case of a Texas girl who accidentally fell into the water, and was so nearly drowned that resuscitation was difficult On recovering consciousness and speech, she declared that her sensations when drowning had been delightful, and she actually reproached her friends for saving her life. Dr. Burney tried hard to resist the efforts made to resuscitate him, so bewitched was he with his prolonged slumber. Kindred testimonies by recovered persons are in existence, some of them giving accounts of dazzling visions and splendors that burst on the consciousness, and of the strange vivid enjoyment that they were familiar with during the critical period. These facts may fairly be held to warrant the belief that when death is near, the nervous system is occasionally so affected, by changes in the circulation and the deterioration of the blood, that the sensations are indescribably novel and delightful. This peculiarity, it is surely reasonable to suppose, may appear in cases where death is approaching in what may be styled a more natural way, and if the patient makes his feelings known, they, though purely physical, or physiological, and as having a morbid tinge, may be readily mistaken for the enviable experience some Christians have known when about to expire.

The writer just alluded to gives in a popular journal a synopsis of an account by Dr. G. L. Beardley, a medical expert, of the phenomena attending the close of life, founded on the latest investigations by competent physicians, and from the summary we make the following extracts:—

"The functions of dying is negative —we fall to pieces like a flower. The organic, chemical changes are not only natural, but are accompanied by a

"Come a[nd] of relief and even of pleasure. Acts xvi. 9. the progress of disso'ution of I have see[n] force,—the creeping on of heard an audi[ble] cess of death, the individual for Macedoni[a] passing into the condition latter from Bi[shop] instead of torture or Perambur, Madras, I have corresponded [with] such satisfaction, [Re]surrection, is realized. [Dr.] Hunter was sorry he was unable to write how easy and delightful it is to die.'"

Dying sensations, then, however delightful, are themselves not a reliable index of the man's character, or his prospects in view of the judgment-day. We must have more than the results of chemical and organic changes to rest our hopes upon regarding our friends when they fall asleep. All that the person, whose case has been mentioned, delivered as his experience could be traced to nerve-physical sources alone; so the real character of his death, Christian or Christless, remains undetermined by his latest words,—a fact greatly to be deplored; nevertheless the truth ought to be written with perfect candor, if possible to guide the judgment in all such instances.

Not long since I examined with much interest a large engraving representing the parting moments of one whose name is still famous, as it has been for more than a hundred years, in the annals of the Christian Church, and of untiring evangelistic labor, especially in England. The original picture, no doubt, would borrow its main features from the verbal accounts given by those who [were] spectators on the solemn [occa]sion. A discarded human [life] a half-the effects; but starts up afresh the question—is the cause a reality or a fiction? In either case the result will be the same, because faith may hang with equal confidence on a myth or on a fact.

To show that it is a fable, let us within brief limits, contrast the mythical idea with what is written in the Book. Well, then, the myth says the pious dead are alive and active; the inspired Volume represents them as being asleep in the tomb. The myth says they have departed to be with Christ in glory; the Volume has this comfort and nothing more,—"If I go and prepare a place for you, I come again, and will receive you unto Myself; that where I am, there ye may be also,"—John xiv. The myth asserts that they go to Christ, whereas the truth is Christ is coming for them; and as he has not yet returned, they cannot now be in his visible presence. The myth affirms they ascend to their reward, when the last struggle is over; Paul looked for his recompense only "at that day," when his Lord should come back from heaven. The myth has not the idea of a resurrection in it as essential to future being; the truth suspends all hope of existence hereafter on such a revival, which is to be effected when the Lord having re-appeared in yon heavens, the trumpet shall sound and the dead in Christ shall appear in his likeness, heirs of perennial being and bliss. "Now are we children of God, and it is not yet manifest what we shall be. We know that, if he shall be manifested, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is," 1 John iii. (R. V.). The myth authorizes the saints to sing with their waning strength, "O death, where is thy sting," etc.; the truth gives no incongruous advice to those about to be cut off by the Terrible King—but declares for their exceeding consolation that when they are resurrected incorruptible, by the might of Jesus—that song will be the fitting expression of their victory. To sing it, however, when one is about to be trampled down by the grim tyrant is surely the climax of inconsistency, and amazingly absurd.

When the great Apostle had the near prospect of martyrdom, his words are an instructive theme for meditation. He has no raptures in contemplating death—he does not speak of it as but a momentary eclipse—as a friendly messenger ordained to convey him to a loftier existence before the throne, to the reward promised to the humble and the faithful, to the company of angels and the rivers of happiness, and the songs of the redeemed. He is grave, thoughtful, and calmly resigned; in his deliverance, moreover, he is consistent with himself and with his inspired brethren who have taught the church. His creed is at an infinite remove from myths, gloomy or resplendent:—"I am now ready to be offered, and the hour of my departure (dissolution) is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing—" 2 Tim. iv. Thus for his Master he died, and, like the holy men of earlier times, he "died in faith."

W. G. MONCRIEFF.

READINESS TO MEET CHRIST.

We should also maintain a state of unbroken and unclouded fellowship with God, which can only be the result of much prayer and constant watchfulness. In sweet and uninterrupted intercourse and communion with heaven, his personal presence to us at any time, by night or by day, at home or abroad, will be welcome. If always ready, Christ cannot appear to us at the wrong time.

We should, further, cherish a fervent charity, a pure love for all the household of faith, and should impart instruction, guidance, strength, and consolation according to their needs and our ability. And words of solemn warning should be given to the unsaved. The should be instructed in the coming wonders and the coming woes, and exhorted and entreated to be ready If we do not occupy till Jesus comes; if we cease working, and lose hope, because wicked men are waxing worse and worse, we shall incur guilt. Faithful, earnest labor cannot be without some fruit. And whether the fruit be little or much, our duty is to work for Christ; to keep in full sympathy with him in his desire to save men from the coming wrath.

With the churches as they now exist, and the various forms of organization to suit men of different opinions, with the progress Christianity is making, it is true there are a class of men who seem so satisfied, that they do not desire the appearing of Christ: they do not want the present ecclesiastical systems meddled with; and while they might suggest reforms in human governments, they do not want the governments of the world broken up. They do not want to witness the wonderful changes which would be involved in setting up a kingdom that would be the overthrow of all the present kingdoms of the world. These persons, therefore, speak much of education, and development, and the spread of liberal principles, and the ultimate universal spread of the truth, while they ignore the Lord's second coming. But a readiness for his coming will be found not to consist in this spirit and in this course.

But thank heaven, this is not the conduct of all. Many among the truest and the most loyal of the Lord's people are now giving warning to the church of the speedy coming of the Bridegroom. And the number of such during the last few years has greatly increased, which is a fact of great significance.

And during the same period a special movement—we mean a movement outside the ordinary and recognized means of grace of church organization—has been set on foot by some more distinguished for devotion and earnestness than the generality of Christians, both in this country and in America,—of much greater magnitude in America than here—to instruct the church in the doctrine of entire sanctification, and urge upon every one the attainment of the experience. This doctrine and the doctrine of the Lord's second coming, are so united that the one is an indispensable qualification for the other. And it is the only thing that can qualify us for useful labor till the Lord appears. To be ready, we must be both holy and useful. To be ready ourselves we must strive to bring others into a state of readiness; and to succeed in this, we must be more prayerful, more devoted, more earnest.

There is evidently needed among believers more closet prayer, more communion with God, more frequent and more earnest supplications for the unsaved, and more consistent and truthful and Christ-like walking before them. Though we are living in the time when a great declension among Christians, and a daring impiety among the ungodly, are foretold, yet, with increased prayer and faith, and more zealous effort, we should doubtless win more for Christ. Congregations would be larger, more interest would be awakened in the truth, more spiritual life would be found in the church, and more sensible realizations of the Divine presence would be experienced. With our light on the prophetic word, with our belief of the speedy coming of the Son of God, and our consequent responsibilities and obligations, can we be content without seeing more fruit, without witnessing greater results? If greater and more blessed results are possible to believing prayer,—if the Lord has promised us more than our faith at present grasps,—if we are weak when we might lay hold on greater strength—if we are comparatively fruitless while we might have fruit in abundance, and if we lack perfect rest while our cup of joy might be full, will it not dim the lustre of our hope, and beclond our prospects, and throw a measure of uncertainty about our future? May we not be left behind when Jesus comes? May we not be found among those who are almost, but not quite, ready? Or if saved, may we not be only just saved? Of some who shall be saved, Scripture teaches that they shall have an abundant entrance; of others, it teaches that they shall be saved, yet so as through fire. Should not this thought beget within us very deep concern? Who can make up his mind to any thing less than an abundant entrance? Who is willing to aim at just being saved? Dare we run the risk of just missing salvation, of the prize so graciously held out to us? Oh, that we could realize fully what is meant by being ready, by being thought worthy by the Master. Should not these solemn reflections lead us to consecration to set us more wholly at God, that we may become more sweet and more heavenly in our spirit, and be more fully prepared for the wonders which any day may break upon our vision? Should they not lead us to double our diligence in seeking to save the lost, and in sounding the trumpet blast of warning, and thus freeing ourselves from the charge of not caring for souls? Why should not we be as noted for holy living, for close walking with God, for earnestness in the Christian life, and for usefulness or doing good, as we are for our care and diligence in seeking the things of this life? Were these truths cherished and manifested in a yet greater degree, some persons now blessed in their judgments, through a misunderstanding of the truth, might be led to inquire into these matters. We might have the satisfaction of seeing the truth we love, and for which we have all suffered more or less, gain greater triumphs. Most certainly we should have the satisfaction, the testimony of our consciences, that we had done what we could. And we should have the living Christ as a felt power, a felt peace, a felt joy, a felt hope in our own souls. That would be worth more than the whole world, and without that, the whole world would be as nothing. That indeed would be the truest inspiration; it would be the deep spring of all our desires and purposes, and all our words and actions Godward. With this truth, with this energy, with this reality burning within us, we should be able to accomplish our life-work, and fulfil the purpose of our high and glorious calling.

Can Business Men Be Christians?

Let every man abide in the same calling, wherein he was called, 1 Cor. vii. 20.

"By their occupation, they were tent-makers," Acts xv. 3.

"An herdman and a gatherer of Sycamore fruit," Amos vii. 14.

"Casting a net into the sea, for they were fishers," Matt. iv. 18.

It is a common excuse among men, for not entering the service of Christ, or having once entered his service for not being faithful in that service, that one cannot engage in any business, cannot be a farmer, or a merchant, or a dealer in cattle, a shover of the plane, or a beater on the anvil; cannot sit on the shoemaker's bench, or watch the steam-guage of the engine, and yet be a good and thorough Christian. The vexing team, the breaking implements of husbandry, the "frenzoby" ox, the dishonest debtor, the scoffing rabble that congregate around the tradesman and merchant, the constant tax on nerve and brain of the engine-driver, are made the scapegoats, to bear the sins of neglect, rebellion, desertion, and down-right traitorism to God and his cause. The mother cannot be a Christian, because of her household cares, and the provoking acts of her children.

One man has an enemy that he would like somehow to get the better of, and if he became a Christian he would be obliged to forgive him instead.

Another wants to swear when things go wrong in his work; it is such a pleasure to him to do this, that he cannot think of giving it up.

Still another delights in the tricks of trade, if he were a Christian, the golden rule would always be staring him in the face.

Others want to give their whole time and mind and service to Christ. Christ seems to be the better paymaster; he gives honors, and petty offices, and money, right along. If Christians, there must be unwearied service, suffering, and waiting, patient waiting, before the crown and the kingdom are won.

So it is not the vocation in life, that keeps men from Christ, it is not the vexing things in the vocation that hinder them in the Christian walk, but the desire to meet and cope with these things as the natural man would meet and cope with them. It is not because the vocation hinders, but because they want to do wrong in the vocation. The Yoke of Christ holds them back from doing wrong, or saying wrong things. Therefore they do not care to put it on; or if on, they want to throw it off.

I used to think that I could be a better Christian somewhere else; if people only wouldn't do things to vex me, if they wouldn't say things to irritate and throw me off the track; if the cows wouldn't kick over the milk, and the calves break into the garden, if the bees wouldn't swarm when I was in the wash-tub; the chickens scratch up my flowers; and the children persist in doing things one way when I wanted them done another; if I could somehow get away from all this, I might be a tolerably good Christian. But, after awhile, I learned another and very different lesson: it took a long time to get it by heart, and still longer to put it into practice, but oh, how much more smoothly and happily life runs on now than in the olden days of discontent and rebellion!

Do you want to know the lesson, dear reader? Do you want to learn it? Do you want to carry that lesson out in your life and be made happy and useful in the service of your Lord?

It is this, "Not my will, but Thine be done." It is the having our own will, that makes the jars and discords in life. It is the desire of having their own will, that crowds Christ out of the life of the farmer, the merchant, the tradesman. Christ can go with men to the plow, he can stand with them beside the counter; he can help them at the helm, on the briny deep; he can smooth the ruffled brow of the care-worn mother; he can aid in doing the right thing in all the honorable avocations of life, if they will but let him, if they will but "walk in the Spirit" as revealed in the Word.

Business men can be Christians, else is the Bible not true. It commands us "to be diligent in business," "to work with our own hands," that we may "provide things honest in the sight of all men," and that we may "deal honestly toward them that are without," and also that we may "have wherewith to to give to them that need." From the ranks of the herdsmen, the husbandman, the vine-dresser, the fisherman, the carpenter, the brick-maker, have come God's royal sons in the ages past, and from the same ranks come the Christians of today.

The vexing things in any vocation, are a part of the discipline that is necessary to fit us for an inheritance with the saints in light. It was Christ's prayer for us, not that we be "taken out of the world," but that we be "kept from the evil."

"Thy will, not mine be done," must be the talisman with which to meet every outward circumstance in life. The natural man would give way to anger; he would pour out a string of invectives; he would kick and strike and stab, and shoot; the man made submissive to the Yoke of Christ, would say "in patience must I possess my soul." "I must give the soft answer," "I must rule my spirit." "I must return good for evil."

Christianity has come to exalt and to purify the honorable vocations of men; to drive out dishonesty and deceit, and all malice, and anger, and hate. It has come to make the home, the dwelling place of peace, to sanctify the marriage relation, to set joy on the brow of toil.

It puts prayer in the place of profanity; praise, in the place discontent; peace, where strife had been; patience, in the place of fretful murmurings, and joy and faith and hope, in the place of despair. It gives an everlasting arm, in the place of an arm of flesh, strength for weakness, and fadeless riches in the place of the bubbles of a day. It gives God for a fortress; eternal life for the prize of faithful running, and an everlasting inheritance, in place of the fleeting estates of time Monasteries and hermits, are poor one-sided Christians, if Christians at all. We cannot get away from business, nor from the cares and vexations of business relations, but we can meet the cares and vexations with a firm purpose to do the will of the Lord in our daily work, to keep our hands clear of wrong, to make no dishonest gains, to let no corrupt communications proceed out of our mouths, to give no hasty words, but in well-doing, commit our souls unto a faithful Creator.

The Bible can be made a lamp to the feet, and a light to the path of the business man. It can teach him "to deal justly, and to love mercy," to take no bribes and give none, to oppress not the laborer that reaps his fields and to withhold not the wages from the hireling, to care for the widow and fatherless, to give bread to the hungry, and clothes to the naked; to return not evil for evil, but contrariwise blessing, to "live soberly, righteously and godly, in this present world, looking for that blessed hope the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ;" to put away all wrath, and anger, and evil speaking, to swear not at all, by any oa[th] grow in grace and in the knowl[edge] the truth, to instruct others [in] way of life, live peaceably, to [fight] good fight, and to come off [more than] conquerors through the blood [of the] Lamb. No man if he is able to [work] is exempt from work, so is [no man] exempt from being a Christian [because] a man's avocation in life [is] from the service of God.

God, is the great King [who] commandeth all men, every [where to] repent." That means you, oh farmer, merchant, carpenter! You, are one of the "all men." You, all one of the places of "the every where." It is his will that you should seek the Lord, or, having sought him, that you should continue faithful in his service.

"How shall you escape of you neglect so great salvation?" "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God."

Seek him while he may be found. The leaves in your book of life will soon all be cut away.

The Bible in the Chamber of Inquisition.

In the course of conversation with the Rev. W. C. Van Meter, who is now on a visit to this country in a brief interval of his mission work in Italy, he informed us that he has been enabled to print a large number of copies of the Gospel according to John in Italian for use in the Sunday-schools of Rome. The children there are following the International Course, the subjects of which just now are in that Gospel. A singular coincidence, which shows the changes which God has worked, is that the Gospel was actually printed in the room formerly used as the torture-chamber of the Inquisition. The printer who had undertaken the work was obliged to leave his former business premises, and, looking around for a new location, selected rooms in an ancient edifice that appeared suitable. There he set up his presses and compositors' cases. A strange-looking iron ring in the ceiling arrested his attention, and on making inquiries about it learned that he was actually in the old Inquisition, and that the room he occupied had served as a torture-chamber. There, within the walls that have resounded with the cries of men and women suffering for conscience' sake, he set up and printed the Gospel of John.

The great difficulty with Christian manhood is, that it is too much deformed. Some are without feet; they have never gone an inch out of their own way to serve others. Some are voiceless; they have never, even by a word, encouraged any one who was cast down. Some are deaf; they have never listened to the voice of suffering. Some are without hearts; they do not know what sympathy and generous feelings are. What an appearance a procession of such characters would make, if they could be seen as they are on the street!

You find yourself refreshed by the presence of cheerful people; why not make earnest effort to confer that pleasure on others? You find half the battle is gained if you never allow yourself to say anything gloomy.

We make too little of what we say of others, and a great deal too much of what they say of us.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXVI. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, FEBRUARY 16, 1887. NO. 7.

THE RESTITUTION

Terms—TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

Payable in advance. Three and Six Months in commerce.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the true "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisite to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

We missed Bro. ...iggins very much, who are passing the winter in Florida for the benefit of Bro. Dwiggins health. Death also had made vacant the places of some others. We were rejoiced to meet Bro. and Sr. Halstead who formerly resided at Rensselaer, but who are now making their home in Dakota. He preached to this church for many years, and has always been held in the highest esteem by its entire membership, as well as by all the brethren elsewhere. As he is no longer a resident, and as Bro. Dwiggins is away, the church is much of the time without a preacher of the Word. This, however, should not prevent them from meeting together for edification, as there is good talent enough among its members to successfully carry on meetings for the furtherance of the gospel, as well as for building themselves up in the most holy faith. The public speaking devolved upon ourself and Bro. Conner of Macy. Meetings were well attended considering the somewhat unfavorable weather. Our prayer is that the church at Rensselaer may be blessed, and that all our churches in the Conference connection may be revived, and thus a people be made ready for the coming of the Lord.

EDITORIAL BREVITIES.

JOSEPH RABINOWITZ.

From the February number of the Jewish Herald, published in London, we learn that Joseph Rabinowitz has paid a visit to that metropolis of the British Empire, having come in the interests of the Hebrew Christian Church in Kischineu, South Russia. Speaking of himself he says: "The Government has given me permission to hold services, to preach the gospel to the Jews, to have all my sermons printed, which signifies a great deal there, and these sermons are sent out by post into the farthest corners of the Empire and the world."

He also says: "I am not anxious to attract Jews to what is called the Church in Russia. I am anxious that the Jews should become believers in Christ and still remain in the synagogue. I am anxious to turn every synagogue into a Hebrew Christian Church, and thereby save Christians the expense of building many churches. I want in this respect the prophecy of Zechariah to be fulfilled, which runs thus: 'In that day shall there be upon the bells of the horses, "Holiness unto the Lord;" and the pots in the Lord's house shall be like the bowls before the altar. Yea, every pot in Jerusalem and Judah shall be holiness unto the Lord of hosts.' O, how much would be gained were each Jewish synagogue to be turned into a Hebrew Christian Church, with the inscription on each, 'Holiness to the Lord.'" He adds: "The work has spread very much. Many hundreds of Jews have come to listen to the joyful sound of the gospel of Christ. The Jews see that they can still be Jews and at the same time believe in Jesus; that just as an Englishman can be a Christian, and a ...rman be a Christian, and a Frenchman be a Christian, so the Jew can be a Christian."

MISS VON FINKELSTEIN AND THE HOLY LAND

Recently we gave some parts of a lecture relative to the "Homes and Haunts of Jesus," from the pen of this Jewish lady who has been engaged in giving public lectures, during the winter, in different cities in England. We find the following notice of her late visit to Mildmay, and of the appreciation of the Mildmay people of her as well as of her lectures. "The Mildmay people are in raptures with Miss Von Finkelstein. On Sunday she paid a second visit to that locality and gave another of her strikingly interesting lectures on the Holy Land. There seems to be just now a remarkably increased interest being taken in the question of Palestine. There was not a Bible woman in the whole of that land till within about ten months ago. But in pursuance of a scheme of the Bible Society, no fewer than twenty-five Missionary Societies have been enabled to employ Bible women within the districts of their operations in the Holy Land. The work bears much promise, and the committee are seeking still to enlarge the channels through which Bible reading in the East may be increased. But Miss Finkelstein's particular work is to illustrate and demonstrate the truth of the Bible narrative by the Eastern manners and customs."

"Let's Shake Hands."

Reconciliation is perhaps the one scene we occasionally see among estranged brethren, which, more than aught else, proves the presence and power of God's Spirit. The estranged men of whom I would here speak are Christian men—members of my church—have not spoken to each other for years! This, I am sorry to say, is not an uncommon occurrence in the M. E. Church. We cannot afford to laugh at Bishop Carrigan and Father McGlynn. The itch to rule is painfully present in the "holy brethren" among ourselves. This is the difference though between us: a letter from Italy, as a rule, will settle such disputes as they are having now at St. Stephen's Parish, New York; whether it succeeds in this case remains to be seen. I have never witnessed a reconciliation by the Pope. I have an idea it is much the same as settlements by courts of justice. The parties cease their fight in court but at heart they still feel bitter. I hardly think the Pope can do more in the way of real reconciliation than our common courts.

But the reconciliation I witnessed last Sunday, Jan. 30th, at N. Baltimore Station M. E. Church, was one with tears in it. (The Pope can't put tears in them.) 'Twas an experience meeting; the leader asked if any one else wanted to speak, when a long, tired and solemn looking brother arose, and said, "Yes, I would like to say a word." Slowly and with tears streaming he said, "There is a brother in this room that has treated me badly, at least I think so. He has caused me to absent myself from the church and worse still, from prayer. I could not ask God to forgive me, because I have not until now been able to forgive him. I now ask you, William, to give me your hand." They both met in the middle of the room. "Why God bless you, certainly, glad for the chance," said William, giving him his right hand and putting the other around his neck. "William," said the tired looking brother, perhaps in my method of resenting your treatment, I have got more than even by talking to others about it. I ask you to forgive me, as I do you, here and now." Said William, amid much emotion, "Brother, from my heart I do. God bless you." About 120 men and women closed the scene by springing to their feet and singing like a jolly ship's crew homeward bound after a long and dangerous voyage, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow, etc."

This was a Christian reconciliation. Nearly every one present wept. I felt a little moisture about my own eyes, and was thankful for the beautiful scene I have here tried to describe. I cannot understand how a Christian man can (as Byron puts it), "nurse his wrath to keep it warm" against one who has offended him. Jesus said of his murderers, "Father, forgive them, they know not what they do." If we have not his spirit, we are none of his. "Yes, but," says the pouting, angry brother, "the man that spoke against me knew what he was doing." Well, suppose he did; was what he said true? If true, must he be denounced for speaking the truth? (Christian men should be truthful.)

I will suppose a case—an easy one. A friend at a distance asks a friend here in Baltimore if I deal in policy tickets; the friend makes inquiry and is informed that I do, but I don't, I have been misrepresented. Now should I call myself a Christian, while I hold this man as my deadly enemy and refuse to be reconciled? refuse to speak to him. It has been well said that the cause of truth suffers more from its professed friends than it does from its outspoken enemies. There is nothing angers an inventor so much as using his name on a spurious article. Against the man who squarely attempts to prove the invention worthless he has comparatively little to say.

O, how can a man who holds malice against any one, pray, "forgive us as I forgive my fellow men." I care not how much a man may know about the past, present and future of human history, if he cannot say to a brother who has positively injured him in testifying to the truth, or even more than the truth, "William, let's shake hands," he is still in his sins. We must be loving and forgiving, as well as knowing and believing. Some of the contributors to THE RESTITUTION say much about God being loving and forgiving. I would say to these brethren, go to those who have offended you and say, "Let's shake hands."

I. MCCURRY.

Conference Report.

The Second Quarterly Conference of the Church of God of the Abrahamic Faith in Indiana, met as advertised at Rensselaer, Ind., Feb. 4, 1887, and continued over the following Sunday. The churches at Argos, Antioch, Plymouth, Macy, Remington and Rensselaer were represented. In consequence of the absence of the President, R. S. Dwiggins, who is in Florida for the winter, and the illness of our Vice President, J. L. Wince, which prevented his attending the meeting, no business of importance was transacted.

Brother and Sister Halstead, of Andover, Dakota, who are visiting friends in Indiana for a few weeks, attended this Conference.

The public speaking by S. A. Chaplin, L. E. Conner and D. T. Halstead, was listened to with good attention by fair audiences, considering that it rained nearly all the time of the meeting, and the roads were very bad.

Notice of next conference which will be in June at Antioch, Ind., will be given in THE RESTITUTION.

Letters to the Conference at Rensselaer, Indiana.

PIERCETON, Ind., Feb. 3, 1887.

To Brethren in Second Quarterly Conference Assembled, I send this Greeting:

Mercy, grace and peace abound toward you from God the Father and from our Lord Jesus Christ. I sincerely regret that on account of sickness I can not be present to fill the place which, by Brother Dwiggins' absence, falls to my lot. Little more than a week ago I took a severe cold which settled on my lungs, and although I cough but little it affects my whole system. Have dizziness and dullness of brain with general bad feelings, chills and nightsweats. It has been a long time since I met with the kind and hospitable brethren of Rensselaer at their own homes, so I had for a week or two indulged the hope of greeting the old acquaintances in the faith at the above place, and of cementing new friendships and ties never to be severed through all the ages to come. My sphere of duty would embrace this conference if sickness had not interfered, and I have waited up to this late hour before writing, hoping to be well enough to go on the afternoon mail train today, but disappointments happen to all and I yield to the inevitable. My best wishes and warmest prayers I promise you. May the Lord direct you in all you do and say. Love to all the dear household of faith. Yours in the hope and fellowship of the gospel.

JOHN L. WIXOM.

LYONS, Neb.

Dear Brethren in, Conference Assembled at Rensselaer, Greetings:

I would feel it a great pleasure to meet with you and feast on those truths of the gospel, which, no doubt, will be presented by the preaching brethren present, but distance will not permit. Yet I would say, dear brethren, though I am absent in body, I am with you in spirit, rejoicing in your labors of love in the cause of Christ, and my prayer is that the Lord will bless you in coming together in his name. And while you mingle your voices in prayer and praise before a throne of grace will you remember us as to be up and doing while it is called today. Let each and every one cheerfully perform the work within his own sphere, however humble that work may be. If we cannot be fine architects, or master-builders in this great temple, which temple we are, we can at least be hewers of wood or carriers of water.

We are glad to know that our brethren are endeavoring to bring about a more thorough organization in our State. We invariably believe that much good will be the result.

We will close by asking you to remember us in your prayers, and may the grace of our Lord and Savior be with you all, is the prayer of your sister in the faith. LOUISA STEWART.

Questions.

Can you put the spider's web back in place,
That once has been swept away?
Can you put the apple again on the bough,
Which fell at our feet today?

Can you put the lily-cup back in the stem,
And cause it to live and grow?
Can you mend the butterfly's broken wing
That you crushed with a hasty blow?

Can you put the bloom again on the grape,
And the grape again on the vine?
Can you put the dew-drops back on the flowers,
And make them sparkle and shine?

Can you put the petals back on the rose,
If you could would it smell as sweet?
Can you put the flower again on the bush,
And show me the ripened wheat?

Can you put the kernel back in the nut?
Or the broken egg in the shell?
Can you put the honey back in the comb,
And cover with wax each cell?

Can you put the perfume back in the rose,
Where once it hovered away?
Can you put the corn-silk on the corn,
Or down on the catkins—say?

You think my questions are trifling, dear?
Let me ask another one:
Can a hasty word ever be recalled,
Or a deed unkind, undone?

Now.

If I were to give you a motto to go through life with—one that would stand you for a warning and counsel in any strait in which you might find yourselves, I would give it in this one word "Now."

Don't waste your time, and your strength, and your opportunities, by always meaning to do something—do it! Only weakness comes of indecision. Why, some people have so accustomed themselves to this way of dawdling along from one thing to another, that it really seems impossible for them to squarely make up their minds to anything. They never quite know what they mean to do next; their only pleasure seems to consist in putting things off as long as possible, and then dragging slowly through them rather than to begin anything else.

Don't live a single hour of your life without doing exactly what is to be done in it, and going straight from beginning to end. Work, play, study, whatever it is, take hold once and finish it up squarely and cleanly, and then do the next thing without letting any moments drop out between. It is wonderful to see how many hours those prompt people contrive to make of a day: it's as if they picked up the moments that dawdlers lost. And if you ever find yourself where you have so many things pressing that you hardly know where to begin, let me tell you a secret; take hold of the very first one at hand, and you will find the rest fall into file and follow after like a company of well drilled soldiers; and though work may be hard to meet when it charges in a squad, it is easily vanished when brought into line. You may have seen the anecdote of the man who was asked how he accomplished so much in life. "My father taught me," was the reply, "when I had anything to do to go and do it." There is the secret—the magic word "Now!"

Dear Children:

How lovely is character! To know a person simply by name does not convey the true idea of the human family, it is the indelible outline of integrity and worth, springing from a heart overflowing with love which should cement the true children of God. Of such an one Agrippa of old, are almost persuaded to be Christians.

Dear brethren, I need not tell you how much we would enjoy meeting with you in the conference, and hearing the words of life preached, and uniting our voices with you in singing praises to God, and beholding the dear faces probably of some we have seen, and others we have not seen, but who have become greatly endeared to us through the medium of their pen.

But as we are deprived of this great happiness, may we so live that we may meet you and all the faithful in the blissful world to come, where peace, harmony, and love reign supreme, and where loved ones meet never more to take the parting hand.

Dear brethren believing as we do, that we are living in the very last days of this present age, it behooves us to be up and doing while it is called today. Let each and every one cheerfully perform the work within his own sphere, however humble that work may be. If we cannot be fine architects, or master-builders in this great temple, which temple we are, we can at least be hewers of wood or carriers of water.

We are glad to know that our brethren are endeavoring to bring about a more thorough organization in our State. We invariably believe that much good will be the result.

We will close by asking you to remember us in your prayers, and may the grace of our Lord and Savior be with you all, is the prayer of your sister in the faith. LOUISA STEWART.

Of such an one Agrippa of old, are almost persuaded to be Christians.

Dear brethren believing as we do, that we are living in the very last days of this present age, it behooves people. And the Prophet of the Lord said, What then is to be done for thee? She needed no wealth, for her husband was rich, neither did she care for the honor a king could bestow. Her home was as endearing as a husband could make it, but the sweet, animating voice of a prattling little one had never thrilled her heart with joy, and the Prophet told her she should one day embrace a lovely boy. This she could hardly believe, therefore, said Nay my Lord, thou man of God, do not lie unto thine handmaid. But the word of the prophet was fulfilled, and the child of promise became the joy of the household. His dear father was a farmer, and was with the reapers in the field, the sweet little boy followed him. The sun no doubt being hot the child cried to the father, "My head! my head!" They brought him from the field to his mother, but about noon he died. The poor sorrowing mother laid him on the bed of the man of God, and shut the door upon him. She said to her husband, Send I pray thee one of the young men, and one of the asses, that I may run to the man of God, and come again. Her husband wondered what her business could be with the man of God. But she hastily said, It shall be well. She said to her servant, Drive and go forward, slack not thy riding for me except I bid thee. So she came unto the man of God, to a mountain, which signifies, "A circumcised Lamb." It seems the man of God saw her when a great way off, and he said to his servant, Behold, yonder is that Shunammite, run I pray thee to meet her and say unto her, Is it well with thee? Is it well with thy husband? Is it well with thy child? And she answered, It is well. And when she came to the man of God, her pent up grief burst forth, and falling down she caught him by the feet. The servant who did not comprehend her deep sorrow, came near to thrust her away, but the man of God said, Let her alone, for her soul is full of bitterness, and the Lord hath hid it from me. Then he said, Did I desire a son of my Lord? did I not say, Do not deceive me? Then he told his servant to hasten quickly, to salute no one on his way and lay the prophet's staff upon the face of the child. But the weeping mother had no confidence in any save the man of God. Therefore said, As the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth, I will not leave thee, and he followed her. As they went, the servant met them, and said, The child is not awake. When the man of God came to his room he and the sorrowing mother went in and shut the door. And he stretched himself upon the child after he had prayed unto the Lord, and the flesh of the little one became warm, then he walked to and fro, and again stretched himself upon him, and the child sneezed seven times and opened his eyes. Then he called the mother and said, Take up thy son. The mother's heart overflowing with gratitude and joy, could only fall at his feet, in loving thankfulness when she saw her dead child had been resurrected to life. Children beloved, what a lesson this teaches us. How richly God rewarded this faithful woman for her tender care toward his servant. He not only gave her a precious child, but wanted to unfold to her a resurrection unto life, by his Prophet whose name signifies, "The salvation of God." Like her, let us leave our dead ones in the silent chamber of the Prophet, and say, "It is well." Believing, trusting, and hoping that the impression of the Great Prophet in Israel, Jesus Christ, will awake his children of promise out of the sleep of death. O may you and I, if we fall asleep, hear his powerful voice say, Come forth.

Your affectionate Teacher,

E. COFFMAN.

THE SONG OF HOPE.

Hope is singing, sweetly singing; singing to the undertone,
Singing as if God had taught it, "It is better farther on."
Night and day it sings the same song, sings it when I sit alone,
Sings it so the heart will hear it, "It is better farther on."

Sits upon the trees and sings it, sings it when the heart would groan;
Sings it when the shadow deepens, "It is better farther on."
Farther on, but how much farther? Count the mile stones, one by one;
Nay, not counting, only trusting,—"It is better farther on."

The forerunner is for us entered, passed through the heavens, and entered into the holiest of all. We are too closely knit to him, if we love him and trust him, to make it possible that we shall be where he is not, or that he shall be where we are not. He will still be the leader of our progress and the captain at the head of our march. —A. Maclaren, D. D.

God delights to call forth his champions to meet with great temptations, to make them bear crosses of more than ordinary weight, as commanders of war put men of most valor and skill upon the hardest service.—Leighton.

EMOTION.

The circle of human nature is not complete without the arc of feeling and emotion. The lilies of the field have a value for us beyond their botanical ones; a certain lightening of the heart accompanies the declaration that "Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." The sound of the village bell; which comes mellowed from the valley to the traveller upon the hill, has a value beyond its acoustical one. The setting sun, when it mantles with the bloom of roses the Alpine snows, has a value beyond its optical one. Round about the intellect sweeps the horizon of Emotions from which all our noblest impulses are derived.—Dr. Tyndall.

SCIENCE AND FAITH.

The natural is hard to be understood, and scarcely two wise men are wise enough to understand Nature alike. But is the super-natural that we are after. Science is concerned only with the natural. It excludes with reverence or with contempt, according to its measure of sense, the supernatural, and asks only that natural causes be explained: the mode of existence and mutual relations. This is the legitimate domain of the scientist. The natural is first; and afterward that which is spiritual. If the student has a soul with breadth and scope to embrace the higher relations of physics and metaphysics, he perceives the grand necessity of knowing whether or not there is vital force that integrates the quarts, uniforms the lily, and wheels the stars. He drops the retort and crucible, shuts the telescope, puts out the fires in the labratory, enters his closet and on his knees he prays:—

"Insinte Truth! the life of my desires,
Come from the sky and show thyself to me.
I'm tired of reading and this hearing too,
But I am never tired of telling thee
'Tis thy fair face my spirit longs to see!"

The prayer is answered. Out of the darkness that covers the earth and sky, there comes in robes of celestial beauty, in her hands the keys of wisdom and truth, and on her head a diadem of stars, the gift of God, whose name is Faith. She comes to make us partakers of the divine nature. By faith we know. By faith, only, we know the worlds were made: not grew, were made. Here, then, is that immeasurable gulph that separates belief and unbelief. Here we find the solution of that supposed, unproved and unreal antagonism between science and religion. There is no probable reconciliation because there is no antagonism. The subjects in discussion belong to distinct worlds and cannot come in conflict. One is concerned with natural things; the other with spiritual. "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned."—Dr. Prime.

WAITING BY THE GATE.

Beside a massive gateway, built up in years gone by,
Upon whose tops the clouds in eternal shadows lie,
While streams the evening sunshine on the quiet wood and lea,
I stand and calmly wait till the hinges turn for me.

The tree-tops faintly rustle beneath the breeze's flight,
A soft and soothing sound, yet it whispers of the night.
I hear the wood thrush piping one mellow dessant more,
And scent the flowers that blow when the heat of day is o'er.

Behold, the portals open, and o'er the threshold, now,
There steps a weary one with pale and furrowed brow.
His count of years is full, his allotted task is wrought,
He passes to his rest, from a place that needs him not.

In sadness then I wonder how quickly fade the keys
Of human strength and action, man's courage and his power.
I sense, while still the wood thrush rings down the golden day,
And as I look and listen, the sadness wears away.

Again the hinges turn, and a youth departing throws
A look of longing backward, and sorrowfully goes.
A blooming maid, unbraiding the roses from her hair,
Moves mournfully away from among the young and fair.

Oh, glory of our race that so suddenly decays!
Oh, crimson flush of morning that darkens as we gaze!
Oh, breath of summer blossoms, that on the restless air
Scatters a moment's sweetness, and dies we know not where!

I grieve for life's bright promise just shown and then withdrawn,
But still the sun shines round me, the evening bird sings on,
And again I am soothed, and beside the ancient gate,
In the soft evening sunlight, I calmly stand and wait.

Once more the gates are opened; an infant group goes out,
The sweet smile quenched forever, and stilled the sprightly shout.
Oh, frail, frail tree of life, that on the green-sward strows
Its fair young buds unopened, with every wind that blows!

Some come from every region, to enter side by side,
The strong, the faint of spirit, the meek, and man of pride,
Steps of earth's great and mighty, between whose pillars gray,
And prints of little feet, mark the dust along the way.

And some approach the threshold whose looks are black with fear,
And some whose tempers brighten with joy, in drawing near,
As if they saw the lovely face, and caught the gracious eyes
Of Him, the sinless teacher, who came for me to die.

I mark the joy, the terrors; yet there within my heart
Can neither make the dread nor the longing to depart.
And, in the sunshine streaming on the quiet wood and lea,
I stand and calmly wait till the hinges turn for me.

Communications.

To the Church of God in Christ Jesus Greeting.

"Come over into Macedonia and help us." Acts xvi. 9.

I have seen no vision, nor have I heard an audible voice calling for help for Macedonia. But I have had a letter from Brother J. Spence of Perambur, Madras, India, with whom I have corresponded for a few years, and to whom I have sent books, tracts and papers, all of which have been carefully acknowledged and faithfully put out among the natives on their missionary mission. He is a government official, whose time I should judge was very fully occupied in the discharge of numerous responsible duties; yet he is in communication and fellowship with missionaries who are regularly stationed in the field by those who desire to know the truth as revealed in the word, as well as with natives who labor in the Lord's vineyard. That letter I will give a brief extract of in letter:

"Regarding the fruit of my labors, all God's people in that truth has been scattered, and that the Lord does not allow one word to return to him without results being that whereunto he sent it. From this report I received from the field workers, a spirit of enquiry has been aroused that must result favorably to the enquirers." Hence my brethren and sisters, is an almost boundless field open to us to send the word of life. Hundreds of thousands in that line of land are in as gross darkness as those all around us (they do not more so). Those cannot, they will not, see. The signs of the times are ominous. All minds and classes of men are thirsting for something, for some real system of reform that will bring relief to the troubled mind, particularly to poor, oppressed, suffering humanity.

We who have disrobed human dogmas and feel upon the sure word of the Lord as our faith's anchor, know well who it is that will come and will not tarry. We know too that his coming draweth very near. Then shall we not awake out of sleep, and put on the whole armor of God and unitedly go forth to his service, and not only see to it that we are ready and waiting to see our absent Lord return, but let us also send forth freely the word of life to those who are asking for light and truth.

The shelves of THE RESTITUTION office are groaning under their weight of Bible pearls, four and eight page tracts, pamphlets and books, most of which set forth in clearness and beauty the special lines of Bible truth on which they treat. Shall they remain there unused till the Master comes? then to be only as a witness against those whose barns and granaries and cellars are groaning with the unused, superabundance of this world's goods, for which, they, for the time being, are entrusted with the stewardship? Shall these enlightenors remain on the shelves while field is added to field, and stock is added to stock, and mining interest to mining interest? and bond to bond, and interest to interest and principle? Nay, my brethren, my sisters, these "things ought not so to be." Let us arise, and denying ungodliness and worldly lusts (fleshly pride and worldly ambition) let us go forth in our Master's service and as far as in us lies let us unitedly send forth the word of life (not our special hobbies if we have any) to those who are asking to know the truth. A little effort and self denial from each will soon bring together quite a package of tracts, pamphlets and books, all of which will be repacked and shipped to this good brother in India, who will very willingly send them out to the perishing. He asks particularly for Brother Magruder's Reply to Ingersoll, and Brother Wiley Jones' Gospel of the Kingdom. Old or new tracts or books will be equally acceptable.

To the church I make this appeal in behalf of those who know you not, because I believe it to be my duty. If some brother or sister would, from their abundance subscribe for one or two extra copies of THE RESTITUTION for Brother Spence it would be a continual ray of Scripture light. He has been getting an occasional copy of the paper. His circumstances are such that he cannot afford to pay for it, and therefore he feels that he should not complain. On account of its irregular coming continued articles are spoiled. He mentioned particularly Brother N. White's series of articles on "Genesis" a couple of years since, and recently my "Notes on Anastasis." Thus presenting the matter to those in the faith, I am in the patient labor and waiting of the saints. Your sister,

CARRIE WILLIAMS.

The Book of Jobab, called Job, Son of Zare, Son of Bragual, Son of Hesau, Son of Isaac, Son of Habraam.—According to the Septuagint.

CHAP. XXXVI.

1. And Elious continued still further and saith:

2. Bear with me a little while longer, that I may teach thee. For there is still talk in me.

3. Taking up my exact knowledge from afar in things done forsooth will I speak my ideas of right in truth.

4. And do thou not understand wrong words in a wrong way.

5. Know moreover that the Lord is not going to make away with the innocent, though mighty in strength of heart.

6. He will not make alive the irreverent, and he will render judgment for the poor (lit. beggars).

7. He will not take his eyes off from a just one; and with kings, he even seateth them on the throne for victory and they shall be exalted.

8. And some bound hand and foot shall be held in the constraints of penury.

9. And he will tell them their doings and their errors that they may become strong.

10. But he will hearken to the just one and he hath said that they should turn away from wrong doing.

11. If they hear and serve as bond-servants, they will finish their days in good things and their years in befitting things.

12. But the irreverent will he not pass in spite of their unwillingness to know the Lord, and because they have agitivated themselves not to be hearers.

13. And hypocrites in heart they affect danger; they will not cry for help, because it hath bound them.

14. Therefore are they under condemnation to death, their soul (living organism) in youth and their life (nay, the living principle or life in the abstract) that hath been wounded by angels.

15. Because they have afflicted the weak and the helpless; but he will make manifest the verdict of the meek.

16. He hath cheated the mouth of thine enemy; an abysmal cataract is there beneath it (it probably refers to the antecedent story soul) and thy table hath come down full of fatness.

17. There will be no lack of justice due the just.

18. But anger will there be upon irreverent ones, because of the irreverence of bribes which they have received for wrong-doing.

19. May thy mind not incline willingly away from the helpless when they are in necessity.

20. And drag not the right away with all those who have strength as a controling power, until royal people go up into their place.

21. But be on thy guard not to do things out of place. For, for these reasons wast thou snatched away from poverty.

22. Lo, the strong one shall be a controler in his own strength; for who is able to withstand him?

23. And who is he that teateth his works? Or who is he that hath said and hath done wrong?

24. Remember that his works are great ever which men have rule.

25. Every man hath seen by himself, that as many as have been wounded are mortal.

26. Lo, the Strong One is very strong, and we may not know. The number of his years even is infinite.

27. Unnumbered are his rain-drops, and with a shower shall they be poured into a cloud.

28. They will flow away as things that have waxed old, but clouds have hung their shadow over a speckless mortal; an hour hath he appointed unto the domestic animals, and they know how their bed hath been ordered.

In view of all these things thy reflective purpose is not being deranged, nor is thy heart being put out of thy body.

29. And if one understood it, to the stretching out of the cloud spreadeth out joy over him,

30. A similitude of his tabernacle; and hath covered his roots with the sea.

31. For in their midst will he judge royal peoples; he will give support to the Strong One.

32. He hath covered their hands with light, and hath given commandment concerning it to the one who meeteth it.

33. He declareth concerning him that the Lord is his friend, a possession even above wrong-doing.

34. And with this indeed hath my heart been terrified and hath fled away from its place. C. GARDNER.

APION, Neb. Jan. 30, 1887.

Dear Brother and Sister Wixes:

I have been thinking for some time of writing to you, and this morning finds me with pen in hand to put that resolve into practice.

I want so much to tell you how the Lord has blessed and prospered us since we left our old home. He has fulfilled his promise in that he has given us a house and land and brethren.

You know that was his promise to them that should serve him. We have a nice farm of 176 acres, with nearly 60 acres broke, and we got every thing just to go right to work; a team, two good cows, plenty of grain and household furniture, we were homeless only two weeks.

But now, I do want to tell to you about our good meeting; Brother J. S. Miller was up here last week and preached for us. He is a good speaker and such a pleasant man. I have been so happy for the last two weeks, that I have felt just like shouting. I told our folks that our blessings were all coming at once, for when I was just beginning to feel gloomy, and was hungering to hear the truth again, just then the Lord dropped a nice, little quarterly, The Rock, into my hands, and the next week, he sent THE RESTITUTION, (may he send his richest blessings upon the donor)! And the next evening I was permitted to hear Bro. Miller preach the truth.

He preached until Wednesday night and had good attendance. He hews right to the line. He lives six miles from here on a homestead, he is poor in this world's goods, but rich in faith. We think of organizing. My sister, Mrs. Rider, and her husband, are deeply interested in Bro. Miller's preaching. Don't you think I have good reason to rejoice? Praise his holy name!

Had a good letter from Bro. Mossimore's last evening, they are all well.

Our health is better since we are here. Write and tell me how you are getting along at dear Gospel Grove. I imagine I see you all there every Sunday. Pray for us, my prayers are with you. In love. NERVIE DENNY.

[The above was a private letter, but it made us so happy, by the thankful, joyful spirit that pervaded it, that we felt as if it would make others happy too, and so, begging the writer's pardon, we send it to THE RESTITUTION, knowing that many others will be glad to hear of the dear sister's happiness and good fortune.—S. H. W.]

Selections.

"TILL HE COME."

The hope of our Lord's return is considered by many to be something dreary, visionary and profitless. But let us remember that it is mentioned in words and exhibited in symbol every time we celebrate the communion. The words, "Till he come," sound out like the music of the golden bells on the High Priest's garments within the vail every time we sit at this table, and the cup says, "I will drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom."

Now, I believe that those who live most in the future live best in the present. It is because so many Christians inhabit that little Island called "now," that they are so selfish and narrow-minded and short-sighted. A life which never goes beyond the present tense, will never go much beyond the first person singular. That is to say, if you are principally concerned with the life that now is, you will be mostly occupied with the question "What shall I eat, and what shall I drink, and wherewithal shall I be clothed?" Hence the gospel does not allow us to live exclusively in the present, hemmed in by our own garden walls. It puts a telescope in our hands called "Hope;" that through it we may take in the hills of Beulah, and "see the King in his beauty, and the land that is very far off." It is a remarkable fact that in the strongest exhortation to holy living found in the new Testament, Paul exhorts us that "Denying ungodliness and worldly lust ye should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world:" It should be immediately added, "looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ." There is a deep reason for this. No mariner can steer safely by merely watching the helm of his ship; he must keep his eye on his ship indeed, but he must also keep watch of the pole star, and guide his vessel by it. That is really Paul's exhortation. "Live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world:" but in order to do this, "Look ever for that blessed hope of Christ's appearing; guide the bark of life by the bright and morning star."

For two reasons: for our admonition, and for our encouragement, do we need keep our eye upon the promise "till he come."

For our admonition. When tempted to sin, remember that Christ will come in judgment, when every secret thing shall be revealed; when grieved because you have been sinned against, remember again that Christ will come in judgment to right all wrongs and justify the injured; when tempted to avarice remember yet again that the Lord will descend in flaming fire, and that those who heaped up treasure for the last days will see them consumed before their eyes; when sensible of spiritual indolence and inactivity, remember him who said "Occupy till I come," and ask what would he find me doing for him should he come this moment? When conscious that your garments have become spotted with the flesh, think of his solemn word who says, "Behold I come as a thief! Blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments." When you have lapsed into guilty, spiritual sleep, recall your Master's words, "Watch therefore, lest coming suddenly he find you sleeping." The mightiest motives and inspiration for the Christian life in the future. We shall not seriously and thoughtfully attend to present things, unless we keep vividly before our eyes "the things which must shortly come to pass." Call it stargazing if you will: but if there were more star-gazers in the church there would be fewer dust-gatherers,—"men with a muck rake," whom Bunyan describes, to whom the things of this life, which perish with the using, are more than all the garnered wealth of the New Jerusalem.

2. And for our encouragement also we need to keep this promise, "till I come," vividly before us.

If I could see no dispensation to follow more victorious than this, I should be utterly disheartened. Not that there are not wonderful triumphs of the gospel everywhere visible; but there is such a mingling of triumph and defeat: through the open doors of Orient opium going in by shiploads to destroy its hundreds, while the gospel saves its one: through the gates of the Congo whisky pouring in to ruin whole tribes, while we are doing our utmost to save a few. Such are the hard facts. We need not be pessimists, but we must be truthists, looking at things as they are. Oh, Savior! I thank thee that when we see the shadows of evil eclipsing the brightness of thy gospel, we can hear thee saying, "Hold fast till I come." It puts courage into our hearts and nerves us that though victory is slow it will surely come, and we who have fought the battles shall shout, Oh, Immanuel, thou hast conquered!

We were reading the other day how the wives of the fishermen on the shores of the Adriatic, when their husbands have sailed far out upon the deep, are wont to go down on the shore at eventide, and, with their clear, penetrating voices, sing a stanza of a favorite hymn, and then listening to hear the second stanza come back from the lips of their husbands. They know all is well when they can hear their answer. Something like this is the representation which we find in the Apocalypse of the attention of the Church towards her absent Lord. As age after age of suffering and trial and victory intervene, her voice is heard, like the sound of deep calling unto deep, crying, Come! come! come! And evermore the answer is borne back, "Behold, I come quickly."—A. J. Gordon, Editor Watchword.

"THE GIFT OF LIFE: WHO SHALL OBTAIN IT."—No. 2.

That many will not obtain this right to live for ever, chiefly by failing to struggle for the priceless boon, is, alas, too evident, not only from the teaching of Scripture, but from what we know of the apathy and ungodliness of the world. But I do not think it is an unreasonable inference to draw that were a true doctrine preached regarding the Life that is to be had through Christ, there would be less apathy abroad. For, consider the natural effect of teaching that man already possesses as a part of his nature an inalienable immortality. That being so, he knows no need of a Life-Giver; he cannot comprehend the promise of life, for that word is a blank to him; as far as he is concerned the word might drop into complete desuetude, for the more direct word "happiness" would convey all he is looking for. And as for any terrors that an eternal life of misery is supposed to exercise over the mind, these defeat themselves by being too extreme. It may be safely asserted that no human mind can truly grasp or realize the awfulness of such a fate; and what is the consequence? The sinner, shutting himself up in unbelief, and feeling secure of ultimate good by virtue of his undying nature, is utterly indifferent as to making no effort to secure his future, or to "lay hold on eternal life."

Apathy! apathy! on every side, is what we encounter. We require a strong voice to arouse men from this death-torpor, one which could reach every ear, crying: "Awake, thou that sleepest, and rise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light"—the light of life; for "in him was life, and the life was the light of men." Let men realize their imminent peril of losing all life whatever, and surely there will be far more probability of their arousing themselves to enquire how they may escape the danger, for life is sweet, and what is there that a man will not give to retain possession of it? Truth is to any case always the most powerful agent for good, and because it is God's own truth, therefore we proclaim with all the earnestness we can, that "the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." Nothing can surpass the excellence and wide-reaching nature of this promise, for, as says a writer of bygone days, "Life is the greatest good that can possibly come unto a creature, the full blessedness and perfection of his nature; for by it is meant a continuance, with growth and increase, in all holiness, happiness, honor, and immortality. And what more sweet than life, wherein all pleasures are enjoyed!"

Who then shall be accounted worthy to obtain this precious gift of God? All are agreed that no unrepentant sinner—no unclean mind or ungodly person—can be privileged to enjoy such a blessed life. But the Scriptures are more explicit than that regarding their future, for they declare that such "shall not see life"—shall have no part at all in such a precious gift. Of them nowhere in the Bible is immortality ever predicted, much less any promise of life given.

It is an immovable law that according as we sow, so shall we reap; and those "that sow unto the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption." It is not the destruction of their happiness or "well-being," as it has sometimes been described, that is threatened. That is accomplished in the act and continued state of sin, but the penalty is something that follows, quite distinct. "If ye live after the flesh, ye shall die." "What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? for the end of these things is death." "Lust, when it hath conceived, bringeth forth sin; and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death."

Who then shall obtain the gift of life? Shall those who are indifferent and apathetic? There is a large class who live good moral lives, who do many things indeed worthy of commendation, and in so far are imitating the example of our Lord, but who nevertheless make no profession of Christ or religion. Shall these obtain life? Having only to do with what is revealed, we cannot say so. God's decisions on these matters will be just, we know, and the race for the incorruptible crown admits of no rivalries and no jealousies, so that we will rejoice rather with as many as obtain the gift, knowing that it is all of the grace of God. But without being considered uncharitable, and to be faithful, we are bound to say that God has not promised to such the gift of eternal life, and it is not by any works which we can perform that it is to be obtained. It is "a free gift," and "a gift by grace, which is by one man, Jesus Christ."

If any man desires to obtain the Life everlasting, he can obtain it only through one channel. "This is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath the life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not the life." This is the grand basis of Life in the age to come. As Adam was the head of the human race through whom, as the first source, all have derived their present life; so Christ has become the Head of an anticipated new creation—"but every man in his order: Christ the first-fruits; afterwards they that are Christ's at his coming." Through Adam, who was "of the earth, earthy," we have inherited only a sensual life—mortal—perishing; through the Lord from heaven—the second Adam—who is a Life-giving Spirit—we receive true spiritual life—a life like his own—full of glory and crowned with the blessing of immortality. As Christ is the one source through whom this glorious life can be obtained, so the sole condition given by God for obtaining it is possession of his Son—"he that hath the Son hath life"—and this is done by faith or belief in his name. "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." This is what we mean by "Conditional Immortality." God offers to us immortality through his Son upon the one condition that we believe in him—put our faith in him that he is able to perform that which he has promised. Of course when I say faith is the one condition given for obtaining eternal life, we mean that that is the basis of acceptance with God; but we must not forget that the faith required is not mere acquiescence, but an active, living power fruitful of good works, for "faith without works is dead." Hence we read another promise in Rom. ii. 7, which makes no mention of faith, but is nevertheless based upon faith, manifested in its fruits:—"To them, who by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory, honor, and immortality, (God will render) eternal life." Surely no truth could be plainer than that taught in this passage; that just as we have to seek for the glory and honor of the life to come, so also have we to seek for its immortality. We seek for all these things as not having them now, for a man never seeks for a thing which he knows he has already; and it is only to the patient seeker who continues in well-doing that God has promised to render the great blessing of eternal life.

Thus I have sought to answer simply the question—"Who shall obtain the gift of Life?" the only branch of this subject which pertains to me at this time. The great truth which we wish to have impressed upon our own hearts, and to impress upon the hearts of others, is that this gift of God is "through Jesus Christ our Lord;" that so we may yield ourselves up freely unto him, and receive a sanctified mind, a purified heart, a clear conscience, and a "rejoicing in hope" of the coming day which shall set us free from the bondage of corruption and death, and usher us into the glorious liberty of the children of God, and the eternal joys of God's paradise. The glories of that life to come are realities, and not mythes; and it is only such a conviction that is fitted to strengthen us for the battle of life, and comfort us in our journey through this vale of tears and of the shadow of death.

I recently came across some beautifully expressed thoughts of the late Principal Tulloch (a name which shall ever be held in the highest esteem), which will form a fitting conclusion to these remarks. He says:—"Hope in death can only spring from the principle of personal immortality, and this principle has no root save in Christ. It is not enough that we shall live in the memory of our friends, or that humanity shall live and flourish when we are gone. I do not say that there is no dignity in such thoughts, or even no consolation in them to some minds. It is better to have faith in the progress of humanity than no faith at all. It is better to be remembered than forgotten, and to have the immortality of a good name if no other. But men cannot find strength or comfort in such generalizations. They crave for a personal life—for communion with other lives—and with him who is life, and whose life is the light of men. This, and this alone, is the faith which makes men patient in trouble and hopeful in death, which sanctifies bereavement and illumines thought. Nature tells us nothing of the future. Science knows, and can know, nothing of it. On this side no voice from behind the veil ever reaches man. No sparks of immortal presage rise from the ashes of scientific analysis. All its suggestions leave us where we are, or mockingly sift the sources of life only to hint our mortality. If we quit the living Christ, we quit all hold of the higher life. 'If Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain.' Heaven becomes a dumb picture; and death—euphemise it as we may—merely blank annihilation. We may say of our dear ones, as we lay them in the dust, that they have fallen asleep; but the gentle words have no true meaning. The sleep is without an awakening. The higher and hopeful side of the image is cut away. The night becomes perpetual slumber, on which no morning shall ever arise. It is only in the light of the resurrection that [illegible] phrase represents a reality, and [illegible] idea of death is transfigured into [illegible] ber life. Let us believe that [illegible] the veil of physical change the [illegible] spiritual Power from which [illegible] —One who is the Resurrection [illegible] Life—in whom, if we believe [illegible] never die,—and we [illegible] change not only [illegible] with hope, and [illegible] fections and esp[illegible] other and a better [illegible] may be satisfied and [illegible] *Robert K. ## Telephon[illegible]

The prophet Isai[illegible] possible words, describes the [illegible] tion of railroads:

"Every valley shall be exalted and every mountain and hill shall be made low, and the crooked shall be made strait and the rough places made plain. And the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together."

The prophet Habakkuk in the fewest words possible describes the telephone. "For the stone shall cry out of the wall, and the beam out of the timber shall answer it."—Second chapter, 11th verse; 14th verse; "For the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." Both of these prophecies are located in a class of dispensational prophecies, easily identified.

Few who see men asking questions and receiving answers from the solid wall, with its little mouth piece, can doubt what the prophet had in his mind when he wrote these words.

Among the pleasant surprises at the close of the year, the pleasantest for me was the good editorial in your paper, "The reawakening of Palestine and the cities of the Holy Land."—C. Beardsley, in Hartford Times, Jan. 1d.

EXPLANATION OF LABEL MARKS.

Some having complained that they do not know what the marks on labels mean, we will just say, "Jay" means January, and when it is followed by a figure "6" and reads "Jay6" it means your subscription expired the first day of January, 1886, "Feb" February, "Mar" March, "Apr" April, and "May" are well understood, but "Jun" meaning June seems to confuse some, and to be taken to mean January, "Jun" means June. "Jul" is July, "Aug" August, "Sep" September, "Oct" October, "Nov" November, and "Dec" December. The figure following the month stands for the year, "1" means 1881, "2" means 1882, etc. A postal card of inquiry will bring you any information you wish.

Any one sending us a new subscriber for 1887, and the subscription price of $2.00, may select books or tracts to the amount of 75 cents from our list, and they will be sent them free, post paid. Sample copies of THE RESTITUTION furnished on application.

I WILL TRUST THEE AT ALL TIMES.

I will trust thee when the morning
Floods the earth with rosy light;
I will trust thee when the evening
shadows thicken into night;
In the gloomy midnight watches
Not a danger will I fear,
For the Lord God is my refuge,
At my side he's ever near.

I will trust thee when the roses
Cheer my path with perfume rare;
I will trust thee when they wither,
And my path is bleak and bare.
What to me are fading flowers,
With the Rose of Sharon nigh?
He can make the desert blossom,
He alone can charm the eye.

I will trust thee when the hills
Are kissed by summer sunshine bright,
Or when winter's icy fingers
Bury them from out the sight:
When the snows of life are falling,
Home and sunshine I may miss,
Thou shalt be "my habitation,"
And my "sun of Righteousness."

Thou dost bless me when thou dost love me,
Thou dost save me day by day;
Not the least of all thy mercies
Can life-service e'er repay.
So I'll trust thee for salvation,
Thou wilt keep me evermore,
Till I see thee in thy beauty,
Or fair Canaan's happy shore.

"THE ANTI-CHRIST."

This subject is yet misunderstood. ...as been treated as if it were an ...on or interpretation, rather than ...elation. But as "the Christ" is ...only by revelation, so is "the ...hrist." 2 John vii.

"Anti" is defined, "against, op... contrary." Webster. When ...Christ, came, he found "the ...h and devil, "against, op... nd contrary" to him. "Herod ...appointment under Rome, ... his birth. Matt. ii. ... Herod, Pilate, ... High Priests, ...ined "against" ...ts iv. 27. ... God lives—his ...ress! ... succeed? Far ...selves "against" ...low of seeming ... defeat at each ... opposers were blinded, ... the faith of his friends was confirmed! Jesus saw Satan fall from heaven; St. John saw Michael victorious and the dragon cast out! Rev. xii. Thus at every advance the word of God was fulfilled and Christ and his cause advanced in spite of Anti-Christ. Hence St. Paul was made "always to triumph even in all his tribulations" as by faith he was then an "overcomer!" Rom. viii. 37–39.

This victory of faith was enjoyed in Christ and the apostolic "time of suffering;" how much "more than conquerors" will they then be at his second coming to the consummation of his loving errand to them and the world! Acts iii. 21.

"The deceivers," had they not been themselves deceived, would have owned defeat; but sin is always blind to good while swift to do evil!

3. What is to be the outcome of Anti-Christ's conflict? We read that "the end is better than the beginning;" for it is on this line that the second coming is to salvation and redemption, deliverance and inheritance, the crown and the kingdom!

In erring contrast, the originator of "a future Anti-Christ" ignored all Bible and the facts which the term embraces, and thus he did not even reach the truth as to either end of his theme! All who think and teach on his line fail as he failed, of course.

4. If there could be such a future "Anti-Christ" there should be a time and place for his career distinctly given, as is that which has been fulfilled already, at Jesus first advent and through the gospel age. But the Bible has no distinct time or place for this second Anti.

Note. Please dear brethren, "for the love of the Spirit and the honor of Christ" see and confess that "Jesus" stood firmly (as did his witnesses) through all Anti-Christ's assaults, "against, opposed and contrary" to them! What then? How then can he "come to salvation" and instead take off all restraint of evil and give devil, death and hell full scope to hold carnival for seven years! Observe this time is stolen and that in "default" of faith from the "70 weeks," Dan. ix. 24, leaving only 60. Nay, further, it takes Messiah out of that "one week," after the seven and "three score and two weeks" (to comply with the 70, v. 24) and assigns the "one week" to Anti-Christ. But no, no, no! This is only a sample of other like falsehoods, that fill out the make up of "the future Anti-Christ."

He was then and there 1800 years ago, "The Anti-Christ." 2 John vii. The Anti-dikes and the devil, "a roaring lion, to devour. 1 Peter v. 8. Let one such suffice'

The sin of taking from and adding to and taking from (Rev. xxii. 18, 19), underlies that whole theory of a future Anti-Christ, because there is no second Anti-Christ in the word. The Lord Christ, the sun of righteousness, will disperse the darkness in which Anti-Christ has reveled. The "all power" of Christ is supreme to crush out Anti-Christ, as it (in "example") consumed Sodom! Jude 7; 2 Thess. ii. 8; Rev. xxiii. 8.

Some seem to shudder at the setting of time, and it should be avoided by man; but the God-given terms of time occur near 4000 times! Nay, "there is a time for every purpose," of which some thirty examples are given, Eccl. iii. Hence its neglect was made the reason for Jerusalem's judgment; "because (said Christ) thou knewest not the time of thy visitation." Dan. ix. 27; Mark i. 14; Luke xix. 41–44. Let those then who have not faith to regard "the time and events" of prophecy sufficient to "know when he is nigh at the doors," as Jesus enjoins beware of going beyond his injunction, and in zeal for another more terrible Anti-Christ, indulge in a derangement of fundamental truth, and so "set time" the wrong way and thus put off the second coming! put off the object of faith and hope to man and earth at least seven years! Rom. viii. 21; xi. 26–29. Heb. ix. 28; Rev. xi. 15.

The details might be spread over a page of THE RESTITUTION. But my aim is to make a point, arrest attention and promote "the unity of the faith."

We may as well adopt another Devil as a future Anti-Christ, and so crowd off "The Christ" from his great salvation and restitution indefinitely! But as each form of such "Anti-Christ" did fill their place 1800 years ago, and thence it seems now Anti-Christian to assume another future one by misinterpretation.

Note (1.) "The sin" of each age has ended with no second needed to justify its punishment — at the flood, on Egypt, on Jerusalem.

(2.) The plea for the Popedom is that it has not denied the Father and Son. 1 John ii. 22; 2 Thess. ii. 4.

Answer. There is a practical form of denial—in evil action,—"in works denying him!" But this plea ignores the sum of history on this profound fact. The Roman Emperor was deified —did accept divine honors, or was regarded "as God!" Then the Pope pleaded his claim for the title above the Emperor and so over "all that was called God." Their seat and center was Rome, that then ruled "the world." Luke ii. 1. Guinness pp. 160–230.

3. Christ refused for this age the offered "kingdom of this world." Mark ii. 7–10. But the Pope arrogates it; and as the assumed successor of Peter has "denied his Master" in all this range of truth.

(4.) Christ did not seek honor for himself or his church from men! Yet the Pope does just this with all the energy and arrogance of the Turk! But enough for this point.

(5.) Righteousness has all authority and cause to exist; wrong, its opposite, has no right except to cease. Amen!

(6.) "Light" is essential to life! But darkness, death and devil can't stand it even for a day! much less for seven years. "Anti" (against) God in Christ, who is light—the light of the world!

(7.) Peter did waver in his overcoming fidelity; he did deny Christ, Matt. xxvi. 69–75, and yet, in his repentance he stood more firmly on "the Rock," overruled in grace for an example! But the Pope, the poor pretence for Peter's place and "keys" by succession, never dreams of this primal grace that triumphed over his sin and "converted" him to fulfil his commission! Now shall we take stock in "that great city—of the great whore—of Babylon the Great!" Rev. xvii. to xix.

Shall we fish the "one week," embracing the Messiah's wondrous work of redemption, for the jubilee of a theocratic Anti-Christ in woe to the world! Nay, shall we not rather "hate the whore, even the garment, her Godless goudiness, Rev. xvii., spotted by the flesh!" Ah, brethren, do we not need this attitude to belong to "the Bride of the Lamb," and in our sphere hurl Christ's word of doom against this wonder of human infamy and divine forbearance, that in "one hour her judgment may come!" Rev. xvii. x. 17–19. Do, brethren, recognize the love and mercy in this mighty deliverance!

Then we may join the highest hallelujahs to the Lord God Omnipotent that his universe will be rid of "the filthiness of her infernal infamy forever! Again they sang hallelujah!

Faith's entire horizon is thus filled with "the Sun of Righteousness, the day of Christ, the salvation, glory, honor and power of the Lord our God." Amen. Rev. xix. 1–9.

"Touch Me Not."

The above language of our Savior in his address to Mary just after he rose from the dead, is put forth by some of our professed brethren as proof that Jesus rose from the dead in his corruptible flesh and blood nature, and that this, they say, was the reason why he did not want Mary to touch him. May not another view of the subject be more reasonable and in harmony with the Scripture? In comparing the different gospel accounts of the matter, we find in the gospel according to John that Jesus appeared first to Mary and her companion of the name same who were first at the sepulchre. A little before, however, an angel first announced the glad tidings to the women and told them to go quickly and tell his disciples that he is risen from the dead, and it would seem from the account given by Matthew that as they were on their way to tell the disciples the good news, Jesus met them and said, all hail, and they came and held him by the feet and worshipped him. This language compared with Mark and the account given by John would seem to mark the time when the words used by our Savior, "Touch me not," occurred.

Would these words of Jesus have any importance if the woman were not already clinging to him, as Matthew says, "holding him by the feet?" Perhaps just at this point it will not be amiss to give a few other renderings of this very passage. In Rotherham's translation it is rendered, "Detain me not," literally, be not clinging to me. In "Doct Conquest," the same, "Detain me not." James Macknight, "Lay not hands on me," for not yet have I ascended unto the Father; but be going unto my brethren and tell them, "I ascend unto my Father and your Father, and my God and your God." Here was an additional message the Savior gave to the women to carry to the disciples, "I have not yet ascended," etc. So following the record, "Mary Magdalena comes, bringing tidings to the disciples, 'I have seen the Lord,' and that these things he said to her." The question would naturally arise, what would the women and the disciples understand by the language of Jesus, "I ascend to the Father"? Does it really mean a change from corruptible to incorruption, at some point subsequent to his resurrection, as some of our brethren—who profess perfection in doctrine and fellowship—believe?

Will this view harmonize with other Scriptures, where the words "ascend" and "ascended" are used? Let us compare some parallel passages, e. g., "No man hath ascended to heaven." "If I—says the Psalmist—ascend up into heaven thou art there." "Ye shall see the Son of man ascend up, etc." And Peter in speaking of the patriarch David, "For David is not ascended to the heavens," etc. Other Scriptures might be quoted conveying the same idea, and all going to show the absurdity and folly of any reasonable mind trying to get so foreign a meaning out of so simple a word. Doctor Thomas, whom we all esteem for his work's sake, in showing the foolishness of men ascending to heaven at death, quotes, among several other passages, these very words of Jesus to Mary, viz, "Who also said to Mary three days after his death that he had not yet ascended to his Father." See Herald of the Kingdom, vol. 6, p. 198. In his efforts to sustain the mortal resurrection of the saints theory in his last days, he had to change his views on this plain language of Jesus to the women, and twist it all out of shape in order to prove that the sinless Jesus was raised in mortal flesh and blood nature, in contradistinction to the testimony which declares him to be the Son of God with power according to the Spirit of holiness, or Holy Spirit nature by the resurrection from the dead. Jesus never uses any useless words; there must therefore have been a reason for his using the language that he did to the woman.

In closing we will only make a few suggestions for the consideration of the brethren who we believe are able to judge for themselves, as we are all equally anxious to know the truth on all subjects. It will be remembered that Jesus in his last discourses to the disciples, speaks of his "coming from the Father and of leaving the world and going to the Father," and says also to the disciples, "If ye loved me ye would rejoice because I said I go to the Father—for my Father is greater than I." "Now I have told you before it come to pass, that when it is come to pass ye may believe." These words, with others of a similar nature which might be given, and also of what he had previously told concerning his death and resurrection. "How he must go to Jerusalem and suffer many things of the Elders and Chief Priests and Scribes and be [illegible], as well as [illegible] killed and be raised again the third day." These sayings of Jesus were not fully understood by his disciples until after he rose from the dead. They were, no doubt, a subject of deep thought for the time that intervened, and were pondered over in their minds. The women, also, who were the last at the cross and the first at the sepulchre, certainly would not be ignorant of these, so to speak, prophetic words of Jesus, and probably more ready to believe them in their true, literal import than even the disciples themselves. Thus they were prepared to understand the message he gave them, in carrying the glad tidings of his resurrection to the disciples and also that he had not yet ascended to his Father. They had remembered his previous teaching concerning his resurrection and going to the Father, although it had not been clear to their minds, for we would infer from the words, not "yet" ascended, that they expected that he would ascend immediately from the sepulchre to the Father. The time of his ascension he did not reveal. Thus we see the appropriateness of the words of Jesus on the above occasion. Submitted in love for the truth's sake.

A Significant Jewish Movement.

"If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forgot her cunning. If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth; if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy." So sang, long centuries ago, the Jewish exile. This intense longing has, however, by no means been so marked in latter times. A change, it would seem, is now taking place. Thousands, as is evident from our Jewish contemporaries, are turning with eager eyes to the East.

To the devout student of prophecy this remarkable awakening is not the least significant amongst the many signs of the times. Not so long ago it appeared, so far as outward tokens were concerned, as if scattered Israel had forgotten Canaan. Recent events have, however, had the effect of quickening their yearnings for their ancient land, and various schemes are in operation for the settlement of Palestine. And in the Jewish World, of a recent date (August 20, 1886), we read, for example:

"There are rifts in the clouds which have hitherto cast so dismal a shadow over the Holy Land. The future of that unhappy country, so long wrapt in impenetrable darkness, is beginning faintly to brighten, and the glimmerings of a happier state of things are almost within measurable distance of our forecasts.

* * * * *

"Two institutions are destined to play a conspicuous part in the amelioration of the condition of the Jews of Palestine—the Agricultural School at Jaffa, and the Lionel De Rothschild Institution in the neighborhood of Jerusalem. We might add a third in the shape of the Montefiore Testimonial Fund, which, by its promotion of building societies and its erection of cheap dwellings, has done much to foster thrift and reduce the miseries and hardships of domestic life in the Holy City.

* * * * *

"What we are concerned at this moment in noting is that the prospects of the Jews in Palestine are no longer gloomy. There are, on the one hand, forces at work for the improvement of the condition of our brethren which have been wisely devised and ingeniously organized, and which are now being assiduously applied; on the other hand, the people are getting tired of their misery and Chaluka-ridden inactivity, and are showing an increasing tendency to take advantage of the efforts made for their rehabilitation. This is a state of things which is fraught with happy consequences, and no Jew will fail to contemplate it with pleasure."

In the succeeding number of the same paper a leading article on the "Future of Palestine" closes with these words:

"With the late influx of the agricultural element in the colonies planted by the Montefiore, Hirsch, and Rothschild funds, willing hands should be found to labor at the transformation scene, when, 'the desert shall blossom as the rose;' willing hands and willing hearts that shall reclaim the Holy Land from its long night of death, and restore to life and light the national home of the Jews."

While the longing thus indicated is significant, the obvious reflection is that not by the hand or enterprise of man shall the "desert blossom as the rose," but by the coming of him whom, in the chapter quoted, it is said, "He will come and save you." When they say, "Lo, this is our God, we have waited for him," then shall the rebuke of his people be taken away, and their land become as he himself has promised, as a well-watered garden

THE COMING AGE,
ITS
Nature and Proximity.

—By J. P. Weetbee.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting to the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we are living in the near approach to the culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research, covering a period of more than forty years. In writing each study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and luminous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It presents all the [illegible] of supernatural superintendence [illegible] history, in such a manner as to be interesting alike to the [illegible] and the student. It outlines the events of [illegible] prophecy, and shows that they are now at hand.

In brief it deals in connection with the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the [illegible] of secular history, and by the [illegible] of modern science. It discloses the [illegible] working hand of God in the history of the Ages, and shows that the same hand is in the present age, in shaping the course of events and fulfilling its history. It also shows that his purpose was not in mistaking and disappointing the hopes of the Ages to come, in pertaining to the dispensation yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art and statesmanship, politics, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the glory of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the divine Sovereign who rules and governs all.

It contains over 300 large pages, bound in Cloth, Price $1 50. Send to this office for this work.

The Law, the Covenants, and the Sabbath.

—By L. C. Thomas.—

Title page.—"The Law, the Covenants, and the Sabbath. Also an Epitome of the Great Salvation; and an Appendix including various other subjects, in brief."

The perfect unchangeable moral law is considered and shown to be the basis and spirit of the old Israelitic law, now dead in its entirety. The law of Moses and law of Christ are compared and contrasted, and the relation of both to the old and new covenants is treated at some length. The Sabbath question is carefully and tangibly examined, and presented and disposed of in a somewhat [illegible] manner.

The work also includes the consideration of Sunday, conditional immortality, the restoration of the Jews, the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, punishment of the wicked, the destruction of the devil, the new birth, the age to come, the hope of the gospel, God's purpose in Christ, the name, the religion, morality, Christ's [illegible], etc. This work contains 350 pages, cloth, bound. Price $1.00. Orders may be sent to THE RESTITUTION Office.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXVI. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, FEBRUARY 23, 1887. NO. 8.

THE RESTITUTION

Terms—TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

Payable in advance. Three and Six Months the same rate.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion for the remission of sins; the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Communications.

"If a Man Die, Shall He Live Again," Job xiv. 14.

How various are the opinions of men concerning this question! Since men have esteemed the saying of that old serpent (thou shalt not surely die) as higher authority than the word of God (thou shalt surely die), and have rolled this Satanic error under their tongue like a sweet morsel, they have concluded that man does not die, but what we call death is simply a change from a life state on earth to a life state in a spirit world; it is only a change of state, so it comes in, "Death is the gate to endless joy." For the chasm is bridged over, that men can pass from life to life. Again we are told that when Job asked this question, he did not understand the things of the future life as we do now, for Jesus had not then "brought life and immortality to light through the gospel." But let us see if Job did not understand himself when he propounded this query.

The word "again" is in italics, so the question is, "If a man die, shall he live," or, shall a man live if he die? How can a man be alive when he is dead? "His days are determined," (numbered), his bounds he cannot pass. He is unlike the tree, he must rest, or cease. But "there is hope of a tree, if it be cut down that it will sprout again, and that the tender branch thereof will not cease. "But man dieth and wasteth away (lieth low, margin R. V.) Yea man giveth up the ghost (his life) and where is he." So we see by the first part of the fourteenth chapter of Job, that when man dies life ceases. This is in agreement with other Scriptures. "His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish." Psa. cxlvi. 4. "The dead know not anything." Eccl. ix. 5. While in the death state the hope of man is destroyed, his countenance is changed, "His sons come to honor, and he knoweth it not; and they are brought low but he perceiveth it not of them."

But for all this Job realized a future life, at least for the righteous, for he says, "So man lieth down and riseth not; till the heavens (present order of things) be no more, they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep." Then he prays unto God saying, "Oh that thou wouldest hide me in Sheol, that thou wouldest keep me secret until thy wrath be past, that thou wouldest appoint me a set time and remember me?"

Now when Job asked the question, "If a man die, shall he live again?" he certainly hoped for a future life, for in the fifteenth verse he says, "Thou shalt call and I will answer thee." Job looked for a future life through the promised seed, which Paul says is "Christ." Job says again in chap. xix. 25–27, "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the last upon the earth; and after my skin hath been thus destroyed, yet from my flesh shall I see God; whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another." R. V. The question, "If a man die, shall he live again?" is also answered by Isaiah in chap. xxvi. 19, "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust, for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead." The Psalmist also says, "As for me, I shall behold thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness." Psa. xvii. 15.

Thus we see that the patriarchs and prophets centered their hope of eternal life in Jesus the Christ. And when Jesus was upon the earth he said, "No man cometh unto the Father but by me." Again, "I came that they may have life, and may have it abundantly." In fact the only hope of future life which the word of God presents, is in the resurrection of the dead. This was the hope of both the prophets and apostles, and all the righteous dead referred to by Paul in that catalogue of worthies in Heb. xi. He says in vs. 13, "These died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them and greeted them from afar." R. V. Paul shows positively in 1 Cor. xv. that future life comes by or through Jesus the Christ, and that it is bestowed upon the righteous at the resurrection, when Christ the Life Giver shall come. Also in 1 Thess. iv., when he says, "The dead in Christ shall rise first, then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air." This was the hope of the fathers, and "for this hope was he (Paul) accused of the Jews;" and when Paul was at Athens "he preached unto them Jesus and the resurrection."

With this hope Job was satisfied, for he said, "All the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come." This change must be at the resurrection, for Paul says, "We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump;" so the righteous dead shall live again at the coming of Christ. Therefore we look and anxiously wait for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the Lord Jesus. And though like Job, "our reins within us are consumed," we earnestly desire that glorious day. So we say, even so come, Lord Jesus, come quickly. Amen. J. H. Cox.

The Book of Jobab, called Job, Son of Zare, Son of Braguel, Son of Ismu, Son of Isaac, Son of Habraam.—According to the Septuagint.

CHAP. XXXVII.

1. Hear thou that which hath been reported in the wrath of the Lord's anger, and something to be meditated upon will come forth from his mouth.

2. Beneath all the heavens is his authority, and his light is upon the wings of the earth.

3. He will call for aid with a voice to the rear; he will thunder with a voice of his scorn; and he will not exchange them (as they do prisoners of war) though one should hearken to his voice.

4. The Strong One will thunder amazingly with his voice; for he hath done great things that we do not know of.

5. He who giveth directions to snow, do thou come and be upon the earth, and thou stormy rain, and do thou showery winter of his potential rule;

6. At the hand of everything doth he seal up man severely that every man may know his own weakness.

7. And wild beasts have entered in beneath their covert and taken their ease upon their lair.

8 From out mine chambers woes come, and from topmost peaks cold;

9. And from a Strong One's breath will he permit frost; and he stereth the water as he will.

10. And he spreadeth out a choice cloud; his light scattereth the mist,

11. And he turneth aside its environments to their own works in the counsel of God; all that he hath commanded them, that they have arrayed themselves to do upon the earth.

12. Whether it be for instruction, whether it be for his earth, whether for mercy, they will find it.

13. Mark these things well, Job; stand admonished at the ability of the Lord.

14. We know that God was the disposer of his works, he who produced light from darkness.

15. He knoweth well the way to dissolve clouds and extraordinary ways to smite the wicked.

16. Thy priestly robe may be hot; but it is quiet upon the earth.

17. Sure plantings are there with him in things that have waxed old, strong as a vision of an overflow.

18. Wherefore do thou teach me, what we shall say to him, and let us cease saying many things.

19. Would that there were a book, or a scribe stood beside me, that standing I might put men to silence.

20. But the light cannot be seen by all though it is gleaming afar on the things away back, even as that from him does upon the clouds.

21. From the north there are golden-gleaming clouds, upon them is there the great glory and honor of an Almighty.

22. And we do not find another strength like to his strength. Dost not thou think to hearken unto him, if thou judgest justly?

23. Therefore shall men fear him, and the wise in heart will have feared him. C. GARDNER.

A FEW MORE WORDS ABOUT THE KINGDOM OF GOD.

No human agency, no power on earth can accomplish the things involved in the setting up of this kingdom. Great world-powers, long established governments, and armies, millions strong, will have to be broken up. Innumerable hosts of unbelieving, blaspheming, God-denying enemies will have to be destroyed. The curse which has been upon the earth through sin for about six thousand years will have to be removed, and all the groaning creation set free from her bondage. All the pious dead who now sleep in their graves will have to be ransomed from the power of death. All living believers at the secret parousia of Christ, who on account of faithfulness are chosen to be co-rulers with him in the kingdom, will have to undergo a wonderful and glorious change in being made like Christ, and being caught up into the air to be with him. The remnant of Israel now scattered throughout the world will have to be gathered, and all who receive the Messiah be constituted into a holy nation. The Theocracy will have to be established throughout the earth, and kings and priests, and princes and rulers appointed to carry out the Divine Will. And Jerusalem and Mount Zion will have to be made glorious, and the light of the moon will have to burn the light of the sun, and the light of the sun will have to be sevenfold. These and many other things that might be enumerated are all beyond—infinitely beyond—the skill and power of man.

Some of the things taught in Scripture regarding the kingdom are so great and wonderful, requiring the interposition of supernatural power in order to bring them to pass, that many doubt whether they will ever be accomplished. But no doubt should exist on any point upon which God has spoken. If he has said that certain things shall come to pass, not a doubt should arise in our hearts respecting their accomplishment. How many things which were foretold in the Old Testament, and which required supernatural agency, have been accomplished,—things which long ages since have become facts in history. And with these facts before us, can we doubt the predictions relating to the future kingdom? Let us say Amen to every word of God, and look in confidence for the fulfilment of every prediction. However unlikely to come to pass certain things may seem to human wisdom and human foresight, and however long they may have been delayed, yet if God has spoken them through his holy prophets, let us have an implicit trust in their fulfilment.

But it is somewhat surprising that those who believe in the miracles of the Old Testament, and specially in the incarnation, the mighty works wrought by Christ, and his resurrection from the dead, set forth in the New Testament, should refuse their assent to the miraculous power predicted to accompany the Second Advent. If either class of predictions admit of doubt—which we deny—was there not as much room for doubt in respect to the marvellous things which were to accompany his first coming, as there is for doubt in respect to the marvellous things that are to accompany his second coming? Yet relying on the sure word of prophecy, there were some who looked for the fulfilment of those predictions, and they waited in hope until Jesus was born and saw the salvation of God. The facts of his life and death and resurrection are now history. Should those, therefore, who believe the former class of predictions, doubt the latter? Is not God unchangeable? Is it possible for his covenant to be broken, for his word to fail? Men may spiritualize, or explain away, or change God's truth into a lie; they may call us weak and credulous; we prefer to stand or fall by the Words we prefer to shape our belief and our teaching according to the plain and grammatical sense of Holy Scripture. If we conform our faith to the Scripture, and in the end it should fail us, we shall certainly fare as well as those who take the fanciful interpretations of others for their faith. But if Scripture should not fail us—and we feel assured it will not—we shall fare better than those who deny the plain sense of the Word, and content themselves with men's whims and theories.

Editor Restitution:

Having returned to this neighborhood by request, but the weather and sickness (to-wit: measles), being rather forbidding at present, the roads aside from the turnpikes, are clay mud, and almost impassible for people to travel on foot, (the brethren and sisters, with one exception, live from one to ten miles from place of meeting) and others occupy the school house a part of the time. Therefore as I am here about 300 miles from my home, in Central Ohio, if there are any of like precious faith in this region, that would like to have me come and preach for them awhile, especially on or near the N. Y. P. & O. R. R, (as I have a half fare on said road), please inform me by return of mail, as I think of returning home unless some places are open, where my humble services may be required for a short time, wishing if possible, to serve the church here as often as the 1st Sunday in each month. No hobbies to present, but the plain, "Thus saith the Lord." No charges aside from rail road fare, believing in trusting in the Lord, and doing good as far as in my power.

Selections.

LIVING BY FAITH.

"Now the just shall live by faith, but if any man draw back my soul shall have no pleasure in him." Heb. x. 38.

Living by faith is a very different thing from living by sight. To live by sight is to set in the present, and plan for the future, according to our own knowledge, experience and judgment; while to live by faith is to study and accept God's plan for both the present and future, and to act as he directs, ignoring our own ideas of expediency whenever God's word speaks to the contrary.

It will not require very deep penetration therefore to decide to which of these two classes we belong. Every man belongs to the one or the other, unless he is an idiot or insane. The great mass of mankind are endeavoring to walk by sight; yet they are so very short sighted that they can see but a short distance in advance, and their past experience has been so brief and varied, that it forms a poor criterion on which to base a correct judgment in devising plans for the future. Yet, looking faith in God, it is the best they can do for themselves, and they very generally realize that all their plans must end with the present existence, as they know nothing of the future beyond the tomb.

But there is a small class who walk by faith. They are a peculiar people, separate from the world, and cannot assimilate with it. Having learned and believed God's plan, and seeing that it not only includes all the present but stretches on into eternity, and having implicit confidence in his infinite wisdom and boundless love, they simply place their hand in his, accepting of his proffered leading, and promising to follow wherever he directs, trusting that however dark or thorny the way may be, the end will be blessed and glorious. They are not promised that the pathway in the present life shall be one of luxury and ease, and that they shall have abundance of comforts, that their business plans shall all succeed, that friends will multiply, and that their declining years specially, shall be years of rest, after the heat and burden of the day is past.

No, these things are not promised, but it is promised that their bread and water shall be sure as long as God desires to have them live; and having food and clothing they are to be therewith contented, and whatever temporal adversity may come, to remember through it all, that all things whether good or evil, shall, under the divine management, work together for good to them. Having this confidence it is their privilege to be always rejoicing, trusting with childlike simplicity to their heavenly Father's love and care, and faithfully, meekly and obediently following in the footsteps of our leader and head, Christ Jesus, who set us an example that we should follow in his steps.

His life was one of implicit faith in the promises of God, and his daily walk in perfect harmony with his faith—obedient even unto death. He took no thought more than was necessary for the life that he then possessed—either for the present or future of his earthly existence, and beyond that, he had nothing except what was secured to him by the promise of God.

The apostle denominates this class who now thus live by faith, the just. This includes Jesus their Lord and head, the just one, and all those now justified by faith in his blood and following in his footsteps. These justified ones are just, having received the favor of justification through Christ, and in grateful and cheerful obedience submitted themselves to God. Blessed "little flock" follow on, through evil report and good report, through present tribulation and trial and conflicts within and without; it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom; blessed virgin church "the King hath greatly desired thy beauty" and thou shalt be his bride and joint-heir, if thou wilt prove thy love for him by cheerful endurance unto the end.

But if any of this class draw back the Lord will have no pleasure in them. To draw back from this high privilege into which we have come by faith, is to go back to the world and to live after the course of this world, to take the world's standpoint of observation and to reject the Lord's leading. The drawing back is not generally done suddenly, but gradually. It begins with discontent, and the discontent soon finds expression in complaint; and complaint soon develops into open opposition, which grows more and more fixed and obstinate. Paul declares the end of such apostasy when in the next verse he remarks hopefully, "But we are not of them who draw back unto destruction, but of them that believe to the saving of the soul."

Let each of the dear consecrated company beware of taking the first steps backward; and if you realize that you have already done so, wake up to a sense of your danger and recover yourself at once from the snare of the adversary. Your only safety, dear ones, is in keeping your eye of faith fixed on the mark of the prize of your high calling and forgetting the things behind. If you keep looking back at the sacrifices already made you will only see the things behind, and the things before—unseen except by the eye of faith—will cease to attract you, and very soon you will be caught in the snare of the prince of this world. Besides the malady of discontent is contagious and may spread to some other members of the household of faith, and so many be defiled. Thus you would be a stumbling block and adversary of the body of Christ rather than an aid and upbuilder of it. "Watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation."—Mrs. C. T. R., in Zion's Watch Tower.

WHEN THE NIAGARA WAS DRY.

A Remarkable Day, Forty Years Ago, in the History of the Great Cataract.

"The winter of 1848 had been one of the coldest on record, and such ice has never been known on Lake Erie since, I guess, as formed that season," said an old resident of Niagara Falls village to a New York Sun correspondent. "It was of enormous thickness. It was quite late in the spring before the ice was loosened, even about the shores of the lake. One day—I think it was near the end of April—a very stiff northeasterly wind came up, and its force was so great that it moved the great fields of ice, then entirely separated from the shores, up the lake, piling the floes in great banks as they moved. The sight of these ice banks is described not by those who witnessed it as one of most awful grandeur. Toward night the wind changed suddenly to the opposite quarter, and grew into a terrible gale from that direction. The lake's surface was packed with miniature icebergs, and these were hurled back by the gale with such tremendous force that an impenetrable dam was formed in the neck of the lake from which Niagara river flows, and the great current of water which finds its way from the lake to the rushing channel of that stream, to be dashed over the gigantic precipice at the falls, was so held in check that not more than one quarter of its usual volume could find a passage through the immense pack of ice.

"As this pack was stubborn, it was naturally but a very short time before the falls had drained nearly all the water out of the river. This, of course, occurred during the night, and no people who lived in Niagara village knew nothing of the phenomena until next morning. I remember that I awoke very early that morning with the sense of something exceedingly strange oppressing me. It was some time before I discovered that the feeling came from the fact that the noise of the cataract was almost missing. I jumped out of bed, and on leaving the house found that scores of others had been awakened by the same circumstance and were hurrying toward the falls to see what the trouble was. We found that the great Niagara falls was only about one quarter its former volume.

"We had not heard of the trouble at Lake Erie, and the terrible thought that the falls were running dry created a feeling of alarm not easily imaginable. The American channel had dwindled to a creek in comparison with its original proportions, while the British channel resembled some ordinary river in the droughts of August. Goat Island was as big as two Goat Islands, as the water had sunk from every side of it, leaving a wide expanse of wet, slimy, jagged rocks which no eye in that vicinity had ever seen before. The bed of the Canadian rapids, far out into the stream, was dry, as was the space between the lower end of Goat island and out beyond the tower. The rocks thus exposed were black and forbidding, giving the dry river-bed the appearance of a tract of charred stumps. The Three Sisters looked forlorn in their enhanced dimensions. The great jet of water which had from time out of mind leaped into the air about 300 yards south of this group of islands in the great rapids and which is leaping there today, was not leaping that morning, and, as some one remarked that day, the tremendous roar of Niagara had subsided to a moan.

"The scene was at once desolate, strange, and awful to contemplate. The picture will never leave my mind. The whole village was out exploring caves, dark recesses, curious formations in the rocks, and other remarkable features of the cataract and rapids that no mortal eyes had probably ever gazed upon before. These explorations were made safely to the very brink of Horseshoe rapids. A Mr. Holley drove a horse and buggy from the head of Goat Island and clear to the spot where the leaping jet of water had always writhed and foamed. He also cut several sticks of timber near the brink of Horseshoe falls, had them hewed there, and hauled them away with four horses. These sticks—they were large, fine timbers—are in the frame of some house at the falls now. This remarkable condition of affairs at the cataract continued all day and showed no sign of a change when the people went to bed that night. When we arose in the morning, however, the old familiar thunder of the falls was again shaking the earth as before, and the river and the rapids were again the seething, whirling, irresistible torrent of old. The ice in the lake had shifted again, and some time in the night the long-restrained volume of water had rushed down and claimed its own."—New York Sun.

IS THERE A SAFER TRUST?

Now that skepticism, in so many varied forms, is assailing our Christian religion, it is eminently proper for all mankind to inquire,—Is there anything more certain and sure in which to trust? The wish to trust something or some power outside of and apart from itself, is inherent in the human heart. To throw aside all trust is to blot out any hope in the future, and limit existence to mere mortality. How will be satisfied by so doing. Almost every individual's future, self-sketched, has in it something beyond mortality's boundary, and to continent upon some kind of religious belief. That belief which promises most certain fulfilment is the one most earnestly desired.

And while the enemies of Christ seek to do away with all faith in him as the personal Savior of humanity, and sneer at that grand plan of salvation which has the Crucified Son of God as its central figure, do they offer any faith better and more desirable, any scheme which shall hold a surer guarantee of redemption? Claiming Jesus the Nazarene to have been but the carpenter's son, only human, though a man of exceeding clearness, do they present for our consideration any mediator between the All-Father and ourselves more divine than he? Is there, to the whole range of skeptical philosophy, any theory, promise or hope to which, turning away from God and the Bible, men so believe he sent into the world, the soul can cling with more of satisfaction and peace?

These questions cannot be easily answered in the affirmative. Skepticism, trying to tear down the truest and most vital part of Christian faith, has never offered to build up a truer and worthier one,—has never developed any rock upon which mankind may rest with the assurance that it will prove more solid and enduring. Skepticism, atheism, deism, pantheism, infidelism, and all other isms preaching aught beside Christ and him crucified, have as yet failed to do what the simple Christian faith has done,—hold out a hope of eternal life and sustain the believer through manifold afflictions until the hope lose itself in fruition. The Tom Paines, professing to consider God a myth, and the future life a delusion, have approached the grave in most abject fear, saying of death—"It is all a leap in the dark."

To all mankind, then, the fact that no safer trust is offered especially commends itself. To weak and doubting believers it should be a source of peculiar comfort. Doubtings will come at times; the faith will grow faint; the enemy will come in like a flood; and for a little while unbelief will obtain the mastery. Yet not for long, if only we remember that unbelief yields no more cheering harvest,—that when we give up our hopes in Jesus Christ we gain nothing more steadfast and abiding,—that outside of his blood and righteousness we find no surer prophecy of everlasting joy. There is no clearer light for our feet on earth than that which the gospel sheds; no brighter ray of promise illumes the tomb than that his presence therein lent to it; and nowhere can we receive a sweeter assurance of final resurrection than in his victory over death and the grave, and his ascension to the Father's presence.

Founded upon Love.

Napoleon standing on the brow of St. Helena, said to Montholon: "Can you tell me who Jesus Christ was?" Without waiting for an answer he continued: "There is something about him which I cannot understand. Alexander, Cæsar, Charlemagne, and, myself have founded great empires. But on what did these creations of our genius rest? Upon force. But Jesus founded his upon love; and this very day millions would die for him. I have inspired multitudes," he continued, "with an enthusiastic devotion, such that they would have died for me; but to do this it was necessary that I should be present with the electric influence of my looks, my words, and my voice. When I saw map, and spoke to them, I lighted up the flame of devotion in their hearts. But Jesus, by some mysterious influence, reaching down through a lapse of eighteen hundred years, so draws the hearts of men towards him that thousands, at a word, would rush through fire and flood for him, counting not their lives dear unto them." And there are thousands of men and women now who are as bold and enthusiastic for the cause of the great Teacher as was Stephen amid the shower of stones, as was Paul when he was led to execution, or as Ridley and Latimer were when they were burned at the stake.

BRO. D. T. Halstead paid a visit to Argos and Plymouth spending the time at these places from Feb. 10 to Feb. 18. He held several meetings at Argos, and preached once at Plymouth. He expects soon to return to his home in Dakota. He is much loved and esteemed by all who know him, both as a man of irreproachable character and an able proclaimer of the glorious gospel of the Son of God. Although greatly missed in Indiana, it is our earnest prayer that his labors may be greatly blessed wherever his lot may be cast.

THE news from Europe is far from peaceful. The election in Germany was to take place on Monday, Feb. 21, and its results are awaited with the greatest solicitude. From the Paris correspondent's letter to the Chicago Journal of the latest date, we extract the following regarding the political situation of the Governments of the Old World.

"The Continental war cloud continues to be more lowering and more opaque. The French are playing their cards admirably; determined not to be drawn, and leaving it to Germany to fix a quarrel on them. France can not be denied the right to gird up her loins like her neighbors. If she can not forget Alsace, it is not true that she is panting to make an ugly rush to repossess it. The nation has no desire for war, its ruins and its blood tax. And Germany has only herself to blame for having every year to view the magnitude of the blunder she made in placing a Venetian mill-stone round her own neck. All other questions sink into insignificance before the European peril. Perhaps history has never witnessed the situation where all authorized statesmen are loud in their assurances of peace, and yet no one believes them. Why? Because their armaments out-ring their declarations of peace."

EDITORIAL BREVITIES.

There is a small sect of religionists in Economy, Pa., which is composed of persons designated by the term "Harmonists." Of this sect George Rapp, born in Wurtemberg, was the founder. Believing that he was divinely called to restore the Christian religion to its primitive purity he organized a community on the model of holding their goods in common. In 1803 this community was transplanted to the United States, making their first settlement on the Conequenessing Creek in Butler Co., Pa., where they founded the village of Harmony. In 1815 they removed to Indiana, and founded the settlement of New Harmony, which they sold to Robert Owen in 1824, and emigrated to Beaver Co., Pa., and laid out the town of Economy on the right bank of the Ohio, seventeen miles northwest of Pittsburgh. It is a manufacturing and agricultural community, professing Protestantism, strict in their morality, and paying much attention to educational matters. Members of both sexes are admitted, but they do not marry.

A friend sends us a copy of the Daily Era, of date Feb. 17, 1887, published at Bradford, Pa., from which we clip the following marked notice of the present anticipations and hopes of this peculiar people. It also gives some additional information, to what we have abbreviated above from another source. As there was a peculiar expectancy abroad in the world at Christ's first advent, of some coming one whose advent should affect the destiny of mankind, so there is at the present time a wide-spreading impression getting abroad that the same one is about to return again.

As a matter of interest to travelers we may remark that Economy is situated on the Pittsburgh, Ft. Wayne and Chicago Railway. We now give the article.

THE PENNSYLVANIA ECONOMITES SEE THE END OF ALL THINGS DRAWING NEAR.

ECONOMY, Pa., Feb. 16.—The Economites, or Harmonists, celebrated the eighty-second anniversary of the formation of that society yesterday. The day was devoted to feasting, praising God, rejoicing and making merry. For nearly a century the Economists have been daily expecting the second coming of Christ, as it is believed his glorious advent will take place before the death of the last surviving member of the society. In his discourse yesterday Elder Henrici said he believed the time for which they had waited so long was close at hand. The prophecies concerning the "last days" prior to the coming of Christ and the destruction of the world had been fulfilled, and he thought the present troubles in Europe, United States and Canada would shortly involve the 200,000,000 people spoken of by St. John, in bitter strife.

He reiterated the firm belief of the Harmonists that Christ will establish a kingdom upon Mount Sinai, and hinted at the removal of the entire society to Palestine as soon as there was an indication of the fulfilment of the last of the prophecies, that they might be ready to greet their Master at his coming and place all their possessions at his disposal. The Economite society numbered nearly 1,000 members at one time, but now there are not more than 500 survivors. Their property is valued at from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000.

IDOLS TO THE MOLES AND THE BATS.

"In that day a man shall cast his idols of silver, and his idols of gold, which they made each one for himself to worship, to the moles and to the bats." Isa. ii. 20.

Although this prophecy may have reference to something connected with the manifestation of God's judgments, still there is something remarkable in a discovery made a few years ago near Tarsus, Paul's native city. It would seem that some, that early embraced Christianity, perhaps during his second missionary tour, actually did with their idols as Isaiah prophesies. We append a note taken from "Conybeare and Howson's Life and Epistles of St. Paul," vol I. p. 258, which will, as we think, prove interesting to our readers. The note says, "In a mound which had formerly rested against a portion of the city wall, since removed, was discovered a large collection of terracotta figures and lamps. At first these were thought to be a shard-wreck, or the refuse of some ceramicus or pottery work. But on observing that the lamps had been used and that the earthenware gods (Dii fictiles) bore no trace of having been rejected because of defective workmanship, but on the contrary, had evidently been used, it has been imagined that these terracottas must have been thrown away, as connected with idolatry, on the occasion of some conversion to Christianity. The figures are such as these: a head of Pan, still showing the mortar by which it was set up in some garden or vineyard; the bo, Mercury; Cybele, Jupiter, Ceres crowned with corn, Apollo with rays, a lion devouring a bull, with other symbols of general or local mythology. There are, moreover, some ears, legs, etc., which seem to have been votive offerings, and which, therefore, it would have been sacrilege to remove; and a great number of lamps or incense burners, with a carbonaceous stain on them. The date when these things were thrown to the 'moles and bats' seems to be ascertained by the dressing of the hair in one of the female figures, which is that of the same period of the early emperors, as shown in the busts of Domitia, or Julia, the wife of Titus, the same that is censured by the Roman satirist and the Christian apostle."

In Acts xix. 19, we have a case somewhat parallel: "Many of them also which used curious arts brought their books together, and burned them before all men; and they counted the price of them, and found it fifty thousand pieces of silver."

HAPPY IN DEATH.—No. 8.

The quotation last made suggests to me the probable advantage of introducing, at this point, a condensed representation of the manner in which some of the more distinguished worthies on the Sacred Roll carried themselves through the final scene. Few details are given; for their remarkable experiences, if they had any, do not seem to have been reckoned by the historians as of special interest or value. This, be it carefully noted, is in direct contrast with the rule adopted by the biographers of eminent Christian saints. Every item as to their feelings, and hopes, and joys, and pious exercises is diligently collected into the memoir, and the more of these, and the more exceptional their quality, so much the greater interest is felt in the narrative. Even art, as we have seen, has been invoked to show how, with heaven supposed to be close at hand, a servant of Jesus could terminate his career, and thereby to awaken a holy desire, if we may not say ambition, to others so to live that they also might die in like manner. Though little of an experimental nature is on record as to the old-world saints, when passing hence, enough is furnished to show us that their exit was marked by devout, courageous manliness. It did not seem to occupy their thoughts to any large extent; engross their attention it certainly did not. Their feelings in contemplating it are nearly, if ever, made known. They seem to have regarded it composedly as among the inevitable things, and when their time arrived they laid themselves down and died, with as much calmness as they had in other days sought their couch for natural repose. Why should they not bow to the Divine will? Why should they dread being "gathered to their fathers," when it all happens by his ordination who has proved himself their friend, though unseen? "If I make my bed in Sheol"—among the dead—"Thou art there!"

These godly men, who had no illusive apprehensions of death, but saw it in its simple and stern reality, instead of dwelling on their emotions and on their glorious prospects, while others stood wondering around, were so far as we can discover, chiefly occupied on the solemn occasion with matters which, we may safely exclude, were in their esteem far more appropriate to their last moments, and perhaps far more honoring to the Being they adored. As a rule, self was forgotten—God and his interests alone engaged their mind and their speech.

Of Abraham, "Father of the faithful," it is simply written that he "gave up the ghost, and died in a good old age.... and was gathered to his people," Gen. xxv. Whilst all details as to the dying scene are excluded, his pious, trustful life is portrayed at length; and from this fact we may learn what in God's estimate is of supreme, and it may be of exclusive moment.

As for Jacob we behold him when his end was near, blessing the two sons of Joseph, blessing his own twelve sons, founders of the twelve tribes, adding prophetic descriptions of their respective characteristics and fortunes in the long ages of time, and then, having directed his family as to his burial, "He gathered up his feet into the bed, and yielded up the ghost, and was gathered to his people." Gen. xlix.

When Joseph is about to expire, he "said unto his brethren, I die: but God will visit you, and bring you up out of this land unto the land which he sware to Abraham, and Isaac, and to Jacob," Gen. l. And so speaking he passes into the unrelieved darkness—calmly, decorously, without a quaver, as became one who made the God of mercy his confidence.

Shortly before he went the way of all the earth, the sacred historian informs us, Joshua, the "Captain of the Lord's hosts," who seems to have occupied his exalted position with religious fidelity, assembled all Israel at Shechem, and delivered to the vast congregation a long and earnest address, warning his hearers against the crime of idolatry, and urging them to the pure worship of their Maker. Having, at its conclusion, sent them home, he retired to his own dwelling, where, after a brief interval, his countenance underwent the great change, Josh. xxiv. Once more only the fact is inscribed on the page; the how he died remains untold. He had finished his work, kept a loyal heart towards his God, and why should he not enter quietly on his rest, as the pious and stout-hearted had done before him? The saints in those ancient epochs appear to have thought that the life—the life alone, counts in the balances of God. And in that who will venture to assert they were mistaken?

We present but one case more, that of Elijah's successor in the prophetic office. In 2 Kings xiii. 14, it stands, —"Now Elisha was fallen sick of his sickness, whereof he died: and Joash the King of Israel came down unto him, and wept over him, and said:—'My father, my father, the chariots of Israel, and the horsemen thereof!' intimating thereby his profound sense of the help this man of God, so gifted with wisdom and supernatural power, had rendered, and what an irreparable loss his removal would be to himself as a sovereign and to his country. Then the Seer leads his visitor to understand that Syria, his enemy, would be smitten by him thrice, though had he literally obeyed the prophet's voice in the chamber where they were, the king might have had a guarantee of absolute victory when the battle came to be joined. Thus ended at once the good man's help to his sovereign, and the whole term of his sublime mission; for instantly it is written—"And Elisha died, and they buried him,"—few, but expressive words. As to how he behaved at the very close, or what testimony he delivered, if he made any communication to friend or stranger of his inmost thoughts, there is not one syllable in the history. Likely he confided his last interests and his child-like acceptance of the event about to happen only to the ear of him who had been a loving guardian to him from his birth, and whom he had by grace divine served so long.

Thus the simple, heroic, God-fearing men in the ancient days met the King of Terrors; thus, in other words, they parted with life and silently entered into the gloom of the sepulchre. They knew what death meant. No hallucinations, no dreams, usurping the place and the power of the facts, shed a radiance where there was silence and night. They could scarcely fail to recoil instinctively, though in pious meekness of heart, from the destiny before them, perhaps the reflection that they would soon be with those who "Praise not the Lord," imparted to their solemnized reflections a hue of sadness and depression, at which no sensitive and unperverted mind will be astonished. As they had lived in union and fellowship with God, we may assume with perfect propriety that their end was peace, though, as we have noticed, that circumstance is not inscribed on the sacred page. It looks as if the tranquil characteristic was held to be but a matter of course; and yet after all not a thing to be rated highly in determining their worth as mortal beings in God's sight, or as having any essential bearings on their fortunes hereafter. This, however, is affirmed of them:—"these all died in faith,"—died believing in the merciful God and Father—committing themselves to his charge through the protracted night—seeing in calm prospective vision the fulfilment at last of his pledges, and assured that they would have a share in the splendors and transports when the predestined heavenly ages should begin. They died, then, as they had lived from the time of their conversion. Their new life had its origin and support in faith, and they lived as believers, and they died as they had lived. It is, we admit, highly probable that every one of them expired in conscious peace—perfect rest in God and in his will; but their safety was in no degree suspended on that condition of feeling, much less one of a more exalted or mystical nature, even supposing it formed an element in their spiritual history. Feelings are deceptive, because fancies and facts may, as already observed, produce emotions identical in color and force. In this of all matters the most vital, shall we risk a delusion that may be the prelude to ruin? Discerning a surer warrant of hope, we assert their safety, or final welfare, rested alone on the love, and mercy, and faithfulness of God, who had owned them as his sons when they returned to his heart, and dedicated their whole talents and possessions to his service: who had supplied ample grace to assist them in doing his will, or in suffering as he might require; and whose eternal purpose, whether it had been revealed to them or no, is that none of the regenerate shall perish, but that the entire company shall be raised up at the last day in glory, and honor, and immortality, to dwell with him in everlasting love.

SIMPLICITY IN RELIGION.

Canon Farrar, who is as liberal-minded as he is fearless and able, in a recent sermon declared that where England made one Christian in heathen lands, she made a hundred drunkards. This was a bold assertion—almost too bold to at first seem true, but the more one examines into it and reads the authorities upon the conditions and recent history of the uncivilized countries where missionary effort has been directed, the more painfully truthful does the statement become. Of course, the reports sent out by missionaries give a more sanguine coloring, but with all due respect to the zeal and self-sacrifice of these worthy gentlemen, the way to arrive at a true appreciation of the situation is to examine all the evidence. When that is done it will be found that what Canon Farrar has said not a false alarm, but a great evil that the mission work must face squarely and endeavor to remedy.

Remarkable testimony of the correctness of Canon Farrar's assertion comes from an unexpected quarter. Mr. Joseph Thomson is a distinguished African traveller. He has conducted three expeditions to East Central Africa. He is a Christian, thoroughly imbued with the spirit and interests of his religion. He goes further than Canon Farrar, and says: "For every African who is influenced for good by Christianity, a thousand are driven into deeper degradation by the gin trade." He declares that "four hundred years of contact with Europeans have only succeeded, along the greater part of the coast, in raising a taste for gin, rum, gunpowder and guns." Mr. Thomson says he had seen so much of this sort of thing that he began to believe that the negro was not capable of development. But when he reached the heart of Africa, his pessimism suffered a severe shock. These are his words:

"I could hardly believe I was not dreaming when I looked around me and found large, well-built cities, many of them containing 10,000 to 30,000 inhabitants. The people themselves, picturesquely and voluminously dressed, moved about with that self-possessed, sober dignity, which bespeaks the man who has a proper respect for himself. I saw on all sides the signs of an industrious community, differentiated into numerous crafts—evidence sufficient to show how far advanced they were on the road to civilization. I heard the rattle, the tinkle, and the musical clang of the workers in iron, in brass, and in copper. I could see cloth being made in one place, and dyed, or sewn into gowns or other articles of dress in other places. In the markets, crowded with eager thousands, I could see how varied were the wants of these negro people, how manifold the productions of their industry, and how keen their business instincts. Almost more remarkable than anything else, no native beer or spirits, nor European gin and rum, found place in their markets. Clearly there were no barriers, and therefore no sellers."

What had caused this? Christianity? No; it was Mohammedanism, and not only had it done that, but it had established schools, built churches, and made the people as devout as they are prosperous. The lessons for their success must perforce be interesting. They are given from Mr. Thomson's article. The Mohammedans do not teach theology; they teach religion! They do not muddle the heathen brain with dogmas: they try to acquaint it with the few great truths. Their success lies in one word—simplicity. And most important of all, they make temperance an absolute religious necessity.

Of course, we do not want any one to draw the inference from these facts that Mohammedanism is superior to Christianity. It is far behind it. But this is not a question of superior religion, it is a question of superior method. The Mohammedans have succeeded where the Christians have failed, because they have shown more simplicity and more common sense. Let an ignorant man listen to the transcendental discussions of the Andover professors on the doctrine of future probation, and he will fall asleep. Place the same man under the simple teachings of Mr. Moody, and the plain words of truth and encouragement will reach his heart and cause his interest to deepen into conviction. The Christian religion is something too grand, too beautiful, too important, to be led off into side issues of involved discussion. The more simply it is presented the greater are the results. The less dogmatism the greater the vital force. We may send missionaries among the heathen, and they may preach the doctrines of the churches, but their success will never be great until they learn simplicity and practice it. Then, too, we will never evangelize the world by sending over missionaries in one boat to preach against intemperance, and then following it with another vessel loaded with cheap gin and whisky.—Selected by I. McCurry from the Baltimore American.

Little We Know of Each Other.

How little we know of each other,
We pass through the journey of life,
With its struggles, its fears and temptations,
Its hopes breaking cares and its strife.
We see those about us on the surface,
For few of us glory in vain
And an cheerful face is no index
Of care that rages within.

How little we know of our brother,
The man who walks quietly by
With weak ones with labor and toil,
And builds his heart proudly on high.
Our earth-dead years is within him
That soldier exultance must greet
Of crime, or self-torture, or sorrow.

How little we know of each other,
The woman of fashion who meets
At her sister whose fate has all undone
To poverty, misery, tears,
May prate are the vain she-tomorrow
More deeply immersed in disgrace.
And the sadness she cared in sheltered
He plotted upon her own face.

How little we know of each other,
Of our own hearts how little we see:
We are all feeble under temptation,
Be our station be life high or low,
Ah! then let sweet charity rule us,
And help one another to win
The crown is that awaits those who strive for Avoidance of shame and of sin.

The Early Life of Christ.

We think, I apprehend, too little of those quiet domestic years of secluded, unpretending piety of Jesus, at Nazareth. Our eyes are dazzled by the outward glory which surrounded his path when he burst from his long concealment, and showed himself as the Son of the Highest. And yet there is a sense in which we should have more interest in the earlier, than in the later period of his life. It is like the life we have ourselves to lead. The Jesus of Nazareth is more a pattern to us than the Jesus of Gethsemane and the cross. He was not less the Son of God in the one case than in the other; nor less in the one character than in the other, has he left us an example that we should follow his steps. It was thus the great lesson of his life at Nazareth, as interpreted by his sayings in the temple, that no should be about our Father's business, in the counting-house, in the workshop, at the desk, as much as in the higher or more public walks of Christian or philanthropic effort; that a life confined and devoted to the faithful exercise of the simple, humble offices of daily domestic duty, if it be a life of faith and love, may be one as full of God, as truly divine and holy, as Christ-like and as honoring to Christ, as a life devoted to the most important public service that can be rendered to the church on earth.

In the quiet and deep-lying valleys of life, all hidden from human eye, who can tell us how many there are who, built up in a humble trust in Jesus, and animated by their hope in him, are performing cheerfully their daily tasks because a Father's wisdom has allotted them, and bearing faithfully their daily burdens because they have been imposed by a Father's love, content to live and labor and endure, and die unnoticed and unknown, earthly fame hanging no wreath upon their tomb, earthly eloquence dumb over their dust? These are they, the last among men, who shall be the first in the kingdom of the just.—Dr. Hanna.

Dear Children:

While Jesus was journeying with haste toward the home of a certain ruler of the synagogue, much people followed him, and thronged him. Among the multitude was a weak, sick, tremulous woman, who no doubt had been greatly perplexed how she could come near enough to Jesus to touch him, as one in her condition, according to the law of Moses, was forbidden to do so. Probably she had heard of many who had been cured, but saw no way to come near him. The dear sufferer had been sick twelve long years, had spent all her means on physicians, but grew worse instead of better. I can imagine when she saw Jesus, perhaps she thought, this may be my last chance of getting healed, but how dare I defile one so loving, so kind and good. No, rather let me bear my suffering than render him unclean.

She was evidently a daughter of Abraham, and knew the law. Timidly she hoped to be hid in the press behind him, and ventured in the crowd to touch his garment, saying to herself, "If I may but touch the hem of his garment I shall be made whole," and her timid touch of living faith caused precious healing virtue to flow out of our blessed Redeemer. Instantly her body was healed of that plague. Jesus, knowing that virtue had gone out of him, turned him about in the press, and said, Who touched my clothes? And his disciples said, Thou seest the multitude thronging thee, and sayest thou, Who touched me? And Jesus looked round about to see her that had done this thing. But the woman, fearing and trembling, knowing that she was healed, came and fell down before him and told him all the truth. Our precious Redeemer said unto the poor, trembling one, "Daughter, thy faith hath made thee whole; go in peace and be whole of thy plague." Dear children, how love, which is the fulfilling of the law, sent forth her healing flow of life, inexhaustible love has no boundary line, but she gently whispers to living faith, Fear not, the wall of partition is broken down. Handle me, feel me, it is I, who came that ye might have life, and that ye might have it more abundantly.

Your affectionate Teacher,
E. COPPMAN.

Report of Elder Carter's Work in Kansas.

We believe it to be of interest to the brotherhood and encouraging in the cause of Christ to know that there are still noble workers in the cause of our dear Master. Elder Carter came to Centropolis Jan. 2nd. He commenced meetings in the Baptist Church and was informed he could have the house as long as he desired. After holding meetings a week with crowded houses and the people anxious to listen to the truth, he was informed on coming to church on Sunday morning that their Baptist minister would occupy the pulpit that day and would hold a protracted meeting. So we accordingly made arrangements to have him continue his lectures at the Campbellite Christian church. But they also thought it proper to commence a series of meetings at the Christian church. They however took the precaution to try to keep the M. E. Church locked against him but did not succeed. So he continued his lectures with crowded houses and splendid success for four weeks and two days, giving in all thirty discourses. People came with note books and Bibles, exceedingly anxious to investigate the truth. It is needless to say their congregations dwindled away and they were compelled to close their meetings at the Baptist and Christian churches.

The Christian minister challenged Elder Carter for a discussion which was accepted. The time set was Feb. 8th; discussion to continue four days. Two propositions were arranged. First: Resolved that the kingdom of heaven spoken of in Dan. ii. 44, was organically set up or organized the first Pentecost after the resurrection of Christ. Eld. Robertson affirms; Eld. Carter denies. Second proposition: Resolved that the kingdom of heaven mentioned in Dan. ii. 44, will be set up at the second advent of Christ. Eld. Carter affirms; Eld. Robertson denies. Today is the fourth day and the discussion will close tonight. No judges were chosen, but it is generally conceded that Robertson lost the first proposition. At least three ministers who were in sympathy with Eld. Robertson's position, so decided. The best of feeling has pervaded so far. The array of truth and the testimony of the Bible will certainly prevail. Hundreds of people have been attending and have become interested as they never have been before. There are many calls for workers. Brother Carter has more calls than he can fill.

Feb. 14. The discussion has closed. Elder Carter has conclusively shown that the kingdom is yet future and that it will be given to the saints when Jesus comes. He has sustained his position with a wonderful array of proof texts. The sudden death of Sister DeWolf will be recorded in the obituary notice elsewhere.

THE SWEET OLD STORY.

Tell me about the Master!
I am weary and worn to-night,
The day lies behind me in shadow,
And only the evening is light!
Light with radiant glory
That lingers about the West,
My poor heart is aweary, aweary,
And longs, like a child, for rest.

Tell me about the Master!
Of the life he in loneliness led,
When the tears and blood of his anguish
Dropped down on Judea's sad.
For to me life's seventy mile stones
Had a sorrowful journey mark:
Rough lies the hill country before me.
The mountains behind me are dark.

Tell me about the Master!
Of the woman he freely forgave;
Of his love and tender compassion,
Of his love that is mighty to save;
For my heart is aweary, aweary,
Of the work and temptations of life,
Of the error that clings in the noonday,
Of falsehood and malice and strife.

Yet I know that whatever of sorrow
Or pain or temptation befall,
The Infinite Master hath suffered,
And knoweth and pitieth all.
So tell me the sweet old story,
That falls on each wound like a balm,
And my heart that was banished and broken
Shall grow patient and strong and calm.

Paternity, Genealogy, Nature and Character of Jesus, in the light of the Covenants; being two Lectures, with some Additions, delivered at Wyoming, Delaware, by Dr. J. C. Thomas.—No. 1.

"What think ye of Christ? Whose Son is he?" Matt. xxii. 42.

This most important question was asked by Christ himself, of the Pharisees—cavilling fleshly Jews. They answered him, The Son of David. Then said Jesus, "How then doth David, in spirit, (by inspiration—Diaglott) call him Lord?" That is, if the Messiah was to be the son of David, how then was it that David by the Spirit or inspiration of God, in Psalm cx., called his son LORD? If David called him Lord, how is he his son? But they could not answer the question. They were full of self-conceit, and professed to understand and believe the Scriptures. Yet they could not answer the question. They did not understand how it was. For it is written that no man can understand, so as to be able to say, "Jesus is THE LORD, but by the Holy Spirit." 1 Cor. xii. 3. "God even the FATHER of our Lord Jesus Christ," 2 Cor. i. 3, having by his Holy Spirit, revealed that great truth, to David, that the Messiah was to be both Son of God and son of David, in God's own way, and by his own power "taking hold" of the seed or flesh of Abraham and David; see Heb. ii. 14–16; margin and R. V.; in begetting and manipulating, both for David and himself a Son; David could therefore so speak of him, prophetically and truthfully calling him Lord. Had not "the Father of our Lord," thus purposed, promised, and revealed to David the nature and character of his Son—the wonderful Being to come as Messiah—he could not have known it and called him Lord. And although that promise was literally fulfilled eighteen hundred years ago—that wonderful Being, Son of the Highest and Son of David—Son of God and Son of man—actually making his appearance upon the stage of action among men; and although the Father of our Lord, at that time, sent the angel Gabriel to tell the woman—the virgin, of the house of David, of whom he was to be born; in answer to her question, how it should be—to tell her how her offspring—"the seed of the woman"—should be Son of God as well as Son David; Luke i. xxvi. 35; to tell and make known to all men who have faith in God and his word, just how to answer the question that Jesus asked the Pharisees, viz., "How then doth David by the Spirit call him Lord?" The answer being as follows: "The Holy Spirit shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee; therefore that offspring (Whiting) which is to be born of thee, shall be called the Son of God." Although, I say, the Father hath so exactly fulfilled his word, and condescended to clearly make known how his wonderful purpose and promise should be accomplished; yet there are some who doubt it, some who stumble over it, some who will not accept it, but who try hard to make it appear unjustififul; and that the correct answer to our Savior's question, Whose Son is he? is, that Jesus was the natural son of Joseph! The son of Joseph by begettal!

Now this question is one of the most momentous. There can be no question of greater importance. Even the jailor's question, "What must I do to be saved? is no more important than this: for Jesus himself said, I am from above; I am not of this world. "If ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins." John viii. 24. Hence to make a mistake here, to suppose as did the wicked Jews, that Jesus was the son of Joseph, and refuse to believe that he was "from above, not of this world;" was and still is, a fatal mistake. For he that believeth not shall be condemned. To believe in Christ, is to believe that he was from above, "the only begotten Son of the Father" the one that all the prophets wrote about and prophesied should come, who was the WORD with God in the beginning, and was God; and also to believe what he taught, his "sayings," his words, his gospel. To belive all this, is simply faith in Christ—the condition of salvation. But mind, that faith must be strong enough to produce love and obedience—a faith which consists in "being fully persuaded that what God had promised, he was able also to perform," Rom. iv. 19–21. In other words, "faith made perfect by works." James ii. 17–26; or in other words still, "faith which worketh by love;" Gal. v. 6; and which purifies the heart;" Acts xv. 9; and life; 1 Peter i. 22.

Now then, I say, there are some who have listened to mistaken teachers, who think, as was supposed by the wicked fleshly Jews, that Christ was the son of Joseph, and not the Son of God as he claimed to be. The ignorant wicked Jews charged him with blasphemy, and took up stones to stone him to death for claiming to be the Son of God, and they ultimately accomplished their murderous intent and killed the Prince of life. Those ignorant blinded Jews said "we stone thee for blasphemy; and because thou being a man makest thyself God. Jesus answered them, Say ye of him whom the Father hath sanctified and sent into the world, thou blasphemest, because I said I am the Son of God?" John x. 33, 36. And yet strange to say, and most unaccountable; there are some who profess to believe the Scriptures, and without doubt, really think they do believe them—who profess to believe Christ's own words; and yet, who think that those ignorant blinded Jews, to whom Jesus said "ye judge after the flesh," were right in their supposition that Jesus was the son of Joseph—that Jesus had been begotten by Joseph, and not by the Power of the Highest, according to the words of Gabriel to Mary; of which words the Jews knew nothing. I have no doubt but those persons who so think (whom for convenience and no other purpose, I denominate Josephites) are just as sincere and honest as were those wicked Jews who "crucified and slew by wicked hands the Holy One," Peter said to them, "now brethren I know that through ignorance ye did it, as did also your rulers." It is possible therefore, for a person even to "think that he doeth God service" when he is killing the disciples of Christ. John xvi. 2. So thought Paul when he put to death the disciples of Christ. He says, I verily thought with myself that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus." But I obtained mercy, because I did it ignorantly in unbelief." What people think therefore, is of no avail with God, except it be in harmony with what the word says. To the law and to the testimony: if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them."

These questions, What think ye of Christ? Whose Son is he? clearly involve the Paternity, Genealogy, Nature and Character of Jesus, as revealed and set forth in the Scriptures, and no where else. They cannot be answered by the thinkings of the flesh; by what this or that great writer, or great man thinks about them. No book but the Bible—God's own book—can decide these purely Scriptural questions propounded by the great Teacher himself. No other book than the Bible, which contains the Father's own record of his Son. "He that believeth not God hath made him a liar; because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son." 1 John v. 10. No other book can possibly afford the least proof in deciding and answering these all-important questions. Hence we appeal to the word. What saith the record?

I cannot help thinking that every careful reader into whose hands this little work may come, who has heard of this fatal delusion held by the Josephites—that Jesus was begotten by Joseph, and not by the Power of the Highest—the Holy Spirit—but who has hitherto never carefully examined the subject for himself; will be astonished to see what little grounds they have in the Scriptures for their theory: and how much there is, and how much positive proof there is, for the other side of the question—that Jesus, when here "in the days of his flesh," was "the only begotten Son of the living God"—begotten by the Holy Spirit, wielded by the power of the Highest. Although in the compass of this little work I shall not be able to produce more than a small part of the evidence on the side of the truth, contained in the Scriptures from beginning to end.

I cannot avoid the conclusion that every such reader will also wonder how it is possible for any one who has carefully and properly examined the subject, to entertain such a fallacy for one moment: and therefore to conclude that those who hold it have never thoroughly examined the Scriptures on the subject with sufficient care and thought; otherwise that they must be relying more on what mistaken unbelieving writers think and say, than what the Scriptures say—upon flimsy, fallacious evidence outside the Bible, instead of the Father's own record of his Son, and the Son's own words and testimony concerning himself.

Here, let me ask the reader to first consider two or three questions, viz.: What think you, can you imagine what can be the object of trying to make out that Jesus, the promised Messiah—the Savior of the world—was begotten by Joseph? Begotten by the will of the flesh? What could be gained if that could be proved? Would our reverence and admiration and love for him, be thereby increased? Would he have been more powerful to save? Would we be more likely to "honor the Son even as we honor the Father?" For my part, I must confess, that I cannot conceive nor understand what sort of mental organization a person must have, nor what object they can have, to desire and be anxious to make out that Jesus our Redeemer, our Savior, was nothing but a man: and to do so upon such flimsy, unworthy grounds; and resort to such absurd notions as we shall see.

TIME.

All who love the Son of God would rejoice to know that the date of his return to the world was clearly revealed.

No conviction that it was so revealed, or at least to be strongly inferred, many persons even from apostolic times have looked for that blessed hope to be realized either in their day or some period not far remote.

That the six thousand years were nearly accomplished, and were antityped by the six periods or days of creation, has always been a ground of expectation, for we read that "One day is with the Lord as a thousand years," and knowing that the last day of Gentile times inaugurated the thousand years of the reign of Christ, that inference was very plausible. Be that as it may we may be assured that it is not a matter of positive assurance on which faith may be built, otherwise the word of the Lord Jesus would have lost its force, for it was declared as a ground of motive for continued readiness to the church at all time. "Ye know not whether it shall be at midnight or at cock-crowing or morning. At such a time as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh." Had the coming of the Son of Man been contingent upon the lapse of six thousand years, the disciples of apostolic times and later, could not have been, (as all history ecclesiastical, profane and sacred declare) expecting the possible return of the Lord in their day. Is it not most probable that the statement of the apostle Peter, concerning a thousand years being as one day, etc., was to convey an emphatic idea of the all-comprehension of time by the ever living God.

But the stronghold of believers in definite time, rests on the prophecy of Ezekiel, who in predicting the history of Jerusalem, was commanded by the Lord to signify the time by certain acts covering periods of 390 and 40 days, "a day for a year."

That this was to be adopted as a rule for the interpretation of other dates is entirely without warrant.

Daniel's prediction of "seventy weeks to Messiah the Prince," may be cited to the contrary, but it must be observed that the term week is (in my information is correct) significant of periods of seven irrespective of whether days, months, or years, but which, judged by fulfilment, must have been seventy times seven years. No inference can be made the basis of confidence in things hoped for, and therefore "not of faith."

Another reason for not trusting to definite dates is the unreliability of all data. Look at our marginal Bible references, and see the date of Daniel's vision of 2300 days to the cleansing of the sanctuary, and we find the date to be 553 before Christ, add the two and the sum is 2484, therefore long past. Take the times to the time of end, admit them to be 1260, or 1260 days symbolical of years, and start with time, guided by Christ's own interpretation. Jerusalem encompassed with armies, as synonymous with the setting up of the abomination that maketh desolate. The date of this being about A. D. 70, deduct from the longer period 1260, answer 1220 A. D.

Whoever builds a house upon the sand, is by our Lord likened to a foolish man. Can those who build such arguments on so shifting a basis as chronology, be counted wise virgins?

As the prophecy of Daniel was open in apostolic days, and the admonition given regarding these very events, "Let the reader understand," would it not be strange if our Great Master knew not the time of his return? Supposing the day for a year theory to have been then open to God's people. Could the church of Thessalonica have been in doubt concerning the day of Christ, if the dates of Daniel and the revelation by Ezekiel were known to the apostles inspired? How easy would it have been to say to them in their distress, "the dates run at least 1200 years, perhaps 1700 before the Lord comes to cleanse the sanctuary." But not such a word, otherwise we read the words of Paul "We who are alive and remain," and the surmise that probably John would tarry to the coming of his Lord. It is absolutely clear that on no revealed data, so interpreted, could the Master return before a very long period.

How very contrary to the spirit of all New Testament admonition to "Watch and be ready" I need not say. But erring men are always anxious to justify their own wisdom. How presumptuously men have claimed to be "the wise who should understand" we well know. The very persons claiming such wisdom being often ignorant of the first principles of the truth, and far from righteousness.

All persons familiar with the great agitation of 1843, will remember how Rollin, and Gibbon, and Mosheim were racked to support a theory in harmony with the dates of William Miller, and thus destroying all simple faith.

But is there no meaning in all the dates of Daniel, and the Apocalypse by John? Far be it from our thoughts, but we must compare spiritual things with spiritual, and not take the unreliable words of infidelity and superstition, as a foundation for that wisdom which begins in the fear of the Lord.

We must ever take our views of prophecy from the standpoint of those to whom prophecies were addressed. Thus Daniel in all his prayers and fastings, was burdened for Judah, his people. Even Jesus spoke and prophesied to his people as Jews and children of or lost sheep of Israel. The development of the ecclesia out of all nations was then a mystery, but afterwards revealed through apostles and prophets, that the Gentiles should be fellow heirs with all the faithful children of Jacob.

We may depend upon it that whoever lives to see the events of these data will be greatly in need of definite time, they will be in the great tribulation such as never was or never will be again, and, as John's vision was past the period of the destruction of Jerusalem, and his dates now long past if based on that event, the tribulation alluded to in Rev. iii., from which the overcomer is to be (except or) delivered is yet in the future, when according to Daniel many that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake.

The vision of John clearly shows that after this part of the body of Christ, or firstfruits is caught up to meet him, others will be prepared to unite with them and together they will reign with the Christ a thousand years.

The argument for this is very brief. John's vision was of things shortly to come to pass. No past events reasonably fulfil Revelations xiii.

The work of the beast power there delineated corresponds closely with Daniel's prediction of the abomination and Paul's of the man of sin. While these events progress, a class gathered out of all nations are in supervision, and before the throne of the Lamb slain (still a Lamb). Rev. xx. 4, brings to view those who are under persecution, but obey God, and are faithful to death, as reigning with Christ.

If this view is correct, and I do not dogmatize, only seeing here much harmony, and less inconsistency than other views have, there seems to be a necessity for separating the events of the first resurrection, thus:

"The dead in Christ shall rise first," (The elders, etc.). Afterwards (Epista) those who are alive and remain, in successive bands, or orders. Lastly the seventh trumpet, when the kingdoms of this world become, etc., and all the saints are changed to immortality in the twinkling of an eye, glorious consummation of Almighty power and love.

As the sum of the dates of the Apocalypse, literally read and believed (excepting the thousand years which we generally claim to be literal time, why not the rest of the time then)? do not cover much over seven years if as much even, there seems a great reason for believing that when God is "saving the house of Judah first" and gathering Israel home, that every event of fulfilling prophecy will be easily understood by the wise who then as Daniel predicts will turn many to righteousness, and shine as stars for the ages of ages.

Can it be believed by unbiassed persons that any prophecy can be fulfilled and the fulfilment be a matter of doubt to the faithful and believing Christian? Did any event ever so happen in past fulfilment about which discussion and confusion were most common, and where all the stores of history had to be ransacked for proof. No, no. R. T. YOUNG.

THE BIRDS OF PALESTINE.

The testimony of travellers with regard to the birds of Palestine is very conflicting. One person will travel through the country, and say: "How very few birds there are. I have seen almost none." Another will say: "The country is full of birds." Much depends upon the season of the year when one visits Palestine, and much more, perhaps, upon one's habit of observation. In fact, Palestine may be said to abound with birds if one counts with such as remain throughout the year those that simply pass through the country. Such of the latter as are caught here are generally reckoned, whether rightly or wrongly, among the birds of Palestine.

The list of birds that have been noticed in Palestine hitherto numbers not far from 350 different species. When one considers the birds or flowers of Palestine, one has to bear in mind the strange physical conformation of the country. In a belt of about one hundred miles in width from east to west we find the sea-coast, the mountain range of Western Palestine, the unusual depression of the Jordan Valley, the long mountain range of Gilead, and the great plateau which stretches eastward from Gilead and southward from Damascus. Here are at least four marked varieties of country, counting the mountain ranges east and west of the Jordan as one, each to a certain degree possessing animal life peculiar to itself. There are birds on the sea-coast which never visit the mountains of Western Palestine or the mountains of Gilead. The same is true of the Jordan Valley. The Jordan Valley is a tropical region where tropical varieties of birds exist.

It is common to associate birds of beautiful plumage with a tropical climate; but in general the plumage of the birds of Palestine is rather dull. There are here a number of birds that should be described in this way, but they are not all found in one locality; some are peculiar to the sea-coast, others to the mountains, and others still to the Jordan valley, so that if one were to visit, for instance, the region about Jerusalem he would see of such birds as we are describing only the roller, the bee-eater, the hoopoe, the jay, and, very rarely, the golden oriole, and these, in fact, only at certain seasons. Some of the chats about Jerusalem have bright plumage, but it is in no way remarkable. On the sea-coast or by the Jordan one would see three kinds of kingfishers, of which the Smyrna kingfisher has very striking and showy plumage; the sun-birds, the flamingo, the egrets, the purple fern, and the white pelican. Some of the wild ducks, the houbara bustard, the francolin, and a few other birds, while they are not showy as seen from a distance, are remarkable for the fineness and delicacy of the pencilling of their feathers when these are examined closely. On the other hand, the jay, to which we have already alluded as a bird of beautiful plumage, is showy in the distance, but when closely examined the feathers are seen to be coarse and the general appearance is rough.

Again, a land of birds is supposed to be a land of song; but as regards Palestine, it is a remarkable fact that it possesses very few song-birds. Jackdaws, crows and ravens call, swallows and sparrows chatter, larks warble forth their happy notes, bulbuls coo in the fondest manner, and a few other birds utter their peculiar notes; but loud and sweet songsters there are none. The great heat of the country and the absence of forests may in part account for this.

One cannot have failed to notice that the writers of the Hebrew Scriptures make almost innumerable allusions to birds and their habits, showing that they were careful observers of such things. The comparisons, symbols, and lessons which they draw from this source are striking and beautiful. Moses was very careful to distinguish between clean and unclean birds, Lev. xi. Deut. xiv., and the prohibition must have been founded upon close observation of the habits of birds in general, assisted, no doubt, by divine guidance. Furthermore the great lawgiver appeals directly to the tender and humane feelings of the Hebrews when he gives directions regarding their treatment of the mother bird when found with her eggs or her young, Deut. xxii.

It may be noted that the conduct of the inhabitants of Palestine today is in direct contrast to the injunctions to which allusion has just been made. Tender feelings for animals of any kind are entirely wanting in their character. Gentle treatment of any living thing is quite unknown. Moreover, as regards the eating of birds and animals, many are devoured which people in civilized countries would never think of eating. A number of those in the list of unclean birds, as found in Leviticus xi., are readily devoured by the natives, and among wild animals they eat the fox and the hyena. There are also people who eat oats. It may be that great poverty has brought the people to a condition of great degradation; but what I have stated above I base upon six years' observation and experience with the natives of Palestine, whose habits in regard to their food have sometimes shocked me. These remarks apply, of course, to the poorer of the town and peasant classes, and to the menial class among the Bedouin.

For a country of such a limited extent, Palestine is one of the most remarkable on the globe for the number of its birds of prey, which is estimated as high as forty-five or fifty species. Most of the large birds of prey are called by the general term of nisser, which mean eagle. Travellers often report that they saw a number of eagles when in reality they saw only vultures. The natives, unless pressed, do not trouble themselves to give definite answers to questions that are put to them by the tourists. An answer that will satisfy their questioner is the proper answer. As is very natural it is the peasants and the wild Arabs who distinguish most readily between birds, and who are able to apply to each its appropriate name. The higher classes and the well-to-do people of the large towns care nothing for such things and seldom know one bird from another.

Travellers have frequently said to me: "We saw at such and such a place several very large birds soaring round and round above our camp. Sometimes they would soar very high and again very low quite near our heads." Yes, those are Egyptian vultures. They are often called "Pharaoh's chickens." In the spring, summer, and autumn they are very abundant and always follow Bedouin encampments. They are a most unclean bird, and their heads, what one might call their faces, have a hideous appearance.

We have spoken of the fact that most of the birds of the country have their particular seasons, and to one who live at or near Jerusalem the ravens furnish a striking illustration of this. In the autumn the air seems to be alive with them. They cover the hill-tops, rocks and crags, and hundreds resort every night to the walls of Jerusalem for roosting-places. Perhaps no bird during those months is more common than the raven, while in the spring and early summer a raven about Jerusalem is very seldom seen.

Probably the most abundant of the game birds of Palestine is the partridge, of which there are two kinds. One kind is found about the Dead Sea and in the Jordan Valley but does not second to the mountains. It is about one-half the size of the other kind which exists in the valleys and on the plains, but which is found chiefly in the mountainous regions. In the autumn the land seems to swarm with them. The Arabs catch them in great numbers and sell them to the hotels and private houses, for their flesh is highly prized. This is doubtless the kind of partridge to which David refers when he speaks of himself as being hunted by Saul like "a partridge in the mountains," (1 Samuel xxvi. 20). These birds are easily tamed, become great pets in a household, and are fondly attached to their masters.

The natives of the country have many devices besides firearms for catching birds, and it may be of interest to mention that among some of the Bedouin tribes falcons are still taught and employed for this purpose. Whenever they entertain important guests, particularly if they are Europeans, to send out their falcons to hunt in one of their standard entertainments.

It could not be expected in a short article to give an elaborate account of the birds of Palestine, and nothing has been now attempted beyond stating a few facts which may be of interest to the general reader. Lists, names, localities, times of nesting, times of migration, and many other characteristics and habits of birds have for the most part necessarily been omitted. We may add that the work of the naturalist in this country, whether we consider its birds, animals, insects, flowers, or fossils, is not yet complete. Much has been done during the past ten or twenty years to increase our knowledge respecting these interesting subjects, but very much remains yet to be accomplished. It may be mentioned that the most extensive work on the Flora and Fauna of Palestine is that of Dr. Tristram, a large quarto volume, published in London by the Committee of the Palestine Exploration Fund in 1884. It is probable that Dr. Tristram and the writer of this article have the two most extensive and complete collections of the birds and animals of Palestine that exist at present, but which of these two collections is the more complete it would be difficult to say.— Selah Merrill, LL.D., U. S. Consul, Jerusalem, in Independent.

JERUSALEM, Oct. 31, 1886.

Jerusalem is a place which draws to one common centre from all parts of the world people with the religious bump largely developed. It is not strange that it should be so, for the Scriptures are found everywhere full of events which have transpired on this soil from a time shortly after the flood down to 1800 years ago. There are always women from other lands devoting themselves to doing good as they have opportunity. You have no analogous case to compare with the peculiar calls for help which are presented constantly here. For instance, within two or three years about 400 Jews came here from Yemen in Arabia in complete destitution, and then the few philanthropically inclined had their hands full of work. These women of whom we speak each in her way did what they could to feed, shelter and otherwise care for these refugees or rather poverty-stricken Jews consisting of men, women and children.

At another time a company of Germans of a zeal which drew them from their homes to come to the "Holy City," but which did not lodge, clothe or feed them, were also looked after to some extent by these women. These poor people crawled into the quarries or caves under Jerusalem and were likely to die there in the darkness, but the government put a door to the entrance and locked them out. A man was found starving a while ago whom a couple of women had helped to food, shelter and washing his clothes for him, etc. He proved to be talented, and now within the past month has published a book in Hebrew poetry regarding the restoration of the Jews. A woman gave him enough to print an edition of 500, and to pay the postage on those sent abroad. Her money too enables him to live in a frugal way while getting out his book, and upon it he is traveling just now among the nine Jewish colonies established in Palestine. So it goes; the city has to draw from Europe for the assistance of those who would otherwise starve just as in Paul's time.

The doctors of the various hospitals and dispensaries meet an overwhelming number of people hard up, dying for want of food or proper lodgings. If it is true any where in this world, it is true here, that the needfuls ye have with you always.

As the cold rains are soon expected, I intend D. V. starting for the U. S. in a week.—Gratuit, in New Age.

DEWOLF.—At Centropolis, (Franklin Co.,) Kan., Feb. 11, 1887, Catharine M., wife of H. F. DeWolf, aged 60 years, 3 months and 28 days.

She died of heart disease while on her way to church in company with her husband and three grandchildren. She has been a firm believer and an active worker in spreading the precious truth for more than thirty years. She died in full faith of meeting Jesus when he comes. She leaves a husband, two sons and one daughter to mourn her loss. The children have lost a noble, devoted, cheerful, Christian mother, and the father has lost a loving companion, but with faith and confidence he believes that Jesus will soon come and that we shall then meet her in that better land where sorrow will never come. With such a faith we need not sorrow as others who have no hope. Words of comfort were spoken by Elder Carter from Indiana; text, Heb. ii. 14, 15.

JESUS CHRIST THE SAME YESTERDAY, TODAY, AND FOREVER.

Nothing but Christ as on we tread,
The gift unpriced God's living bread!
With staff in hand and feet well shod,
Nothing but Christ, the Christ of God.

Everything less, for him below,
Taking the cross wherever we go;
Showing to all where once he trod,
Nothing but Christ, the Christ of God.

Nothing save him in all our ways,
Dining the theme for ceaseless praise;
Our whole resource along the road,
Nothing but Christ, the Christ of God.

Nothing but Christ for darkest hours,
In him can trust 'mid Satan's powers;
Though tempests rage, and troubles flood,
Nothing but Christ, the Christ of God.

Nothing but Christ for brightest morn,
As well anointed with Canaan's corn;
We then shall know in his abode,
Nothing but Christ, the Christ of God.

Today his Christ unchangeable,
Tomorrow Christ the blessed still;
Then lost in God our journey o'er,
Only his Christ for evermore.

JEWISH NOTES.

REMARKABLE DISCOVERY IN BURMAH.

One of the most remarkable tribal discoveries, in our eyes, of modern times has just been brought to light, and is referred to in the Jewish World at some length, under the title of "The Karens of Burma: their Jewish Traditions." There are two distinct divisions of Karens—the White Karens, also called the Sgaws, and the Red Karens, often designated Pye-ys. "The latter are a turbulent set, found principally outside the Burman frontier.

. . . The White Karens are of a totally different disposition. They are timid, quiet, and submissive, and have been oppressed alike by Talain, Shan, Siamese, and Burman. The Bhuddists designate them Pye-ys, or 'wild men,' on account of their ignorance and barbarism. They live in the very simplest style; a knife, axe, a bucket, a pot or two, and a portable little fireplace, constituting the sole and whole possessions of a White Karen family. They have no literature, no writings, and stranger still, no idols. They are extremely shy, and live in the wildest and most inaccessible parts."

The following quotations from the Jewish World will give our readers an idea of the importance attaching to this people and their traditions:—

"When first seen by European travellers forty or forty-five years ago, the Karens were described as savages and atheists. Subsequently it was found that this strange people, far from being irreligious and infidel, was possessed of a body of traditions so remarkably like those of the Jews as to challenge something more than mere comparison. Still more startling was the discovery made later on, when the British acquired Upper Burma and the language of the Border Tribes began to be studied, that the Karens actually designated their Deity by the same name as the ancient Hebrews, that is, 'Yu-vah.' In their own words, or rather in the words of their historic sacred songs, they boasted that 'the Sgaws have the word of Yu-vah.' And a further investigation led to the recovery of a great portion of these Karen traditions which, whatever view one may take as to their origin, are of the very utmost interest to Jewish readers. There is no question of more resemblance in the traditions we shall quote, for they appear to be actually identical. Nor is this all. The verbal analogies are so very marked, and the phraseology so clearly suggestive of Old Testament forms, that it seems impossible when the isolation of this strange tribe is taken into account, along with the fact that such legends are elsewhere known in Eastern Asia, to doubt that the Karen Sagas are derived from Jewish sources. So remarkable indeed is the resemblance in every respect, that it can hardly fail to strike even the most superficial reader. The traditions, it must be pointed out, have two forms, one in prose and the other in verse. The former is that used by the chiefs when addressing their brethren, and the latter is that chanted at funerals, and possibly on other solemn occasions.

"The first of their sacred traditions has reference to God and his existence. The Deity is termed 'Kutra' or 'Great Lord,' 'Pu' or 'Great Ancestor,' but his appellation is 'Yu-vah.' They predicate God's supremacy thus—'Oh my children and grandchildren! The earth is the treading-place of the feet of the Lord; heaven the place where he rests; he sees all things and we are manifest to him.' The poetic version runs as follows:—

'Yu-vah is unchangeably eternal,
He was in the beginning of the world:
Yu-vah is endless eternal,
He existed in the beginning of the world:
The life of Yu-vah is endless,
A succession of worlds does not measure his existence,
He dies not in succession on succession of worlds.'

Like the Jews, the Karens represent God's countenance as shining. 'His countenance shines like the rays of the sun, the wicked cannot look upon him, his glory lights the heavens.'

"Of the Creation they have the following account, and the peculiar phraseology as well as the repetitions which are so characteristic of the more elevated style of Hebraw composition should be noted throughout:—'God created heaven and earth; then the creation of heaven and earth was finished. He created the sun and the moon and the stars; then the creation of the sun, moon, and stars was finished. He created again, creating man; he created man first from the earth; then the creation of man was finished. He created a woman; he took a rib out of a man and created again; then the creation of woman was finished. He created again, creating life; he took of his life, and he breathed into the nostrils of the two persons, and they became living things; then the creation of men was finished. He created again, creating food and drink; he created rice and seed, fire and water; beasts, elephants, and birds; then the creation of animals was finished.'

"Of the Garden of Eden, man's temptation and fall, the tree of life, and the primeval curse, they have detailed traditions. The following is the injunction of the Creator when man was taken into Paradise:—'My son and daughter,' said Yu-vah, 'I make and give you a garden. In it are seven kinds of fruit. Among them, one is not good to eat. If you eat of it you will grow old and die. All in the world I give to you. Eat and drink with care. Once in seven days will I visit you.' The poetic version of the fall runs as follows:—

'In ancient times God created the world.
He appointed food and drink;
He appointed the Fruit of Trial;
He gave infinite commands;
But Satan deceived the two:
He caused them to eat the Fruit of the Tree
They obeyed not and believed not God;
They ate the Fruit of the Tree of Trial;
They became subject to Sickness, Age, and Death.'

"The actual temptation is thus described:—

'Satan appeared deceiving unto death,
The woman Eu and the man Tu-hai;
The dragon took the yellow fruit,
And gave to eat to the children of God:
They did not observe the words of God,
They were deceived unto wretchedness,
And God turned His back on them.'

"In this version the name of the woman Eu is to be noted for a sufficient reason. It proves that the tradition, as given, could not have been derived from any missionary, since both Roman Catholic and Protestant teachers gave the name in the form of Awa to that part of Eastern Asia. In the Tribal exhortations the fall is further related:—'Oh children and grandchildren! In the beginning God, to try man whether he would obey his command, created the tree of life and the tree of death. Concerning the tree of death, God said, eat not of it. Not believing, man ate of the tree, and God hid the tree of life. And because the tree of life has been hidden since, men have died.'

'Had they obeyed and believed God,
We had not been subject to Death.
Had they obeyed and believed God,
We had prospered in our doing.
Had they obeyed and believed God.'

"Concerning Satan, the Karens also believe that he was formerly an angel, but by disobedience 'fallen from his high' estate. They have several names for man's ancient adversary. They call him 'Kuplaw' the 'Deceiver,' and more curious still, 'Yau-kaw,' the 'Trodden-upon,' in allusion to their belief that hereafter man is destined to place his heel upon the arch-enemy's neck in token of victory over him.

"It is further worthy of note that the Karens believe that Satan will ultimately be destroyed. 'Oh my children! Oh my grandchildren! though we were to kill Satan, he would not die now; but when the time of our salvation comes, God will kill him.' A similar belief, with of course a symbolic application, is embodied in the well-known passage of the Hagada—'He shall slay the Angel of Death.'

"They have, moreover, a thoroughly Semitic objection to the hog and hog's flesh. They say that, formerly, when they were accustomed to slaughtering cattle, they had to slay their beasts so quickly that the creatures had not time to utter a single cry of pain. Like the Jews, they believe that they were formerly 'especially beloved by God,' but, by reason of their disobedience, they have lost their books, their nationality, and their King. Their traditions run as follows:—'Oh children! Oh grandchildren! Formerly God loved the Karen people above all others, but they transgressed his commands, and in consequence of this we suffer as at present. Because God cursed us, we are afflicted as now; we have no books or King. But he will save us yet again; God will again have mercy on us and love us above all others."

"The Karens were crushed by God,
They have no happiness now,
God gave them commands, but not a single one obeyed him:
The men of ancient times had perverse ears,
Therefore we have to suffer;
The men of ancient times had ears of hardness,
And we have thereby suffered.'

"Of the confusion of tongues recorded in the Babel legend of the Bible, and the subsequent dispersion of mankind, there is something more than a mere echo in the following adjuration:—'Oh my children! Oh my grandchildren! Man had at first but one father and one mother, but they did not love each other, and they became enemies; then their languages became different, and they hated each other and fought.'

'Men were all brethren,
Then had we the language of flint.
But they disbelieved God's word,
And became enemies to each other:
Because they disobeyed God,
Their language was divided:
God spoke to them in commands
But they disbelieved Him and were divided.'

"Like the Jewish belief in the Messiah, a temporal king and an ideally happy future condition of men is the teaching of the Karens in the following prose and poetic adjurations:—'Oh my children! Oh my grandchildren! The Karens will yet again dwell in the golden edifice. If we do well, God will put an end to all the other rulers. A Karen King will appear, and when he comes there will be happiness':—

'When the Karen King appears,
There will only be one ruler;
When the Karen King appears,
There will be neither rich nor poor;
When the Karen King arrives,
Even the beast will be happy;
When the Karens have their King,
Lion and leopard shall leave their savageness.'

"In some remote future period the Karens believe the Divinity will make himself manifest to man, and usher in a reign of peace and goodwill; and, descending upon earth, will judge mankind, punishing the wicked and rewarding the good:—

'At the appointed season Yu-vah will return,
And the dead trees will bloom again;
At the appointed year Yu-vah will return,
And moldering trees will blossom again.'

"Previous to this consummation there will be—as in the vision of the Jewish prophet Malachi—a time of tribulation and trouble:—

'God will come down with a trumpet,
He will descend with a sound of trumpet;
Blowing He will gather men like Butterflies,
He will gather them ill.
God will strike and the earth will quake,
And God will purify the earth.'

"As a sign of the times, 'the great mountain shall become as a plain,' and 'great hills shall be levelled;' and after that—

'Good persons, the good to God dwellings;
Righteous persons, the righteous to Heaven:
Unrighteous persons, the unrighteous
At death shall to Hell;
Wicked persons, the bad
Shall into the fire of extinction:
Wicked, the wicked
Shall fall into Lowest Hell.'

"Karens are cautioned against disregarding the time of God's judgment, and are warned to give heed to the teachings of those sent in advance to prepare them:—

'When the teacher comes to teach them,
If they believe not, they will be destroyed;
When the teacher comes and teaches you,
If you believe not, you will be utterly destroyed.'

"Those who are faithful and give ear to the admonitions of the elders will, in their naive phraseology, 'go to the New Town and the New City, and shall enjoy the golden palace.'

"The Karens have a very large number of injunctions bearing upon uprightness of life and morality of conduct. They are all strictly in accordance with Old Testament teachings, and bear the most extraordinary resemblance, in their phraseology, to that employed in the Old Testament Scriptures. There are commands referring to the love of God, prayer, idolatry, repentance, alms-giving, humility, love of our fellow creatures, humanity towards animals, the honoring of parents, false swearing, forbearance, love of one's enemies, and indifference to earthly things, differing in no essential respect from the teaching of the Bible. It would be difficult, in the compass of a brief article, to give any thing like a list of these, interesting though they would be for comparative purposes. We may, however, quote what they say as to the qualifications of a 'Disciple of Yu-vah:'

'Yu-vah created the Earth:
Who will be the Disciple of Yu-vah?
Yu-vah established the Earth.
Would'st thou become a Disciple of Yu-vah?
Then live apart from the ungodly,
For they live regardless of God.
And say Yu-vah is dead.'

"What strikes one even more than the resemblance of many of the Karen traditions to those of the ancient Jews is the phraseology, to which we have called attention in the course of these present papers. Such phrases as 'God descends with the trumpet,' 'God cannot look upon iniquity.' 'The heathen are ungodly,' 'God enlightens the heavens,' 'The earth is God's treading-place,' 'The earth will quake,' and so forth, which abound in the traditions of the Karens, are veritable Bible locutions, and are used as, what we may term, a Biblical sense. And, like the traditions themselves, scarcely leave it possible to doubt that they must have been derived from Jewish sources."

Regarding the origin of these traditions among so isolated and ignorant a people, the Jewish World says, it "seemes destined for all time to remain a mystery," because it says "it is impossible to believe in the 'remnant of the Ten Tribes theory;'" but way it does not condescend to say. To our mind that is the only solution of the problem. The Jewish World says very truly that "if such beliefs and legends had been found among a more civilized people, or tribes in more direct communication with strangers, the circumstance would have been striking enough. But the Karens are among the lowest of the savage races of the Burmese border-lands. There is no pretense of civilization about them, and no traces of similar traditions and beliefs have ever been discovered among the wild peoples by whom they are surrounded, and among whom they have always lived. A people so low in intelligence, so utterly barbarous, could never have originated such a series of traditions, even if it were possible (which it is not) to admit that the resemblances apparent are merely accidental." And again it says:—"To many . . . a very simple explanation will not unlikely present itself. Could not these fragments of archaic Semitic religious symbolism have been derived from some Portuguese Christian trading with the further Indies, or Christian missionary, many of whom no doubt visited Burmah? But one fact militates against such a theory. The Karens, when first discovered, know nothing of Christianity, nothing of Jesus of Nazareth, nothing of baptism or the crucifixion, nothing of the New Testament—its dogmas or teachings. And any Christian who had been at the trouble of teaching them so much of the Old Testament, as a knowledge of their traditions pre-supposes, would never have omitted to tell them something of the founder of Christianity and the great central dogmas of the Christian faith." —Messenger.

Selfishness, that exclusive regard to one's self, is one of the greatest curses to humanity. It withers, blights, destroys everything it touches. It dethrones true manhood, destroys all generous, noble feelings, closes the heart against those warm, Godlike impulses for doing good, chills all sympathy for suffering humanity, and shuts up the soul to the little world of poor, mean, adored self. Oh, for unselfishness, noble manhood in every professed disciple of Jesus! How it would bless the world! Let every one furnish a specimen.

EXPLANATION OF LABEL MARKS.

Some having complained that they do not know what the marks on labels mean, we will just say, "Jny" means January, and when it is followed by a figure "6" and reads "Jny6" it means your subscription expired the first day of January, 1886. "Feb" February, "Mar" March, "Apr" April, and "May" are well understood, but "Jun" meaning June seems to confuse some, and to be taken to mean January. "Jun" means June. "Jul" is July, "Aug" August, "Sep" September, "Oct" October, "Nov" November, and "Dec" December. The figure following the month stands for the year, "1" means 1881, "2" means 1882, etc. A postal card of inquiry will bring you any information you wish.

Any one sending us a new subscriber for 1887, and the subscription price of $2.00, may select books or tracts to the amount of 75 cents from our list, and they will be sent them free, post paid. Sample copies of THE RESTITUTION furnished on application.

THE COMING AGE,

—1887—

Nature and Proximity.

—By J. P. WESTREL.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of christian thinkers, and which is exciting to the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar currents, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the COMING AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, jealousy, piety, all are shown to be used by the great unfailing Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Living Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 350 large pages, bound in Cloth, Price $2.00. Send to this office for this work.

The Law, the Covenants, and the Sabbath.

—By I. C. THOMAS.—

This pamphlet of 96 pages.—The Law, the Covenants, and the Sabbath. Also an Epitome of the Great Salvation; and an Appendix including various other subjects, in brief.

The perfect unchangeable moral law is considered and shown to be the basis and spirit of the old Sinaitic law, now dead in its entirety. The law of Moses and law of Christ are compared and contrasted, and the relation of both to the old and new covenants is treated at some length. The Sabbath question is carefully and thoroughly examined, and presented and discussed in a somewhat new light.

The work also includes the consideration of Sunday, conditional immortality, the gospel, return of the Jews, the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, punishment of the wicked, the state of the dead, the new birth, the one faith, the one hope, the image of God, nature of Christ, the name, the religion, morality, Christianity, etc. This work contains 250 pages, Cloth bound, Price $1.00. Orders may be sent to THE RESTITUTION Office.

MILLENNIAL BLESSEDNESS.

The blessings that will be enjoyed in the Millennium will be great, and they are almost innumerable.

The city of Jerusalem, again rebuilt, shall never more be brought into ruin. "Look upon Zion, the city of our solemnities: thine eyes shall see Jerusalem a quiet habitation, a tent that shall not be removed, the stakes whereof shall never be plucked up, neither shall any of the cords thereof be broken." "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that the city shall be built to the Lord from the tower of Hananeel unto the gate of the corner. It shall not be plucked, up nor thrown down any more for ever." Isa. xxxiii. 20; Jer. xxxi. 38, 40. See also Jer. xxx. 18.

The land will be very productive and will yield abundance. "Is it not yet a very little while, and Lebanon shall be turned into a fruitful field, and the fruitful field shall be counted for a forest." Isa. xxix. 17. "Again shalt thou plant vineyards upon the mountains of Samaria: the planters shall plant, and shall enjoy the fruit thereof." Jer. xxxi. 5. "But ye, O mountains of Israel, ye shall shoot forth your branches, and yield your fruit to my people Israel; for they are at hand to come." "And I will call for the corn, and will multiply it, and lay no famine upon you." Eze. xxxvi. 8, 29. "And it shall come to pass in that day, I will answer, saith the Lord, I will answer the heavens, and they shall answer the earth; and the earth shall answer the corn, and the wine, and the oil." Hosea ii. 21, 22. "And it shall come to pass in that day, that the mountains shall drop down sweet wine, and the hills shall flow with milk, and all the brooks of Judah shall flow with waters; and a fountain shall come forth of the house of the Lord, and shall water the valley of Shittim." Joel iii. 18. "The vine shall give her fruit, and the ground shall give her increase, and the heavens shall give their dew; and I will cause the remnant of this people to inherit all these things." Zech. viii. 12. On account of the sin of Adam, God brought upon the ground a curse, which curse will be removed at the restoration. What that curse was may be seen from Gen. iii. 17, 18, and that it will not exist in the Millennium, the above passages abundantly prove. Then it will be truly said, "For the Lord hath comforted Zion: He hath comforted all her waste places, and hath made her wilderness like Eden, and her desert like the garden of the Lord." Isa. li. 3.

The inhabitants of the land will wonderfully increase in number. "For, as for thy waste and thy desolate places, and thy land that hath been destroyed, surely now shalt thou be too strait for the inhabitants, and they that swallowed thee up shall be far away. The children of thy bereavement shall yet say in our ears, The place is too strait for me: give place to me that I may dwell." Isa. xlix. 19 20. "And I will multiply them, and they shall not be small." Jer. xxx. 19.

In view of the increase of the people, it is predicted: "Thou hast increased the nation, O Lord, thou hast increased the nation: thou art glorified: thou hast enlarged all the borders of the land." Isa. xxvi. 15.

The wild beasts will be tamed, and neither men nor children will be in fear of being devoured by them. "And the wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together, and a little child shall lead them.... And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the basilisk's den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain." Isa. xi. 6, 8, 9. Regarding the change of nature in animals, some regard the language of Scripture on this subject as figurative; but the language is not figurative. We see nothing attributed to them but what would have been natural before the fall, and therefore, nothing but what may be natural to them in the restoration. Will not the redemption and the restoration be as far-reaching as the curse? When we read of the hills breaking forth into singing, and the trees of the field clapping their hands, we do not need to be told that that is figurative language; but when we read of evil and ferocious beasts becoming gentle and harmless, in connection with the restoration of all things, we see no figure, because that must have been their natural state before the curse fell upon creation through man's sin. Let us not limit the power and wisdom and goodness of God by putting a figurative sense upon language which is evidently to be understood in its plain and grammatical sense. On this point it may no well to ponder the views of several great scholars. Luther says, "It is important for us to recur to Adam's original condition, as we expect all things to be brought back again to that." In his comment on Isa. xi. 6, 8, Calvin says, "He asserts here the change of the nature of wild beasts, and the restitution of the creation as at first." Graff says, "Even the natural ferocity of the brute creation will be subdued into gentleness during that age of abounding plenty and restrained evil." In his description of the new heavens and new earth, Dr. Nagelsbach says, "There will be a renovation even of the animal world. It will be in harmony with the spirit of peace and love, which will prevail in the entire new creation." It would be easy to multiply similar statements, for men who are governed in their exegesis by the laws of language, are compelled to give such an interpretation.

HAPPY IN DEATH.—No. 4.

"The way of every man is determined by the end of every man."—Cecil.

This discussion could hardly be reckoned complete without some reference to the dying experience of Christ, our Savior and Lord. He stands in a position far, very far indeed, above the level of ordinary saints, yet be lived by faith like all the rest of them, and what promises are made to the entire band, he appropriated to himself in the season of toil, of suffering, and of temptation, as in the wilderness, while life lasted and when it reached its concluding stage. He lived in the consciousness of his Father's approval, which was occasionally manifested in a signal, nay, marvellous fashion, as at his baptism, when a voice from heaven was heard saying,—"This is My beloved Son in whom I am well pleased." He lived a perfect life, and in his sublime prayer, shortly before the torture of the thorns and the nails, he used this language;—"I glorified Thee on the earth, having accomplished the work which Thou hast given Me to do," John xvii. R. V. Having so fulfilled all righteousness—having resigned himself to contempt and slander and a barbarous execution, in order to redeem the world, we would naturally conjecture that uniform rest within, if not something higher, would mark his parting hour. Many in love for him as their infinite Benefactor have undergone torments of the flesh equal to his, if not even more dreadful in continuance and intensity, and bore them with a tranquil spirit; on some occasions being exultantly elated by the honor assigned them, because they were privileged to suffer in his cause. But in our Lord's case mental calm and sweet repose under the canopy of his Father's love had at least one mysterious break, though of short duration. Very near his end there was obviously a loss of the serene comfort up till then enjoyed—a hiding, so to speak, of his Father's countenance—a gathering of gloom in his soul, resembling the miraculous obscuration in which Calvary and the whole district were enfolded, adding strange heart-suffering to the bodily anguish devouring his strength and vitality. In Mark's account of the crucifixion this statement is found,—"At the ninth hour Jesus cried with a loud voice, saying, 'Eloi, Eloi lama sabachthani?' which is, being interpreted, My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" Chapter xv. 34. Almost immediately thereafter he cried again with a loud voice, and then all was over, in this way, "He said, Father into Thy hands I commend My spirit: and having said thus, he gave up the ghost," that is, expired, Luke xxiii. 46.

When no light is thrown by inspiration on this singular and affecting incident, it would ill become any one to speak positively regarding its cause and import. While meditating upon it every pious mind cannot but feel deeply solemnized—lost in reverential wonder, and moved with gratitude towards the sufferer, beyond the energy of words to disclose. Though this is not a fitting season to discuss the matter at length, so as peradventure to reach an understanding of the unusual experience, we shall in a few lines suggest what, after much reflection on its bewildering features, appears to be a not improbable account of the Savior's grievous trial, at the very time when he was rendering the highest conceivable homage to his Father's will.

Well then, let these things be seriously weighed. He who hung on the cross was about to die—to part with his human life—in the room of men, as a sacrifice for their guilt. In a little while, apparently but a few moments, after the doleful "Eloi" cry, that offering was consummated when he bowed his head and gave up the ghost. Death was the price of human redemption, and because he loved us all he paid it cheerfully, in accordance with the eternal ordination that assigned him the propitiatory function, and determined its stupendous God-revealing and God-glorifying issues. Now it seems to us that he had not merely to undergo death, but that he should first, as the sacrificial hour approached, realize the instinctive recoil from death which every human being feels at its nearness. In a word, the penalty and the anticipative emotion or natural revulsion he must bear in accomplishing our deliverance, for to both, as transgressors, we had rendered ourselves exposed. In the garden the anticipation of death, heightened by agonies of the cross, which he foresaw, as well as the act of dissolution itself, pressed with terrible weight on his sensitive and wearied organism impelling him to exclaim,—"Oh My Father, if it be possible let this cup pass from Me: nevertheless not as I will, but as Thou will," Matt. xxvi. 39. Out of that mental agony—that quivering between the imperious claims of accepted duty, and the storm of woe about to be encountered in its execution—angelic ministrations enabled him to rise great in strength, resolved to meet his awful doom with appropriate meekness and unshrinking fortitude.

Having thus in Gethsemane been agonized by the prospective view of death and the tortures that would produce it, on the cross and on the very brink of dissolution, the plaintive wail betokened the pressure of another peculiar form of suffering, which we venture to think had to be endured by him a victim bearing our sins in his own body on the tree. This was for our benefit, though not exclusively so.

At this stage in the development of our ideas, it should be borne in mind that the standing promise in Holy Scripture to each of the saints is,—"I will never forsake thee;" or, as the Psalmist puts it,—"The Lord forsaketh not his saints," Heb. xiii; Psa. xxxvii. Now our Lord being one of them—in truth, the Prince of saints, had this pledge for his support in the day of trial as certainly as any of the band. He, like the rest of them, had to live, and fight, and conquer by faith, as is practically illustrated in his conflict with the arch-enemy in the desert. And yet eternal as the promise is, amazed we hear him on the cross piteously inquiring,—"My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken Me?" Had the reiterated and blissful assurance failed? When all, or nearly all, human friendship and sympathy had been withdrawn, had his Father forgotten to be gracious to him in the climax of his desolation and misery? No; to God's glory, no! As he is dying for men, he must not merely endure the agonising anticipation of death before he is nailed to the accursed beams, but he must have a taste of the terrible consciousness of one who when dying is aware that God has forsaken him: for such each guilty individual would have known experimentally had no Savior appeared to reconcile him to God, and make him an heir of immortal being. In that case the guilty had but to die, having as their portion the correlated bitterness of the doom assigned them in the act of dissolution as well as before it came. The wages of sin is death—death with its lurid anticipations,—death with the sense of God's abiding displeasure,—death with its "dust to dust,"—death with its silence never to be broken,—death with its ruin never to be repaired. In love for man the transgressor, the Son of God incarnate volunteered to die, not in the blissful sense of the Divine presence and smile, but with the feeling of those transcendent consolations withdrawn for a time. That time though brief, was long enough to acquaint him with suffering he had never previously felt, and will never feel again. Death speedily relieved his agitated soul, and though he may have bowed his head without a gleam to cheer his last moments, on the third day he was recalled to the sunshine streaming from his Father's countenance, and the oil of gladness was anew poured on his being, now gloriously transformed. He became obedient to death, even the death of the cross, wherefore God highly exalted him and conferred on him a name above every name.

It can hardly be necessary to remark that however the Beloved One felt, there could be no actual forsaking, though he cries out in his perplexity as if such had assuredly happened. By some process in his mind, or influences exerted upon it, he was left to feel, or was made to feel, as if he were so inexplicably treated. Direct access to the inmost part of our nature, cannot in reason be denied to the Creator. Sometimes he may inspire their ideas beyond finite penetration to discover, —sometimes he may infuse joy,—sometimes ordain clouds and thick darkness to envelope all, as it seems to him necessary in the accomplishment of his designs, which are very worthy of his measureless wisdom and love. There could be no real abandonment of the sufferer,—no true coming short in the promises, for, if at his baptism the voice from heaven testified,—"This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased," his life ever since and his submission to death now, but signally illustrated and confirmed the Divine commendation then bestowed upon him. He never was so dear to his Father's heart as when in the gloom; never so approved as when the "Eloi" plaint rose from his fevered lips.

And yet when just about to die, he was in sore distress, and for aught we know he expired bewildered—expired under the dreadful sense of being forsaken, that had settled on his mind. But if there was no ray of sunshine—no influx of happiness however narrow the stream, his faith was victorious in the midst of the overwhelming trial. His cry begins, "My God, My God!" Though no expression of friendly sympathy from on high cheered him in the end, God was still recognized by him as his God, and his trust in whom was unshaken during the bleakest moment. In the act of dying this was his confiding utterance:—"Father"—the relationship between them had never for an instant been interrupted —"Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit; and having said thus, he gave up the ghost."

Whether the explanation we have ventured to propose is the true one, or not, or even an approach to it, we would shrink from affirming dogmatically. Perhaps it is not unworthy of consideration by those who may peruse these paragraphs, and if the author is wide of the mark he hopes fervently that others may be more successful in hitting the truth, If such an achievement is at present possible by a mere exercise of human penetration. This fact at least towers high before our vision, that the death of Jesus Christ was at a long remove from being a happy one. The forlorn appeal sets that for ever beyond question. The grandest and holiest Being the sun ever beheld on this planet—One whose heart was an exhaustless fountain of pity—Who cheerfully offered up his life to rescue the condemned—He just at the winding up of his mingled woes had a cry of wail enough to melt the hardest heart near the cross, as it has agitated and drawn tears from a vast multitude of grateful souls in all succeeding ages while its echo sounded from the gospel page, as the murmur of ocean seems to linger in the shell.

And though he in the manner described—with inward darknings of sorrow—reached the tragic end of his long pain, was he not like Noah in the ark, absolutely safe as he went through the gloom and the tempest? It would have been infinitely more pleasant to have had the hour when life was setting illumined with God's smile—cheered with tender whisperings of sympathy—soothed and animated by seraphic strains from quivering voices, anticipating the symphonies in heaven of those who would be ransomed by his blood; but in the purposes of the Supreme, whose counsels arranged all events in history from the cradle to the tomb, a ray of supernal comfort was not included. As in the garden, so here when night was darkest we may nevertheless be unerringly certain that in the movements of his sublime piety he would hold by the same mind,—"Not My will but Thine be done!"

Yet enthusiasts and those who pay homage to fables may extol what are styled happy and triumphant deathbeds in loud-sounding phrases, but there is a safer and more Scriptural course. The prime question is not what feelings have the dying, but what is their faith, and what has been the quality of their consecration? When my esteemed friend, Mr. James Lesslie, whose home was near Toronto, reached the close of his extended and piously useful life, he appears to have finished his career very much like one of the worthies in Old Testament eras. His final assurance to his family was: —"I am resting on the rock, Christ Jesus." In other words, Christ, the Life-Giver, was all his hope; and with that as his parting word, he entered into the darkness awaiting the whole of us. He died in faith. "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord!" Our latest experiences may be very tranquil,—our drooping energies may be sustained with exulting conceptions of how grand it will be to awake from slumber in the dust, and behold all-glorious the Divine Redeemer who for our benefit endured the cross with its shame and awful eclipse; or perchance disease may render our thoughts confused, and shade all within and above with a depressing gloom, making us even long for the change that brings rest to the weary; but be our feelings what they may when the end approaches, we are, like our Lord, safe in his loving care, and may rest assured that the promise cannot fail. So may it be with him who, not heedless of his responsibility, delivers to the public these humble pages; and so may it be with those who may read them. Is it too much to ask that the perusal of them may be in a charitable, a patient, and a truth-loving spirit?

W. G. MONCRIEFF.

The Term Christian a Divinely Revealed Name for True Believers. Seeks the Result of Assuming or Accepting and Glorying in Apostate Names.

"WHAT'S IN A NAME?"

It all depends upon the value represented by the name, and the value depends upon the utility which the name represents. Exulting and glorying in a sectarian name, granting that the name embodies a truth, is in principle assuming that a part is greater or at least more important than the whole. When I speak of the currency of the United States I include the very meanest denomination of it known as a silver dollar. Now suppose I hold this silver dollar before my eye and say this dollar constitutes the United States currency because it is all I can see of it, what would be thought of my wisdom or sanity? But for my life I cannot see any difference between this sort of folly and the folly of him who glories in being an Episcopalian or Presbyterian or Methodist or Catholic Christian rather than a Christian per se. Moreover it is the sectarian works or errors as a rule that become emphasized and exalted rather than the simon pure Christianity, and of all prejudice and bigotry there is none so unscriptural and heartless as the prejudgement of error. It is inevitably selfish and blind, wanting the first principles of true Christian character, namely humility, love of the truth and a hunger and thirst after righteousness. It is also the result of their joint labor, "And it occurred to them (Paul and Barnabas) even for a whole year long, to be gathered together in the church and to teach a considerable multitude, and by revelation to name the disciples Christians first in Antioch." Luke's use of this word χρηματίζω in the passage above quoted from his gospel in regard to "Old Symeon" as well as the common use elsewhere in the Scriptures, and in the heathen classics in this sense, not only warrants this interpretation, but in a matter as important as the naming of the Christ's body excludes any other.

Especially does it exclude the interpretation in "The Old" and "Revised" drawn from a doubtful use attributed to Polybius and others of a later and corrupt period in the history of Greek literature, which requires an aorist active infinitive, the form occurring here, to be used in a passive or middle sense. It is too much like their translating κατα συγκυριαν in Luke x. 31, "by chance" instead of "by conjunction" or by "a conjunction of events" and so contradicting the plain Scriptural teaching of God's particular providence, and encouraging the heathen idea of "a doctrine of chances."

To sum up my argument, there is everything in a name or nothing, according to the character of the person or persons bearing it, especially if the name is characteristically significant as Scriptural names are universally intended to be. Secondly, that the name Christian is peculiarly so, and that this significance and its vital importance has been lost sight of in the exaltation of other names as applied to Christ's followers which are, if true at all in their significance when tried by the standard of God's word, only so in a minor degree, the natural result of this apostasy being to engender and promote schism and reprehensible strife, as though a hand or a foot or an eye should arrogate to itself the name and office of the whole body. The whole being the sum of all the parts, a part assuredly cannot be the whole. Therefore the assumption of any such name is the height of folly and presumption. Thirdly, the proof given that we have "a thus saith the Lord" for the name "Christian" as the only appropriate one to be applied to the followers or "body" of Christ; and that the mistranslation and false interpretation of the inspired record is primarily responsible for the beginning and perpetuity of sectarianism.

Finally, in view of all the wrongs and follies of sectarianism which the history of the Christian church has so indelibly recorded on the pages of the ages, behold the wisdom and simplicity of revelation and the folly of apostasy or departure from it.

CHAS. GARDNER.

P. S. More proof can be deduced, many more, if necessary. For instance, in the passage in Rom. xi. 4, translated in the R. V., "But what saith the answer of God to him?" χρηματισμος is the word in the text translated by the four English words italicised. This passage did not occur to me until after I had closed the article. C. G.

Confucius' Home Destroyed.

A recent conflagration in a remote Chinese village destroyed the ancestral home of the family of Confucius with all its contents; texts on stone commentaries; wondrous carvings in jade and alabaster; priceless jars of porcelain; jewels and precious metal work; in brief one of the most remarkable literary and artistic museums in the world, containing as it did nearly every extant memorial of the great teacher. In that building, erected about 600 B. C., generation after generation, the male heirs of the Chinese philosopher have dwelt in unbroken line for 2,500 years, bearing the title of duke. With every other family in China, a nobleman's rank must always be lower than that of his ancestors; for no true Confucian would presume to stand higher than his grandfather, father, or his elder brother. In the illustrious "House of Confucius," however, the lofty title of Duke passes unchanged, except when Emperor after Emperor adds by Royal decree some new phase of honor to the name and line of the famous philosopher.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Mar. 9, 1887.

IMPORTANT NOTICES.

All persons addressing us should give their Name, Post Office, County, and State plainly and distinctly.

All letters should be addressed to "The Restitution," Plymouth, Marshall Co., Ind.

Remittances should be sent by Bank Draft, Post Office Money Order, Express Money Order, or Registered Letter. Money sent in either of the above ways is at our risk: money loose in letters is at the risk of the sender.

All remittances should be made payable to the order of "The Restitution."

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the return of manuscripts. Authors should preserve a copy for themselves.

In ordering books or tracts get the latest copy of the paper you have, and order only what you see advertised in that.

When desiring your address changed, give both your old and new address.

By complying strictly with the above, you will save us much annoyance, and your orders will be much more promptly attended to.

EDITORIAL BREVITIES.

As the time approaches for the restoration of Judah and Israel to the "Land of Promise," everything pertaining to the scattered tribes has an interest to the prophetical student. Even the smaller incidents connected with the history of the chosen people, in their exile, has a significance. While we now are at the evening of Gentile times, we are, at the same time, only at the dawning of the day that is to bring life and glory to Israel. While something is being done by some of Abraham's descendants in their own land, they are beginning to secure confidence and respect in other lands, as the following items will show, which we clip from the Occident, a Jewish paper:

"The eminent Rabbi, the Rev. S. Mohilleger, Chief Rabbi of Bialystok, is on a visit to London, with the object of stimulating extended interest in the Jewish Colonies of Palestine.

According to custom the Jewish ladies in the City of Morocco paid a visit to the Harem on the occasion of a Moorish feast, and gave a number of presents to the inmates. The visitors were very much pleased at the reception they met with on the part of the Sultan's household, having received a message from its head to the effect that the well-being of his Jewish subjects was his Majesty's constant care.

The Alliance Israelite Universelle through its network of schools is not only benefiting the Jews, but also the followers of other religions. In the port of Haifa for example, the School of the Alliance is attended by 95 pupils, of whom 10 are non-Jews."

EARTHQUAKES IN DIVERS PLACES.

In connection with other signs and events that are predicted by our Lord to precede his advent, he mentions earthquakes, and these have become frequent and destructive within the few past years. Since our last issue shocks of earthquake have occurred in Southern Europe in France and Italy that have been attended with much loss of life and property. Hundreds of persons have been killed and injured in different towns, and the liability to a repetition of the disastrous shocks keeps the people in a constant state of alarm. Coincident with these shocks of earthquake in Europe some lighter disturbances have been experienced in the United States. Let us carefully and prayerfully heed the signs of the times, and watch constantly for our Lord's return.

THE OPPRESSION IN EGYPT.

We might naturally expect that some mention would be made in Egyptian records of such a people as the Hebrews, especially as they remained several centuries in the country; and many eminent scholars think that there is such mention make of them under the name of "Aperu," which is a title given, in some of the ancient hieroglyphs, to a race of foreigners who are described as having been employed in the public works. M. Chabas says, "that well-constituted rules of philology permit us to identify the name of the Hebrews (Aberu) with this ethnic denomination Aperu, a p being substituted for a b;" and it is placed beyond a doubt, by the inscriptions, that Rameses the Great employed foreigners in building his city Pa-Rameses (Rameses), which exactly accords with one of the works ascribed to the Hebrews in the book of Exodus: —"They built for Pharaoh treasure cities, Pithom and Rameses." Ex. i. 11. It has indeed been objected that there is mention in Egyptian records of the Aperu as existing in Egypt in the days of Rameses III. and Rameses IV., who reigned subsequent to the exodus: but it is quite possible that some remnant of the Hebrews may have remained in the land at the time they have been carried captive into it from Palestine at a later date.

But whether the "Aperu" and the "Hebrew" are identical or not, there can be no doubt that a foreign race were subjected about this period to such enforced and severe labor in Egypt as the Israelites are represented in the Bible as having endured in that land. The monuments of the Egyptian kings bear witness to the fact. Allusion is made to a ferment which existed in the heart of the land, and evil-disposed subjects are spoken of. Probably this refers to the Jewish people, who were groaning under their bondage, and doubtless endeavoring to resist it. We know from Egyptian records that many of their wars were undertaken for the express purpose of capturing slaves, who were afterwards condemned to perpetual toil in the erection of those public buildings, which still attest the ambition of those sovereigns, and their indifference to human suffering. As some one has well observed, "Every stone they laid cost a life." One of the most interesting tombs at Thebes is that of Rosohero, who is described as "Superintendent of the great buildings." On its walls is depicted an accurate representation of such a bondage as is described by Moses, and in all probability is an actual picture of the children of Israel at their labors. The color and physiognomy of the workmen mark them out as foreigners, and the features seem to be Semitic. They are engaged in making brick; their bodies are splashed with the clay, and their service is evidently enforced with rigor. In one part of the picture sits the Egyptian task-master, with his rod, and in another are two functionaries who are being beaten by their superior, and compelled to perform the task which they allowed the bondsman to intermit. It recalls at once the graphic language of the Bible:—"The officers of the children of Israel, which Pharaoh's task-masters had set over them, were beaten, and demanded, Wherefore have ye not fulfilled your task in making brick, both yesterday and to-day, as heretofore?" Ex. v. 14.

As the Egyptians usually dried their bricks in the sun, instead of baking them in a furnace, they employed straw and mixed it with the clay, in order to give them consistency; and this rendered the edict of Pharaoh the more galling and oppressive:—"Ye shall no more give the people straw to make brick, as heretofore: let them go and get straw for themselves. And the tale of the bricks, which they did make heretofore, ye shall lay upon them; ye shall not diminish ought thereof." Ex. v. 7, 8.

Many of the bricks which have been brought to England from Egypt, some of which may be seen in the British Museum, are stamped with the cartouches of the Pharaoh's, and are mixed with straw. In some of them the quantity of straw is very small, indicating, perhaps, the difficulty of obtaining it. In a papyrus of the nineteenth dynasty (the very one in which the events of Exodus occurred), the writer uses an expression which seems to have become proverbial—"I have no one to help me in making bricks, no straw."

We read, that in consequence of the harsh edict, "The people were scattered abroad throughout all the land of Egypt to gather stubble instead of straw" (verse 12). Some think that the word translated "stubble" should be rendered "reeds;" but in either case we can understand how the Israelites were obliged to go and gather a substitute for the straw which was denied them, and how they had afterwards to chop this up, in order to mix it with the clay. In this way the time for their allotted tasks was seriously interfered with, and hence the natural remonstrances of the officers of the children of Israel, when they "came and cried unto Pharaoh, saying, Wherefore deal est thou thus with thy servants? There is no straw given unto thy servants, and they say unto us, Make brick: and behold, thy servants are beaten; but the fault is in thine own people" (v. 15, 16). Is it not a remarkable corroboration of this complaint that we have a record in another papyrus (Anast. III.) concerning twelve laborers, employed in this very district, who were punished for their failure in making up their daily tale of bricks? On the walls of a sepulchral chamber at Thebes where the labor of brick-making is depicted, the overseer is represented as saying to the workmen, "The stick is in my hand, be not idle." Does not this vividly recall the answer of Pharaoh to the remonstrancers of the officers of the children of Israel, and is it not the very echo of his words, "Ye are idle, ye are idle." Exodus v. 7.

We read in the Bible narrative that "they did not over them task-masters to afflict them with their burdens. And they built for Pharaoh treasure cities, Pithom and Rameses." Ex. i. 11. We have abundant evidence from the monuments of the existance of these two cities. They are mentioned in papyri of the time of Rameses the Great; but Rameses (or Pa-Rameses) is more frequently mentioned than Pithom (or Pa-tum). The juxtaposition of these cities was not fortuitous. Pa-Rameses seems to have been dedicated to Ra, the rising sun, and Pa-tum to the setting sun, and probably derived their names originally from this circumstance. Each of them was a frontier city, in or close to the land of Goshen. We have very direct evidence that one (at least) of these cities had a close connection with Rameses the Great. M. Neville has translated a large lapidary inscription which is found in the rock-cut temple of Abou Simbel. It consists of thirty-seven lines of hieroglyphics, and is in the form of an address from the god Ptah to King Rameses, together with his reply. In one passage the god speaks thus: "Thou hast constructed a magificent residence city to fortify the frontiers of the land, even the city of Ramases. It is solid upon the earth like to the four pillars of the firmament."

This seems to set at rest any doubt that may have existed as to the identity of this Pharaoh with the great oppressor of the children of Israel, from whom Moses fled when he slew the Egyptian. But the evidence does not end here. We have a report written by an officer of the commissariat at Pa-Ramesses, in which he states that he has fulfilled his duty by distributing corn to the soldiers and to the Aperu, who are employed in drawing stones for the great Bekken (i. e., fortified enclosure) of Pa-Ramesses. The remarkable thing in this report is that it speaks of the labors of these Aperu as being carried on at the very place where the account in Exodus represents the Hebrews as having been employed in building a city for Pharaoh. The same officer makes mention, in another report, of large supplies of fish having been provided for the workmen; this throws light upon and adds emphasis to the account of the murmurings of the children of Israel in the wilderness, recorded in Numbers xi. 4, 5—"The mixed multitude that was among them fell a lusting: and the children of Israel wept again, and said, Who shall give us flesh to eat? We remember the fish which we did eat in Egypt freely," etc., etc. Another document has been discovered, in which a Scribe named Resiamen reports to some officers of high rank in the royal household, that directions had been given with respect to the provisions which were required for the garrison, and also for the Aperu, who drew stones for the king. Surely these are undoubted echoes to the Bible history.

If less is recorded in the Egyptian records concerning the city of Pithom, or Pa-tum, than concerning its twin city, Rameses, the omission is more than compensated for by the recent discovery of the city itself. At a place called Tel-el-Maskoutah, near Tel-el-Kebir, the scene of Lord Wolseley's battle in 1882, the remains of an ancient city have been discovered. It is a square, enclosing about ten acres and measuring 660 feet upon each side. It is enclosed by a wall of brick twenty-two feet in thickness, and the whole space is divided into square chambers separated from each other by strong brick walls, but without door or window of any kind. There are in the walls recesses for beams, and some of the decayed wood still remains in them, plainly showing that the chambers were two-storied, and that the whole was intended as a granary, "or store city," which is the meaning of the Bible expression "treasure city." The inscriptions leave no doubt that the city was Pa-tum (or Pithom), and Lepsius informs us that some of the bricks bear on them the royal cartouche of Rameses II. Thus we have disinterred, after the lapse of so many ages, one of the two cities built for Pharaoh by the children of Israel. The remains of the other city, Rameses, have not been discovered, but it may not be long before spade and pickaxe may bring it also to light. It is remarkable that nearly the whole of Pithom is built of brick, and that these bricks are laid with mortar in regular tiers, thus exactly corresponding with the words of Exodus i. 14,—"They made their lives bitter with hard bondage in mortar and in brick." The bricks in the newly-discovered city contain, for the most part, a certain amount of straw, but in some instances are destitute of it; and this would exactly tally with the Bible record, which tells us of the unreasonable edict already referred to, which forced them to use "stubble instead of straw," and sometimes, as it now appears, to dispense altogether with any substitute for it.—Bishop of Ossory, Evans, and Loughlin, in Christian Lands.

THE OUTLOOK.

The coming war in Europe appears to be regarded as inevitable by the trans-Atlantic correspondents of American journals. The correspondent of the New York Times, whose observations and predictions have hitherto proved remarkably accurate, expresses his conviction on the subject without ambiguity. He says, after mentioning a number of isolated facts: "So, looking over the continent and seeing the bustle of martial preparations among the little as well as the big, everybody getting hastily ready to fight and nobody knows how a fight is to be prevented. All are agreed that if a single spark is struck the whole heavens will be ablaze from Armenia to Finland. Looking from the vantage ground of an insular standpoint, it is impossible to profess much hope that peace will be maintained." In France there was manifested last week a disposition to hope that Bismarck's attitude was merely assumed to scare the electors into electing Government candidates, but in Alsace, where the German is understood better, there is no such error. There every household is hurried with preparations for war; houses in Metz, Colmar, and Pfalsbourg being crowded to the attic with provisions, while business is said to be practically suspended. What the spark may be that will fire the combustible mass cannot be pointed out, but it may be a small one, and it is not without significance that such a spark is described in the intimation given by Russia last week, that she has determined under certain probable circumstances to occupy Bulgaria.—Christian Herald.

FRANCE'S INVISIBLE RESOURCES.

England may be depended upon to exercise her best offices for the prevention of a European war, and so may Germany and Austria-Hungary. They could scarcely, in any event, hope to profit by it. France and Russia are the only Powers which could hope to make gain, by disturbing the present peace, unless Greece and Bulgaria, by some happy cast of fortune, should have their boundaries somewhat enlarged when war ended. What Power, in case of Russian defeat, would take any portion of her territory, and with it the certainty of another war for its recovery, so soon as a few years should remedy her exhaustion? And what further provinces could France lose without hopelessly disturbing the European equilibrium? "The Balance of Power" is the political gospel that has controlled European statesman and diplomatists for 400 years, and they are by no means ready to renounce it. France, further despoiled, is France no longer, and France blotted out as a great Power, how shall the scales be readjusted and who shall do it? It may safely be said that it is not written in the books of the Fates that France, with such a marvellous history behind her, is to disappear from among the great nations of the earth, unless amid convulsions that determine the doom of some of her sister Powers.

France doubtless wants war and can assign a motive for it; not an adequate one, but still a powerful one. The memories of Waterloo and Sedan rankle in her heart, and she longs to restore to her arms the glory of Marengo and Austerlitz; but the loss of Alsace-Lorraine causes deeper pain and humiliation than the defeats that sent two Emperors into exile never to return. Does any one suppose the score is settled with Germany? If any one does, it is neither Bismarck nor Von Moltke. They know that the trial at arms must come again, and they evidently dread it not from lack of courage, but the Emperor is old and so are they, and they have had enough of war. And then who can foretell the end, once the trumpet sounds and the flags are unfurled?

The resources of France are mighty and not limited to so many corps d'Armee and battalions of artillery. She has more forces at her command that Europe dreads. She holds the revolutionary forces of the Continent under her hand. Since the revolution of 1789 and the following years, which sent Louis XVI to the guillotine, abolished the nobility and feudalism, and kindled a fire in Europe which required rivers of blood to quench, all the crowned heads have shivered at the thought of the revolutionary forces again awaking and going forth upon their work of destruction. In 1830 it drove Charles the X from his throne in a day, and placed Louis Philippe in the Palais Royale. It sent a shock through Europe from London to Rome and from Lisbon to St. Petersburg. Kings trembled, Prime Ministers were bewildered, diplomatists panic-stricken. Poland and Italy thrown into armed revolt, and armies mobilized at almost every Capital of Europe. And yet not a French soldier had been ordered to the Rhine nor a squadron to the Simplon Pass. It was the revival of that force that made France invincible nearly a hundred years ago and that found so ready a response in the breasts of the thousands scattered through every portion of the Continent.

Does any one suppose that that force has grown any less during the century, or has become less responsive in its sympathies? It has founded a Republic in France, and the same revolutionary force that has founded it will not hesitate, in order to preserve it, to appeal to its presence everywhere, in case of war, and call for the entranchisement of the nations. France, a Republic, at war with Germany, would be quite a different thing from France, an Empire, at war with Germany. She would have the moral support of the enemies of all hereditary governments.

With France, it is Alsace-Lorraine, or war some time. If ready, it will come now; if not, it will be postponed unless Germany brings it on, or is precipitated by general European complications. It would seem to be her wiser policy to adjourn the struggles till the death of William, the present Emperor, and till Bismarck and Von Moltke are no more. It looks, however, as if Boulanger thinks differently, and as if the decision of France is in his keeping.

But will Germany anticipate the blow that is preparing, and compel its deliverance now? This is not impossible. She is not rich, her armaments are vast and expensive, and she cannot afford to continually front the contingencies of French attack. But before she takes the initiative, she must be sure of Russia. Russian diplomacy is ever looking toward the Golden Horn, and Russian armies are ever pointing in the same direction. Russian and Austrian interests are in hopeless contradiction, until a confederation of the Balkan States, including Servia and Montenegro and Roumania, shall interpose a competent buffer to Russian aggressions southward. German sympathies and interests are with Austria. What both Germany and Austria dread is a Franco-Russian alliance, which will bring the hour for France to move her columns toward the Rhine and Russia hers toward the Bosphorus. Is the alliance formed? Not openly. Has it been secretly? Who can tell? —The Voice.

READ OUR NEW BOOK ADVERTISEMENTS!

The Emphatic Diaglott reduced to $2 50. This book has been a "Standard" with our readers so long that it needs no commendation. We simply offer it to you for $2 50. Can you afford to do without a copy?

Dr. Wm. Smith's Dictionary of the Bible. As a reference book, to aid the student in his study of God's word, this work is second only to the marginal references in your Bible. Take up your Bible and turn to Hob. x. You come at once to the subject of Sacrifice, and your marginal reference takes you to the book of Leviticus. You resolve to hunt up the subject of Sacrifices, and after many hours of study succeed in gaining a fair idea of the subject. With Smith's Bible Dictionary in your hands you would have found it all in as many minutes, with the different sacrifices of different periods grouped under their proper heads, much more comprehensive and clear than you could make it. And so with thousands of other subjects. No student can afford to waste time by doing without every "help" he can get, and the price put on this book makes it easy for all to have a copy. Shall we send you one? See advertisement elsewhere.

Do you want tracts to distribute? Read the list under our Pound Package offer. For only Sixty Cents you can get reading matter enough to set several hundred people studying. You can now the seed—God will give the increase. If you cannot send the money, secure a new subscriber for THE RESTITUTION, and you may order 1½ pounds of these tracts for every new name you send for a year.

We are ready to receive orders for Bro. J. P. Weethee's new book—The Eastern Question in its various phases, which is about ready for delivery. The price of this work will be $3.50, or we will send the two—Coming Age, and Eastern Question—for $6 00. We hope to be able to prepare an advertisement for our next issue, but in the meantime orders may be sent, and you will receive the book as soon as it is ready.

Only a Wild Rose Bud.

Little May was sitting in front of the cottage thinking. It was a pretty little cottage, with roses clambering up the trellis, and ivy climbing over the door. In the yard were all kinds of flowers; roses, carnations, hyacinths and mignonette; but the pride of old Grandpa Stanly's heart was a little square near the front door covered with wild-roses, for it is not every one who has wild roses in the front yard.

As I said, little May was thinking; and I will tell you what she was thinking about. The evening before there had been a lecture in the Town-hall by a man who had claimed that there was no God. May was so busy wondering how a person could be so wicked as to think there was no God, that she did not see a gentleman walk up the front path towards the door, and did not even know he was near her, until he said: "Little girl, of what are you thinking?"

May started and blushed as she replied, "I was thinking, sir, how a person could be so wicked as to believe that there is no God."

"And do you believe there is a God?" said the gentleman.

Not once did May think, what was really true, that this was the gentleman who had delivered the lecture the evening before; the gentleman for whom she had prayed so earnestly that morning that she, May Stanly, might be able to do him some good.

She simply walked over to the bed of wild-roses and plucked one of the most beautiful; a little bud just beginning to open, and said sweetly, "Who made this?"

The gentleman took it, and looked at the delicate golden petals, almost hidden among the pink satin leaves, and then at the eager upturned face of May, and answered softly and reverently, "God made it."

And there was joy among the angels of God in heaven over one repenting sinner. And yet it was only a little wild-rose bud.—Hattie Olive Snow, in N. Y. Observer.

Dear Children:

I once read of a man whose name signifies "Clean, pure and just." He was a tax-gatherer, and had become rich, and perhaps had exacted more money from his customers than was his due. Probably he had heard many wonderful things concerning Jesus, but had never had the opportunity of seeing him. The multitude which followed being great, he found some difficulty in getting near enough to behold Jesus, so he ran before, and climbed up a tree, as he was little of stature. He did not suppose Jesus would see him, hoping no doubt the spreading boughs would hide him. As Jesus was passing that way he looked up and saw him. Calling him by name, Jesus said, "Make haste and come down, for today I must abide at thy house," and he made haste and came down, and received him joyfully. And when those who stood by saw it, they murmured that Jesus should be guest with a man whom they called a sinner.

But the pled earnest man stood and said, Behold, Lord the half of my goods I give to the poor, and if I have taken anything from any man in a false way, I restore him fourfold. Jesus knew his name unfolded his sweet character, and said, "This day is salvation come to this house, forasmuch as he also is a son of Abraham. For the Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." Little did this man think that his earnestness to see Jesus would ensure such a blessing, and that among the throng Jesus was seeking him, who was a lost son of Abraham.

The Lord knoweth them that are his, and the first evidence this son of Abraham gave was his willingness to depart from iniquity. Had he not fed the poor and needy and desired to return anything he had obtained wrongfully, our Lord would not have said to him, "This day is salvation come to this house." He possessed health and riches, but did not for a moment imagine that the one of whom he had heard could bring him salvation, and was sent to save the lost sheep of the house of Israel. Jesus seemed pleased with his disposition and character, regarding him not as a sinner but as one who needed to be shown the way of God more perfectly.

Your affectionate Teacher,

E. CLEVELAND.

New Efforts of the Papacy.

Mr. Donald Matheson publishes the following extracts from a letter he has received from a well-known Italian evangelist, whose name for prudential reasons is withheld:

The efforts that Popery is making in extending its kingdom of darkness against Christ, are really incredible. If the servants of Christ displayed the same earnestness for the extension of the Gospel of the grace of God, what amount of good would not result, and how many souls would not be snatched from perdition and led to Christ? But it is written that "the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light!" Here, in Italy, great efforts are being made to reintroduce the Jesuits, with monks, friars, and nuns, to insinuate themselves into every family; to open schools and institutions to educate, or rather pervert the minds of the youth. But this open challenge of the Pope and the Jesuits has created such a general indignation throughout this part of the country, that everywhere large meetings of solemn protest have been organized calling upon the government to enforce the laws for the suppression of the Jesuits and other corporations of monks and nuns. The Jesuits had already opened a school here, and were busily at work. The Italian Government has given orders to close it; and it has already been closed.

What blindness and infatuation have taken possion of the English Government to allow and encourage the Jesuits to undermine the faith of the great English nation, and poison the minds of the youth! Have they forgotten the plots of the Jesuits to subvert the English throne, to assassinate Queen Elizabeth, to organize the Spanish Armada, and to blow up the House of Parliament by the celebrated gunpowder plot? Is not the antagonism of the Irish people and its hostility to England the outcome of the Jesuits, friars, monks, nuns, and priests' education of the people?

I am in a position to tell you that a great scheme and a great plot exists to Romanize the whole English nation, and pervert their dear Protestant faith. There are secret associations, called Tertiarii, of lay men and women, affiliated to certain religious orders, whose duty it is to promote the work of Rome in every family accessible to them, according to their position or station in life, so as to pervade all the strata of society from the highest lord to the humblest sweeper, and imbue them with the doctrines of Popery. The father confessors often impose it as a penance or duty to do so to their so-called penitents. We Italian Protestants grieve very, very much at such a state of things in England, and at the apathy or false liberalism of people to let the plague of Popery make havoc of souls unchecked! It is high time that Christian people of every denomination should unite and oppose a bold front to Popery with the blessed Gospel of the grace of God. This should be done, not by impotent denunciations against Rome, but by positive teaching of the Word of God, and by comparing the idolatrous and corrupt practices of Popery in faith and worship with the teaching of the word of life.

Several popular books have been written in English by Jesuits and those affiliated with them, with the purpose of gilding and glossing over the corrupt doctrines and practices of Rome apt to deceive the bona fide Protestant. I know of two or three story books of romances, purposely written, which instil the poison so subtilly and so ably, that unless one be well grounded in the Protestant Faith, and knows something of controversy, he is sure to fall into the Popish trap. We require some popular works, written to meet the present exigencies of the case, and put into the hands of every Protestant in England, Scotland, and Ireland. Lectures, addresses and meetings unmasking the doctrines of Rome and rubbing off the gold and gloss put on, should be promoted. Not, however, conducted in an unfriendly or hostile spirit, but with that calm, peaceful and uncompromising spirit, proceeding from the consciousness of truth and power of the Gospel.—Israel's Watchman.

TINKLING CYMBALS.

Up to the gates of the kingdom came,
A stately man with a pompous mien,
With bristling air and a regal tread,
And he bowed to the Porter, and proudly said,
"I'm the Honorable Mr. ——, of Moneytown,
And I am here for my promised crown;
In many a language my voice has rung
And I can speak in the seraph's tongue!"

"But, have you Love?" and the Porter's eye
Grew sad as he passed the proud man by.
"Knowledge of tongues, as the flowers must pass,
'Tis tinkling cymbal and sounding brass!"

But I have the gift of prophecy,
And the tangled threads of mystery,
I have woven out in the loom of thought,
Till a speaking pattern has been wrought
In art and science, from zone to zone
The wonders of wisdom are all my own,
And plain to me as the children's rhyme,
Are the hidden doctrines of ancient time.

"But, have you love?" and the Porter's eye
Grew sadder still as he passed him by;
"Knowledge of mysteries too must pass,
'Tis tinkling cymbal and sounding brass!"

But I have faith that the mountains move;
That cross-es deserts, its strength to prove;
That takes through jungles its eager way,
And gives to the feathers the light of day,
That dares the hate of the wild Kaffir,
And bears the truth to the Isles afar:
That pierces the ocean's treacherous waste
That others, too, may the fountain taste.

"But, have you Love?" and the Porter's eye
With tears were wet, as he passed him by.
"You worked for fame! and your faith must pass
As tinkling cymbal and sounding brass!"

My goods I have given to feed the poor,
Till naught is left of an ample store;
And I would glad at the stroke have borne
If it might gain to "the cause" have turned,
Though my ears were closed to the anguished cry
Of your poor sheep, as I hurried by;
I have done the best that a man could do,
And eager still, for the crown I sue.

"But, have you Love?" and the Porter's eye
Grew cold and stern as he passed him by.
"You gave for praise! and your gifts must pass

ANTICHRIST.

The time and place for the career of a future Antichrist, seems, to the writer, to be distinctly given.

The time seen in vision by Daniel the prophet, according to Gabriel's interpretation, is "At the time of the end," viii. 17. "In the last end of the indignation," 19 v., (not before as some will have. "In the latter time of their kingdom," 23, the Roman Kingdom, "When the transgressors are come to the full," shall a future antichrist, "A king of fierce countenance," etc., stand up? He will be a prince of the Roman people, "that shall come" after the destruction of the city and the sanctuary by Titus A. D. 70. Dan. ix. 26, "And his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power." (alone) but by the power of ten kings that shall then have power as kings one hour with him. Rev. xvii. 12. "He shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper and practise, and shall destroy the mighty and the holy people," 24. Shall tread both the sanctuary and the host under foot unto 2300 days, not years, 14.

His place will be at the head of the soon to be reconstructed Roman kingdom; an 8th head which will be one of the 7, and may now be seen coming up from the northwest of Israel's land "Waxing exceeding great, toward the south, and towards the east, and toward the pleasant land," Dan. viii. 9. "The outcome of this future antichrist's conflict," will be to fulfil the word of God—who will work a work in his days, which the world will not believe, though it be told them. When I heard, said the prophet, my belly trembled; my lips quivered at the voice; rottenness entered into my bones, and I trembled in myself, that I might rest in the day of trouble; when he cometh up unto the people, he will invade them with his troops. Heb i. 5; iii. 16.

Under antichrist's reign the tares will be gathered and burned, Matt. xiii. 40. The Lord will also have a controversy with the nations, and will plead with all flesh, and will give them that were wicked to the sword. Jer. xxv. 31. His cruel treatment of the mighty and holy people will arouse the Protestant nations, and thus will God gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle. The kings of the earth will set themselves, and the rulers under antichrist will take counsel together against the Lord and his Anointed. Psa. ii. And he, and they shall stand up against the Prince of princes, but shall be broken without hand. Dan. viii. 25. Not thus was the Papal antichrist broken. Ere long he shall come against the present occupant of Israel's land, "The sick man," like a whirlwind—and shall enter into many countries—and shall plant the tabernacles of his palace between the seas, in the glorious holy mountain; yet he shall come to his end and none shall help him. Dan. xi. 40, 45. Many helped the Papal antichrist when his dominion was taken away and destroyed unto the end (and then to live again a short space—2300 days.)

"The mind which hath wisdom" will discover that the "He" that shall continue a short space, refers to the scarlet colored beast, the 8th head instead of the 7th. Rev. xvii. 10.

When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, (in Jerusalem not around it) whoso readeth let him understand this to be the sign of Christ's presence and the end of the world; and if living in Judea flee into the mountains, Matt. xxiv. 16, of Moab, we conclude, since they are to escape out of the hand of this destroyer, Deut. xi. 41, and Moab is told to hide God's outcasts from the face of the spoiler, who is soon to be consumed out of the land, where the throne of the Lord shall be established in mercy. Isa. xvi. 4, 5. The future antichrist is Paul's man of sin, and revealed when he lifts himself above everything called divinity or majesty so as to sit himself in the temple of God (in Jerusalem) exhibiting himself that he is a God. 2 Thess. ii. 3. D. G.

The speech of this last head of the Roman kingdom, points to the dragon as the head, and the union of the Greek and Latin churches as the source of his power, and to come up out of the earth,—the bottomless pit—after the Papal beast was led into captivity and killed by the sword. Rev. xiii. 10, 11; Dan. vii. 26. For the truth's sake I submit this to the wise for their consideration and if wrong shall be glad to be set right.

Your brother in tribulation awaiting for the Lord's coming and his kingdom.

E. D. Adams.

The Hope of the Bible, What is it? and When will it be Fulfilled?

Hope consists of a desire for some future good and a determination to use the means which are believed to be necessary to secure that good. The hope revealed in the Bible is the desire and expectation of receiving what God has promised at the time when he has promised it. All must admit that we should build our hope, "the one hope of our calling," on the exceedingly great and precious and immutable promises of a "God who cannot lie." Other propositions are equally plain. We should hope for what the Bible teaches us to look for, to wait for and be ready for. All Christians will also admit that every penitent believer of the gospel should embrace the same hope that we read the primitive Christians embraced through the teaching of Christ and the apostles. Let us then search the Scripture promises, and ascertain what the apostles and their converts looked for, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, as they were. What is it said they hoped for? The last promise made in the Bible is, "Behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me to give every man according as his work shall be." Then it is added, "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city." If then our works are good we may hope for a good reward when Jesus comes, and the great blessing of entering the pearly gates of the New Jerusalem after it has "come down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband."

It is said (Heb. xi. 9) that Abraham sojourned in the land of promise as in a strange country, with Isaac and Jacob the heirs with him of the same promise, for he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God. "For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels, and then he shall reward every man according to his works." Matt. xvi. 27. No reward till that glorious coming. "But when thou makest a feast, call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind, and thou shalt be blessed; for they cannot recompense thee, for thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just." Luke xiv. 13, 14. Those who do such deeds of charity to the poor have the promise of being blessed with a "recompense at the resurrection of the just"—not before. Take notice, these are the testimonies of the "true and faithful Witness."

The Apostle Paul's testimony is in perfect harmony. He cried out in the midst of the Jewish Council, "Of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question." Acts xxiii. 6. Again, he was brought before the Roman Governor Felix at Cesarea. In his defence, before him and the high priest and the elders, he says, "But this I confess unto thee, that after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers, and have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust." Acts xxiv. 14, 15. Writing to the Philippians, iii. 11, he declares he was willing to be conformed to Christ's death, "if possibly I may attain unto the resurrection from among the dead." Diaglott. He "pressed toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus," which he evidently expected at that time. In the same chapter he says, "Our citizenship is in heaven from whence also we look for the Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body." He writes to the Colossians, "Your life is hid with Christ in God, when Christ who is our life shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory." Mortify therefore your members which are upon the earth, fornication, covetousness, etc. The appearing with him in glory when he shall appear, is everywhere the Scriptural hope and motive power against all wickedness. The testimony of the beloved disciple John is similar. 1 John iii. 2. "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is. And every man that hath this hope in him, purifieth himself even as he is pure."

None need mistake "this hope." It is that the sons of God shall see Jesus as he is, in his glorified state, and "be like him," not at death, but when "he shall appear." The effect of this hope in the present life is to induce every one to purify himself. Shall not the people be exhorted to lay hold of this "one hope of the Christian calling, that exerts invariably such a purifying influence? Paul, in the eight chapters of his two letters to the Thessalonians, presents the same hope in every chapter, (and no other.) In the first chapter he reminds them of his former preaching among them "and how they turned to God from their idols to serve the living and true God, and to wait for his Son from heaven." Paul had instructed them not only to serve God, but to wait for the coming of the Lord, as all preachers should instruct their converts. In the second chapter and 19th verse, Paul enquires, "What is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming?" Paul did not expect to be in the presence of our Lord or meet his brethren in that presence till the coming, when they would go "his glory and joy."

Again he says, "And the Lord make you to increase and abound in love one toward another, and toward all men, even as we do toward you; to the end he may stablish your hearts unblamable in holiness before God, even our Father, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all his saints." In this passage the second coming is the hope and all-inspiring motive to love and holiness. In the fourth chapter Paul writes to those Christians in that church who mourned the loss of loved ones by the enemy death. If death had "lifted them up to God" (as a hymn reads), they should not mourn but rejoice. How did he comfort them? "I would not have you ignorant brethren concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not even as others which have no hope. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent them which are asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we be ever with the Lord." Wherefore comfort one another with these words.

These words contain a magnificent hope, well calculated to console the bereaved. "As God brought from the dead Jesus, so will he bring those that sleep in the dust of earth. They shall be gathered and caught up with the living saints to meet the Lord in the air and so be forever with the Lord." Thus we can see more of the great benefit of the true Bible hope. In the last chapter he tells them the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night to the world, but they were not in darkness that that day should overtake them as a thief. But let us who are of the day be sober, putting on the breast-plate of faith and love, and for an helmet the hope of salvation. It is impossible to have the salvation itself so long as the Christian has the hope of it; "for what a man seeth (or has) why does he yet hope for it; but if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it." Those who say they have already in actual possession the great salvation promised, should cast off that part of the Christian armor, the helmet, "which is the hope of salvation."

But Paul says, "we are saved by hope," and must patiently wait for it. Waiting implies hope. So Paul writes to the church at Corinth, "that ye come behind in no gift, waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." 1 Cor. i. 7. "For God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ, who died for us that whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with him." 1 Thess. v. 9. The appointment always goes before the thing appointed. Hence the fulfilment of the appointed salvation must be beyond this life. Will it be at death? Let the Holy Spirit answer. "Unto them that look for him he will appear the second time without sin unto salvation." Heb. ix. 28. No salvation without that "second appearing." He will appear unto them who look for him, and the first great object of his coming is the "redemption of the body," which Paul makes identical with the promised salvation. Rom. viii. 23, 24. Jesus, speaking of the signs of his near coming, says, "then look up, and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh." Luke xxi. 28.

In the first chapter of the second letter he commends their "patience and faith in all their persecutions and tribulations they endured," that they might be counted worthy of the kingdom of God for which they suffered." Those Christians had not yet got into the kingdom of God but were suffering for it. "And to you who are troubled," he says, "God will recompense rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, when he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe (Paul's testimony) in that day" (the day of his coming). Here is the hope of eternal rest in the kingdom for which the primitive Christians were ready to suffer and die. This kingdom and this rest we should earnestly strive to obtain at the time promised, "the revelation of the Lord Jesus from heaven with his mighty angels." In the second chapter Paul declares that there must be a predicted great apostasy, and out of it would rise an antichristian power called the "man of sin," "that wicked," "the son of perdition," and, after his blasphemous, bloody career of wickedness, he "shall be destroyed by the brightness of the Savior's coming." In the last chapter, 5th verse, we find these words, "The Lord direct your hearts into the love of God and the patient waiting for Christ." The love and the waiting were inseparably united in those days Why not now?

Thus we see that the "blessed hope of the glorious appearing" is not before us in all the chapters of the two epistles, and, in some of them, quite at length, and no other is found. Paul writes his valedictory to Timothy, 2 Tim. iv. 7, 8, "I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith. Henceforth, there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day, (the day of judgment, of his appearing and kingdom): and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing." Those who fear or hate that appearing, or are indifferent, cannot reasonably hope to gain the crown. In the letter written to Titus, ii. 11, he declares, "For the grace of God that bringeth salvation, hath appeared to all men, teaching us that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should walk soberly, righteously and godly in this present world, looking for that blessed hope, the glorious appearing of Jesus Christ."

This Scripture teaches us how to live in the present world, and to be looking for the fulfilment of the blessed hope of the glorious appearing of Christ. Who will presume to say that this hope is not blessed, or what disciple of Christ will refuse to learn both parts of the important lesson that the Great Teacher has taught us? Who will dare to separate the mighty motive from the practical part of this lesson? James says, iii. 5, "Hath not God chosen the poor of this world, rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom promised to them that love him?" Those who have strong faith in the promise of the kingdom thereby become heirs and build their hope on the promise that they shall inherit the kingdom "when the Son of man shall come in his glory and all the holy angels with him," and seated on his throne of glory shall say to them, "come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world."

Read the exhortation of the Apostle Peter, 1 Peter v. 1, to the elders, "Feed the flock of God, taking the oversight not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind, being examples to the flock." What motive did he use? That, if they were faithful they would die and go to heaven and meet their flock there when they should die? Hear the promise of the Holy Spirit through Peter, "And when the chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away." Peter begins his first letter by revealing to us the true Bible hope which we should all embrace. "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which, according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance, incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time. Wherein ye greatly rejoice, though now for a season (if need be) ye are in heaviness through manifold trials; that the trial of your faith, being much more precious than gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise, and honor, and glory, at the appearing of Jesus Christ."

All the millions of martyrs who have died for Christ, have suffered and died on account of their strong faith in these promises of God. If our faith is strong enough to endure the trials that beset our pathway, that faith, as well as theirs, will be found unto praise and honor and glory at the appearing of Christ—not at death. "Wherefore," says Peter, gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, and hope to the end for the grace (favor) that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ." God has promised eternal life and promised that glorious and blood-bought gift at the coming of Christ and the first resurrection. Therefore we should enter the strait gate and walk in the narrow way that leads to life. John says, ii. 25, "This is the promise that he has promised us, even eternal life." "And now little children," he adds, "abide in him, that when he shall appear, we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming."

Eternal life is not now in possession of "God's elect," but they are in "hope of eternal life, which God that cannot lie, promised before the world began." Titus i. 2. That blissful life is the subject of promise and hope. We could not hope for it a second after being satisfied that we had obtained the gift. "That being justified by his grace we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life. The heirship always precedes the inheritance. When will the heirship be exchanged for the inheritance of this great blessing? We say, not at death, because there is no promise of it at that time. "He that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting." But the reaping time, or harvest, is at the end of this age. See Matt. xiii. 39. The harvest is the end of the age, (Aion) when, by the almighty power of God's Spirit the dead saints will be raised to an endless life. It is promised in the age to come. See Mark x. 30.

Jesus promised that all those who forsake all for him and his gospel, shall receive eternal life in the age to come. That age will soon come. Jesus said, Luke xx. 35, "But they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that age (Aion) and the resurrection out from among the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage, neither can they die any more; for they are equal to the angels." Jesus testifies, John v. 28, that the hour is coming when all that have done good shall come forth out of their graves at the sound of his voice to a resurrection of life. Jesus said to Martha, "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead he shall live, and he that liveth and believeth on me shall never die." John xi. 25. "Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life." Dan. xii. 2. Until that waking, no everlasting life. "They that are Christ's shall be made alive at his coming." 1 Cor. xv. 23. "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." Matt. v. "Nevertheless we look for a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness." 2 Peter iii. 13. Thus we see that Christ's second coming and kingdom "under the whole heaven," immortality and eternal life, glory and honor in the "New Jerusalem, come down from God out of heaven," after the first resurrection, is the "one hope of the Christian calling."

What is Charity?

Is it charity that unites with publicans and sinners to getting up fairs and festivals, and games of chance, to make money for the poor?

Is love to God, and love for the poor the actuating motive? Is it not rather the feast, fun, the excitement that is sought? rather than the seeking to obey the Savior in care for the poor?

Whose money is it that is given? Does it come wholly out of the pockets of those who give it? Does any of it come out of their pockets? when the rent of rooms and all expenses are paid? If not, even granting that this is God-like charity, the charity that is greater than faith or hope, whose charity is it? Certainly not that of the organization that hands over the money to the poor, because, it is given not at the cost of any self-denial, but rather as the result of self-gratification and pleasure.

Then the Christian may not eat and drink with the drunken; his alms are to be given in secret, he may not engage in any questionable games, even though the relief of suffering be the promised end. Satan likes to put on the robes of light,—he dearly loves to gloss over sin, to make it seem

"As if sin were in no danger,
Like were no more vanity."

Come out, come out from the world! oh people of the Lord!! "Touch not, taste not, handle not, the unclean thing." Give to the poor in God's way. Be not found chained to the world when Christ shall come.

LEAVES FROM MY JOURNAL.

Jerusalem, Dec. 8, 1886.

It is now quite cold for this place. Our old stoves have not come, and we are so situated, having expected some change before this, that we cannot accomplish anything until warmer weather, or some change takes place.

We hear that the Russian Consul is sending the Jews from this country at short notice. He takes the passports from those who get passports from Russia, which, of course, are the most wealthy and influential, and gives them a few hours to depart under a penalty of some kind. It is said that this action is caused by a fear that the Jews will purchase so much land around Jerusalem that it will raise the price and prevent the Russians from buying; and in other ways injure their cause. What a bold step this is to take over the head of the Turkish government. (But the Turkish government may secretly be in league with it.) The Russians seem to feel that they are already masters of the world.

A Jew was ordered before the consul last week, who, seeing his opportunity, sent word that he was dead. The consul did not believe the message and sent word to have the body remain until he could come himself. But when he arrived at the house, to his great mortification he found the man had been buried. He demanded of the friends the reason why his orders had not been obeyed, and had the satisfaction of learning, what of course he already knew, that the Turkish laws required dead bodies to be buried within a certain number of hours after death; and this poor man had the advantage of fixing the time of his death when he pleased. The good consul was defeated and the poor Jew escaped. Something of this kind is occurring almost every week.

The Russians have actually more fear of those poor helpless Jews than of the Turks, and well they may have. Whether they have faith enough in the Old Testament prophecies to see that some day they will fall upon the mountains of Israel before this people, I do not know. Alexander the Great could understand from Daniel's prophesy that he was to be victorious over the Persians, and become great. But it is doubtful if he looked far enough to sum up his own wretched end and the divisions of his empire. This may be the case with the Russians. They may see a victory for them in Palestine, and not understand that it is themselves who are to come to an end and none to help them.

We are having another rain, and everything looks prosperous for bountiful crops. Seeds which failed to come last year on account of the drought, such as potatoes and beans, have now made their 'debut' and are looking finely. This is wonderful. I was surprised when I saw it. The fact that potatoes and beans are growing finely in the middle of December may sound strange to the people of cold New England; but this is the country where trees are to bear twelve manner of fruits and yield their fruit every month, while their leaves will heal the nations.

Port Said, Jan. 5.—As a party of two months at Jerusalem has made your correspondent's impressions quite fresh, you may be pleased to note these facts. The Russian Jews came in such numbers that the Turkish authorities were apparently fearful of capture, and so obstructed them with a rigorous passport law and at last a total prohibition of them. Money will go a great ways however in making men lenient. A Jew here at Port Said tells us that he thinks Russia is playing the game of the man who wants to get the services of his profitable servant for almost nothing, and so talks harshly of him and in every way makes his excuses for fleeing him. The Jews have not all left Russia yet by any means.

The two Hebrew papers coming from abroad, of the largest circulation in Jerusalem, are published at the capital of Russia.

The editor of one of the only two Hebrew newspapers published in Jerusalem is now visiting among his co-religionist in Russia.

There was a Russian belonging to the sect called Sobbonik; that is Sabbath-keepers, circumcised as a proselyte Jew in Jerusalem recently. Many believe them to be of the Israelitish stock originally, forced, or converted into, the Greek church long ago. Their numbers are large and their locality, department, or province state, is Moscow. Can some of our readers furnish more information about the Sobbonikis of Russia? A statement recently in print makes them to be in number about ten millions.

The arrival in Jerusalem of the Yemen Jews of Arabia three years ago has been a marked event. The story is that they saw a mysterious writing on the door or door posts of a synagogue, telling them to emigrate to Jerusalem. They were much oppressed by the Arabs, and sought relief by coming to Jerusalem as a refuge. They came out to the Red Sea, and round by water to Jaffa. They lost much on the way, although they were an impoverished people to begin with. Some have gone back, but most of the 400 are at last housed. They have the advantage of speaking Arabic and the disadvantage of not speaking German, or some of the so-called jargons of their co-religionists.—Crossett.

[We take the above from the New Age, published at Attalla, Alabama. It has been sent to us in exchange, and we have already reprinted several articles from its columns regarding Jerusalem and Palestine. The paper seems to have arranged for weekly letters from the Orient. In explaining prophecy it is claimed by its writers that the United States fill an important place in the predictions of Daniel and the Revelations. For ourself, however, we are led to conclude that the dominions subjected to the rule of the powers symbolized by the Great Image constitute the true field of prophecy, and that the seven times (2520 years) mark the duration of Gentile times, or the length of time that the four great world powers will be permitted to rule before the kingdom of God's dear Son will supplant them all. Its news from the Eastern World is important taken in connection with what is now transpiring in the Old World.—Ed. Restitution].

The God-Ordained Promise Which Paul Calls the Gospel.—Gal. iii. 8, 16, 29.

BY E. G. SIMONDS.

"In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed."—Gen. xxii. 18.

From the Scriptures of truth this conclusion we draw, — 2 Tim. iii. 16; John xvii. 17.
That the wisdom of man and the works of the law — 1 Cor. i. 19; Isa. v. 21; Rom. iii. 20.
Have the power to cleanse nor forgive nor to save, — Rom. x. 4; Heb. viii. 7.
Nor restore from the curse nor redeem from the grave. — Gal. iii. 21; ii. 16, 21.
Men are saved by their faith in the Crucified One, — Rom. x. 9; Acts xvi. 31; Heb. xi. 6.
When his love and his goodness to them are made known. — Rom. x. 13-17; 1 Cor. i. 21; John iii. 16.
Saving faith comes by hearing the life-giving word, — Rom. x. 17; John vi. 63; Phil. ii. 16.
And the mercy of God through the Savior conferred. — 2 Cor. v. 19; 1 Tim. ii. 4, 6.
All who will may be saved by the Bible faith, — John iii. 16.
And may gain life eternal through Christ and his grace. — Mark x. 30; 1 Col. iii. 4.
For the gospel salvation to all is made free! — Mark xvi. 15; 1 Tim. ii. 4; Titus ii. 11.
As they heed its instruction their judgment will be. — Rom. ii. 16; Mark xvi. 16; John iii. 18.
Endless life is for those who the gospel accept — John iii. 16; Mark x. 30; Rom. vi. 23.
But death is the portion of those who reject. — Acts iii. 23; Heb. x. 26, 27; Rom. vi. 23.
For there's no other way that's revealed by the Lord — Acts iv. 12; John xiv. 6.
To redeem fallen man but through Christ and his word. — 1 Tim. ii. 12, 13; Col. iii. 17; John v. 24.
The heavens are the Lord's, but the earth hath he given — Psa. cxv. 16; Isa. xlv. 18.
To the children of men, as their home and their heaven. — Dan. vii. 27; Psa. xxxvii. 29; Matt. v. 5.
Wicked rulers and nations that far have come away, — Dan. ii. 3; 2 Tim. iii. 13; Isa. lx. 2.
And their reign has led down from the gold to the clay. — Isa. ii. 21, 41.

Communications.

Paternity, Genealogy, Nature and Character of Jesus, in the Light of the Covenants: being two Lectures, with some Additions, Delivered at Wyoming, Delaware, by Dr. I. C. Thomas.—No. 2.

"What think ye of Christ? Whose Son is he?" Matt. xxii. 42.

The only question as to the paternity or fatherhood of Jesus is, Was he begotten by Joseph? or by the Holy Spirit, the Power of the Highest? Was he the naturally begotten son of Joseph, or was he the super-naturally begotten Son of God?—"The only (thus) begotten Son of God?" As before said, this question can only be settled by the Bible. What, then, saith the Scriptures? I answer; not once in all the Bible, is it said, either by God or man, by prophet or apostle, by either Joseph or Mary, by believer or unbeliever, or by Jesus himself, that he was the begotten son of Joseph!! And yet, that is the question that can be decided only by the Scriptures. If then, it be a fact, that the Scriptures from beginning to end, never once say or even intimate such a thing, but on the contrary do clearly and distinctly say the very reverse: how then is it possible to prove it from the Scriptures? How then does it look and sound for persons to assume and hold such a position, and teach it as God's truth, set forth in his Book? Especially, when the very reverse is there taught—that the conception and begettal of Jesus, was by the Holy Spirit and Power of the Highest; and which statement is corroborated by the concurrent testimony of the entire Scriptures, as we shall soon see? But some person is ready to ask; is not Jesus actually called the son of Joseph several times? Well, let us see. The words "son of Joseph," occur only four times in all the Scriptures; twice by the ignorant Jews, once by Luke, and once by Philip. But Jesus is called the Son of God, and the only begotten Son, over forty times, and spoken of as His or God's Son, altogether over sixty times. Just think of this fact for one moment.

But let us examine and consider the circumstances, how it was, and by whom the words "Son of Joseph" were used the four times.

First: Luke says (in commencing to give the genealogy; or as Matthew calls it, "the generation of Jesus Christ the son of David") as follows: "And Jesus himself began to be about thirty years of age, being (as was supposed) the son of Joseph." Luke iii. 23. Now I ask, is there any evidence in this, that Jesus was the natural son of Joseph?—that Jesus was begotten by Joseph? If such had been the case would not Luke have said so, and left out "as was supposed?" If it was a fact, was there any need or cause for saying as was supposed, more than in the other cases named by Luke? Would it not have been most unreasonable to add such an explanatory sentence, in stating a fact? Who does not know that a parenthesis includes important words which are necessary to explain or qualify the chief sentence; as Webster says, viz: "Parenthesis, certain words inserted in a sentence, which interrupt the sense or natural connection of the words, but serve to explain or qualify the sense of the principal sentence." Hence, to throw out or to ignore those explanatory words, as some take the unwarrantable liberty of doing; is to disregard the command, "thou shalt not diminish from the word;" and also to do violence to common sense. It follows therefore, that the words (as was supposed) were for the purpose of showing that instead of Jesus being the son of Joseph, it was merely a supposition of the people, who knew nothing of the facts of his miraculous conception, as made known to Mary and Joseph, which they had kept to themselves and pondered them in their hearts. Luke ii. 19. Who can wonder that the spiritually ignorant wicked Jews of Nazareth, of lower Galilee, where Jesus was brought up, where he had lived for nearly thirty years among them; working no doubt sometimes with his brothers at the carpenter business with his legal father—stepfather—by whom he had been adopted: who can wonder that the Jews under such circumstances, and being totally ignorant of the things made known to Joseph and Mary by the Angel, at the time of their espousal so many years before; who can wonder that they should suppose that Jesus was the real son of Joseph? Who can wonder that everybody who knew him and the family, should think so, except those persons to whom the facts had been revealed? Indeed, how could they possibly think otherwise?

Now then, let us consider the second occasion where the words, son of Joseph, occur. It was when Jesus on the Sabbath day, stood up to read and preach for the first time. Luke iv. 22. On that occasion the Jews asked the question, "Is not this Joseph's son?" In Matthew's record of this occasion, he words the question as follows: "Is not this the Carpenter's son? Matt. xiii. 55. In Mark's record of the same occasion, he words the question as follows: "Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary? Mark vi. 3. John does not seem to have recorded this occasion, but records one occasion which neither of the other Evangelists records, which we will soon examine. It matters not in which of the three ways above noticed, the question was asked or worded; it is the same. It was asked by the wicked blinded Jews; who, as Jesus told them, "judged after the flesh," John viii 15, and to whom he said "judge not according to appearance." But that is just what they did. They judged according to the flesh, and according to appearances, as I have shown, and not according to the revealed facts concerning the origin, conception and paternity of Jesus; of which facts they were necessarily totally ignorant. Hence their judgment was incorrect, not righteous judgment. The consequence was, they "supposed" that Jesus was a real son of Joseph. They supposed he was therefore an impostor, a pretender. They supposed he was a mere man, claiming and pretending to be the Son of God; and therefore a blasphemer: and they judged him to be deserving of death; and in their unrighteous judgment, and ignorance, they carried out their wicked purpose, and "killed the Prince of life"—the Son of God—the Messiah for whom they professed to be looking.

Again. We will now call your attention to the third place where the words, son of Joseph, occur. John vi. 42. On this occasion, when Jesus said to the Jews, "I am the bread which came down from heaven," they then asked the same question; "Is not this Jesus the son of Joseph? whose father and mother we know? How is it then he saith I came down from heaven?" This again corroborates the fact so plainly stated by Luke; that they supposed he was the son of Joseph. Although Jesus told them plainly that he came down from heaven, (having reference to his having been the Word that was with God, and was God, and which by the Power of God was made flesh and was then dwelling among them, as God manifest in flesh, or Immanuel), yet they did not understand him, nor believe him. They judged after the flesh, and according to appearances; and these were against him, and the truth which he uttered. Hence they still supposed him to be nothing but a mere man—the son of Joseph.

The fourth and last occasion we have to consider, where the words "son of Joseph" occur, is found in John i. 45. Philip, the first day he saw Jesus, found Nathanael and said to him, "we have found him of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets, did write, Jesus of Nazareth, son of Joseph." It is evident that all Philip knew of Jesus at that time was, that he was supposed to be the son of Joseph the carpenter, and so called by the people. But when Jesus found him for the purpose of making him one of his disciples and followers, and told him to "follow me;" he doubtless informed Philip that he (Jesus) was the one "of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets did write," "Jesus of Nazareth." But when Philip introduced Jesus to Nathanael, he added what Jesus had not said, but what the people said, using their language as he had heard it, "the son of Joseph:" which language however, was in one sense strictly correct. For Jesus was the legal son, or step-son of Joseph, by the marriage of Joseph to Mary his mother. Hence Jesus was rightly called the son of Joseph, in that sense, just as is the custom now days to speak of a step-son. Besides, he was supposed by the people, as Luke said, and as we have shown, to be Joseph's real son. It is evident that even at that time—the very first day Jesus found Philip and talked with him—Philip began at once to understand and believe in Jesus as the promised Messiah; but that he did not fully understand and comprehend how, or in what way, he could be both "Son of God" and "Son of man" at the same time, and that he did not get a clear idea of Jesus and his Father for a long time, is also evident. (Just as the whole twelve failed to understand many other things "written by the prophets concerning the Son of man," and it was said of them, "And they understood none of these things." Luke xviii. 31, 34). For, three years after, when Jesus was about to leave his disciples and go to the Father; he said to Philip, "If ye had known me, ye should have known my Father also; (who my Father was) from henceforth ye know him and have seen him (that is, his representative or manifestation—"the express image of his person." Heb. i. 3). Philip saith unto him, Lord show us the Father, and it sufficeth us. Jesus saith unto him, have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me Philip? He that hath seen me hath seen the Father; and how sayest thou then, show us the Father? Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in me? The words that I speak unto you, I speak not myself; but the Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works. Believe me that I am in the Father, and the Father in me." John xiv. 7–11. I presume after this plain lesson from the Master, that Philip, and all the twelve except Judas, whom Jesus had previously called "a devil," fully understood the nature, character and paternity of Jesus—that he had his origin in God his real Father, by whose power he had been begotten: and I think this lesson alone, taken in connection with what Luke said (as was supposed) ought to be sufficient to convince any one.

The Anti-Christ.

After the matter of prejudice, the greatest difficulty to overcome in the discussion of any question, is the mass of extraneous matter that is brought into it and which only serves to confuse the mind, and thus it has been in regard to the subject above named. As a recent writer in THE RESTITUTION has observed, and which is very well known, the word Anti-Christ has a general reference to the antagonism to Christianity exhibited at all times in its history, but I think it will also generally be allowed that it can at least have a particular and special application. In other words that the spirit of Anti-Christ is embodied in particular characters, as in a Herod or a Pope.

The question before us is not as to a "future" Anti-Christ; as long as Anti-Christ in the spirit exists he will be, and at present I do not know that the existence, the continuing existence of the spirit of Anti-Christ is doubted by Christians at all, so that the "futurity" of Anti-Christ at present is not an open question. It is a question though, if that spirit will "head up" again in another form in great power, or whether it is gradually decaying and losing power. It is a question if God's Christ our King comes next year, whether the "kings of the earth" will take the timely warning of the sweet singer of Israel and "kiss the Son lest he be angry."

When I see the nations beating their plowshares into swords, and hear the alarm of war, the "mustering of many nations," when the ammunition factories are working day and night, and every man in Europe almost is a soldier, when the Pope (supposed to be long dead) is foremost in the councils of the nations, and even Bismarck has "gone to Canossa," then I say, when the King comes will they throw away their accoutrements, and stamp all their nice "now explosives" unwarranted to smash any fort up inside of an hour) into the ocean. Will they all unite in firing a royal salute of welcome, and abdicate the power they have usurped with violence, or will they "make a stand for it?" I think there is but one answer to the question, and almost any one can guess it who reads the books of the prophets.

J. P. GELLETLY.

TEMPERANCE.

FORWARD.

This life is such a boon:
It is so bright; we love it more, its noon,
Its night. Our hearts go out
For good, not ill which lies about.
Only our life, one chance to try
Our strength or weakness ere we die.
In the great fight we must prevail,
We love the right, right cannot fail.

The clans lie thick around.
They fought not well. On slippery ground
They fell—where wine drops lay,
Thrown by the hands that Hell obey,
Regardless of the bitter blight
Of those who plead through years of night,
That there may be a safer way
For those whose wills have gone astray.

A time of light is this:
The way is clear. Down, down the dark abyss
So near, none need to go:
The tippler need not tread the path of woe.
Kind friends are on his track;
The law shall hedge him back,
Till he himself shall say, I can,
I will be strong, I am a man.

The boys so glad and free,
So full of health and life and hope and glee,
And wealth of loving trust,
They will not lay their honor in the dust.
Though tempted on from joy to joy,
They know the painted, gilded toy
Of short lived pleasure in the wine cup's glow
Is but a cheat which they can well forego.

They know the bitter end:
That, fast or slow, the slope will downward tend.
And so, with heart and voice,
While parents, sisters, friends rejoice—
The boys, the gay, glad boys
Who love to make a glorious noise—
They cry: Let Prohibition rule the world!
And Alcohol, the foe, down from his throne be hurled!

A SURE TRADE.

It is upon the certainty that, the appetite once fixed, it can never be broken, that those in the liquor-traffic build, and they have, in the very nature of the connection between the stomach and the mind, a very broad and deep corner stone. They know that, with the liquor made in this day, all that is necessary for them to acquire a man's estate is to get the habit fixed upon him; and they know just as well, that to keep their trade good all that is necessary, when a customer dies, is to fasten the appetite upon a fresh boy. They quite understand that the boy will graduate into a spendthrift, and, finally, a thief and a nuisance, and that they will get everything he can beg, borrow, and steal, but they take him just the same. So much beer will run through him before he dies, and that beer he will manage somehow to pay for. He will not pay his butcher, baker, or tailor, but he does manage to pay for his liquor, and that is all the liquor-seller thinks of.—Petroleum V. Nasby.

A FEW STRAY THOUGHTS ON THE SALOON BUSINESS.

The keeper of those vile dens, known by the euphemistic term saloons—a word that serves about as much to veil the atrociousness of the trade as white-wash would have availed to cover the abominations of Sodom—is nothing less than a licensed malefactor. His business is, in the first place, to so intoxicate every man that has anything to do with him as to rifle from him all his wealth, and, as a consequence, reduce his wife and children to abject destitution and beggary. Nearly all the untold miseries of pauperism are the direct result of the saloon trade. The saloon is the school from which is graduated each and every species of criminal character and name. From these seminaries of Satan the anarchist and thug, the thief and murderer, well-schooled in every thing abominable and horrible, emerge to riot, rob, kill and destroy. The "bitter cry of London" is from the miserable wretches from whom liquor dealers have filched the last penny for their vile swill. Liquor dealers are responsible for Ireland's abject pauperism to an infinitely greater degree than the oppressive landlords. For moral rottenness and soul-leprosy liquor vending holds an unrivaled place.

THE COMING AGE,
—IN—
Nature and Proximity.
—By J. P. WESTCOTT.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of the coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar causes, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in practical logic, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, parties, plots, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 300 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $1 00. Send to this office for this work.

The Law, the Covenants, and the Sabbath. By L. C. Thomas.

Title page.—"The Law, the Covenants, and the Sabbath. Also an Epitome of the Great Reformers and an Appendix including various other subjects, in brief.

The perfect unchangeable moral law is considered and shown to be the basis and spirit of the old Sinaitic law, now dead in its entirety. The law of Moses and law of Christ are compared and contrasted, and the relation of both to the old and new covenants is treated at some length. The Sabbath question is carefully and logically examined, and presented and discussed in a somewhat new light.

The work also includes the consideration of Sunday, conditional immortality, the gospel, return of the Jews, the restoration of the Kingdom to Israel, punishment of the wicked, the gist of the name, the religion, morality, Christianity, etc. This work contains 350 pages, cloth bound. Price $1.00.

The Gospel according to St. Matthew. Translated from the Greek text of Constantine De Tischendorff, and other standard scholastic authorities, by Chas. Gardner, M. A. A book of 178 pages, handsomely bound in cloth. Price 50 cts.

Scriptural Baptism Defined. By E. Wilson. A Pamphlet of 46 Pages, showing what Baptism is, and its connection with the Forgiveness of Sins as the Obedience of Faith. Price 10cts.

Creation vs. Evolution. By Mrs. H. V. Reed. Section 1.—History of the theory of Evolution—Mummied animals of Egypt—Absurd positions of its advocates—Mr. Cope and the Quadrumanous—Reversed knees—Herbert Spencer and the Tadpole—Horses' toes—Six days of creation—Opposition theories.

Section 2.—Tendency of scientific inquiry—Testimony of eminent scientists against evolution—Degeneracy more probable than improvement.

Section 3.—No benefit to Atheism even if true—Testimony of leading evolutionists in favor of Theism—Science and Christianity.

Price 10 cents. For sale at this office.

Christ's Kingdom—Where is it? What is it? The above is the title of a discourse delivered at Berwick, Pa, July 25, 1875, by Jos. Leclar. It was issued in pamphlet form at that time, but the supply was soon exhausted, and the work was out of print until now a second edition has been printed, and can be had at this office, or of the Author, Jos. Leclar, Mauch Chunk, Pa., at 10c. each, 8 for 25c., or 15 for $1.

Communications.

Paternity, Genealogy, Nature and Character of Jesus, in the Light of the Covenants; being two Lectures, with some Additions, Delivered at Wyoming, Delaware, by Dr. L. C. Thomas.—No. 3.

"What think ye of Christ? Whose Son is he?" Matt. xxii. 42.

Nathanael, of whom Jesus said, "an Israelite indeed," when introduced by Philip, understood and recognized the origin and paternity of Jesus much sooner and quicker than Philip. Just as soon as he saw that Jesus knew his heart and character—that he was an Israelite indeed — and because he (Jesus) said he saw him under the fig tree being a long way off: he therefore understood at once, that he was the Messiah—King—whom God had promised, saying, I will be his Father and he shall be my Son, (including type and antitype, 1 Chron. xvii. 13) and he immediately exclaimed, "Rabbi, thou art the Son of God; thou art the King of Israel."

Now I have gone through and carefully considered the four only occasions where "son of Joseph" occurs in the Scriptures. Is there any evidence in them that Jesus was begotten by Joseph? I think not. But we have also the following word: "Now his parents went up to Jerusalem, etc.... And his mother said unto him, Son, behold thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing, etc." But Jesus answered, "Wist ye not (did you not know) that I must be about my Father's business?" Luke ii. 41–49. This occurred when Jesus was twelve years old. So it will be seen that even at that age, he knew that God was his Father, not Joseph; and he thus showed his mother that he knew his origin and paternity, and that he understood his own mission and his real Father's business; and that it was more important than that of his reputed or step-father—carpenter work — or anything else. He understood his Mission and work much better than they did; for "they understood not the saying which he spake unto them." There is no doubt but his mother always spoke of Joseph as his father, when talking to her neighbors, and also when talking to Jesus; which was very proper and right, as before said; and we are told that Jesus "was subject unto them," even after he was twelve years old and understood his origin, paternity, and mission of after years. Lastly, we have these words, viz., "and when the parents brought in the child Jesus," etc. Luke ii. 27. But it is not necessary after all I have said, to make a single remark about this passage, only, that they were his legal parents.

I have now given all there is in the entire Scriptures, upon which to base the Josephite delusion! Not one word about Jesus having been begotten by Joseph, in all the Scriptures; and yet that is the question which must be proved by the Scriptures if proved at all. It seems to me that the reader cannot fail to see there is no foundation in the Scriptures for that delusion. I admit there are a few other passages, which by misapprehension and misinterpretation they try to bring in to their aid; which I shall duly consider in the proper place. Where then do they find any foundation for it? It must certainly be outside the Scriptures if anywhere. We shall see.

But now let us consider some of the Scriptures on the other side of the question. We have already called attention to some. But we will now quote plain positive Scriptural statements, proving most distinctly that the conception and begettal of Jesus was accomplished by the Holy Spirit—the Power of the Highest; and "therefore" as soon as he was born of the Virgin Mary, he was the Son of God—the only begotten Son of God—as he was called in the days of his flesh. I cannot avoid the thought, that every honest, intelligent, thinking reader will be satisfied with what Scripture I quote, and astonished at the wonderful harmony and conclusiveness with which they support the supernatural origin, conception and paternity of our Savior. I begin with Matt. i. 18. (In regard to the question of the genuineness of the Scriptures I quote, I shall bring ample proof before I get through—proof sufficient to satisfy and forever settle the question in the judgment of every honest reasonable person.) "Now the birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise. When as his mother, Mary, was espoused to Joseph, before they came together, she was found with child of the Holy Spirit." (See Revised Version, margin).... "The angel said to Joseph, "that which is conceived in her (or begotten, see R. V., margin; or, that being formed in her is by the Holy Spirit—Diaglott) is of the Holy Spirit, and she shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name JESUS, (that is, Savior—margin) for he shall save his people from their sins. Now all this came to pass that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the Lord through the prophets, saying: Behold the virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Immanuel, which is, being interpreted, GOD with us." See R. V. and also Diaglott—Note. And Joseph "knew her not till she had brought forth a son; and he called his name JESUS." Matt. i. 18–25.

Again: The record of this important event, by Luke, so far as is necessary to quote, is as follows. "The Angel Gabriel was sent from God unto a city of Galilee, named Nazareth, to a virgin espoused to a man whose name was Joseph, of the house of David and the virgin's name was Mary." And the angel said unto her, "behold thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a son, and shalt call his name JESUS. ....Then said Mary unto the Angel, How shall this be, seeing I know not a man? And the angel answered and said unto her: The Holy Spirit shall come upon thee, and the Power of the Highest shall overshadow thee: therefore also that which is to be begotten and born of thee shall be called holy, the Son of God." Luke i. 26. See R. V. Margin.

Now then let us hear the testimony of Jesus himself. He said no one but the Father knew who he was, except those to whom it was revealed. "No one knoweth who the Son is, save the Father, and who the Father is save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him." Luke x. 22.

Jesus said, "I am from above." John viii. 23. Could a son of Joseph say that?

Again, he said, "I proceeded forth and came from God." John viii. 42. Could a mere man say that?

Again, he said, "I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world: again I leave the world and go to the Father. His disciples said unto him, Lo now speakest thou plainly, and speakest no proverb. Now are we sure that thou knowest all things,....by this we believe that thou camest forth from God." John xvi. 28. Enough I think to convince any one that he was not a mere man. "Knoweth all things!" Could that be said of a son of Joseph?

Again; he said, "O Father, glorify thou me with thine own self, with the glory which I had with thee before the world was." John xvii. 5.

He said, "I and my Father are one;" and yet he said, "my Father is greater than I." John x. 30; xiv. 28.

"The Jews said unto him, Thou art not yet fifty years old, and hast thou seen Abraham? Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, before Abraham was I am." John viii. 57; Ex. iii. 14.

Our Savior in his prayer to his Father in behalf of his disciples, "lifted up his eyes to heaven, and said, Father the hour is come; glorify thy Son that thy Son may glorify thee: as thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him: and this is eternal life, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." This shows the importance of knowing who Jesus Christ is; for it is only to those who know him that he will give eternal life; and to know Jesus is to know his origin, and by what power he was produced, to know who his real Father was, to know whose Son he is, at least to know and believe the record that his Father hath given concerning the origin and production of his own Son.

Again, he said, in his prayer for his disciples, "they have known surely that I came out from thee, and they have believed that thou didst send me." John xvii. 1–8.

Jesus asked his disciples, "Whom do ye say that I am?" And Simon Peter answered and said, Thou art the Christ the Son of the living God. And Jesus answered and said unto him, Blessed art thou Simon Bar-Jonah (son of Jonah) for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven." Matt. xvi. 15–17. The Savior distinctly states here that his Father had revealed to Peter that great truth so clearly announced by him, viz, "Thou art the Christ the Son of the living God," and which Jesus then said was the ROCK, the foundation of his church; "and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell (gates of hades—Diaglott) shall not prevail against it." This is a declaration of Christ's ultimate triumph over death and the grave. Yes, Jesus said that great fact—that he was the Son of the living God—had been revealed to Peter by his Father, that is, doubtless, by his Father's Holy Spirit; for it is written, "no man can say that Jesus is the Lord but by the Holy Spirit." The Father had at that time revealed that most important truth, that Jesus was his "own Son"—his only begotten Son—to a number. There was no other way it could be known; for he was like his brethren, flesh and blood; and therefore, his physical looks or appearance, afforded no evidence of his wonderful origin and Fatherhood. Evidently Joseph and Mary kept the matter to themselves, and "pondered it in their hearts." Even had they told about the angel, and what he said, and all the circumstances, to their relatives and neighbors, it is not likely they would have been altogether credited. Doubtless no one could possibly judge from his physical looks, or from any external appearances, that he was the long promised Messiah — the long looked for Son of God. Hence he said to the Jews, "Ye neither know me nor my Father. If ye had known me, ye should have known my Father." John viii. 19. It is evident from the following, that right in the city of Nazareth where Jesus usually lived during the first thirty years of his life, they did not suspect that he was the Messiah; and although even in childhood it was said of him, "the child grew, and waxed strong in spirit, filled with wisdom: and the grace of God was upon him," and although he never once committed sin, yet for some reason, perhaps the overruling and controlling Power of the Father, his great superiority above other children and young men, seems not to have been generally noticed. For we are told that when he came into his own country and began on the Sabbath day to teach in the synagogue, "many hearing him were astonished saying, From whence hath this man these things? and what wisdom is this which is given unto him, that even such mighty works are wrought by his hands? Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary, the brother of James, and Juda, and Simon? and are not his sisters here with us? And they were offended at him." Mark vi.

Stray Thoughts.

A word to the household of faith in Michigan and elsewhere. I believe we are all satisfied that we are very near the end of this age. That being a fact do we realize the awful responsibility that is resting upon us. Let us halt, just for a moment, and consider eternity, eternity, eternity, its awful import. Each day we are making up the record and angels are keeping the books faithfully. The dear Father has committed great and precious truths to our trust. The present truths, the coming of the Lord, the resurrection of the just, the establishing of the kingdom of our Lord on this earth, the overthrow of Gentile power and the glorious restitution and restoration of Israel. Now there are thousands of ready hearts, willing to accept the truth and willing hands to work for it. Many are not satisfied with their condition and are perishing for lack of knowledge.

Now are we as a people doing all we can? If the Master should come to-morrow, could we look him in the face and say, I did all I could to save my fellow-men. If we were to see an individual sinking beneath the waves would we sit quietly down? No; we would exert ourselves to the utmost to save the drowning man. We would not scold him because he had not learned to swim, but we would hand him a rope, a plank, anything to save the man. Now there are millions just approaching the awful Niagara. The awful judgment is just at the door. Our study should be, how can I best work for the Lord? Not my ways, but thine, O Lord. Any way the Lord directs, if by any means we can save some. The command was, "Go work in my vineyard." But says one, I can't preach, I can't even talk in meeting, I can't do anything. Yes we all have a place in the Master's vineyard if we will only find it. Remember the one who had the one talent and how he buried it.

Some of the ways we can work. If we are in good health we can work just one day and get a dollar that will send THE RESTITUTION six months to some poor soul that is starving for the truth. Twenty-five cents will send it three months if we can't do that. Five cents will send "Words of Truth" for a year; just what a tumbler full of peanuts would cost. The Christian life is made up of little duties. Don't despise small things. The Master notices even a cup of cold water. Don't think because we can't do some big thing there is nothing for us to do. What we want is a spirit of sacrifice. I ask the question so often, "Do you take THE RESTITUTION?" No, I am not able; but I am able to buy tobacco and every other luxury that my worldly eyes crave.

What the cause wants is less theorizing, less talk, and more action. Let every one turn missionary. Watch sharp for opportunities and drop a tract or paper here and there. How many have been reached just by a stray RESTITUTION or a timely tract. Then let us keep close company with the Master. When we send a paper or tract on their errand of mercy ask God's blessing to accompany the silent preacher. Don't let us allow our brother or sister to carry our burden or do what we ought to do ourselves.

The terrible reckoning is just ahead. Will we be found wanting? And as we have just commenced on another eventful year, will we see how little we can do for the Master, or will we see how much we can do? We would not forget to ask one favor of God's faithful poor; it is not duty to do what we can't, the Lord don't require it; but one thing we can do, we can pray, and the prayers of a righteous man availeth much. God has chosen the poor of this world rich in faith, heirs of the kingdom. A faithful, consistent Christian is an excellent preacher. Dare we approach the rich? Will it do to look into the face of capital in this world-loving age. Yes, if a rich man fails to do his duty he will be damned as well as a poor man. One of the crying sins of the last days is covetousness; and the church is not clear in this matter. "Ye have heaped treasures together for the last days; your riches are corrupted and your garments are moth eaten; your gold and silver are cankered and the rust of them shall be a witness against you and shall eat your flesh as it were fire; ye have heaped treasure together for the last days." Your gold and silver will not be able to redeem you.

O, I can't do anything for the cause this year, and I am going to buy more land, so I can't do anything for years to come, or some enterprise shall have my last dollar. But there is a time coming when we must meet the Lord face to face. No excuse then. You loved the world more than me, I know you not. The evangelist has a strange experience. We would hardly think it possible that some poor drunken river-man would do more for the cause of truth than many well to do brethren do, but I have found this to be a fact in more instances than one.

Now brethren let us work this year as never before. Keep up the family altar, the prayer and social meetings, exhorting one another daily and so much the more as we see the day approaching. Satan is working with all signs and lying wonders, and if the church ever wanted true sacrifice and humility and devotion, it is now. The two great leading ideas are worldly-mindedness and infidelity. Our prayer is that God will save and protect his remnant church through the perils of the last days and present it clean and pure without spot or wrinkle or any such thing.

B. W. WOODWARD.

BLESSINGS OF THE MILLENNIAL REIGN.

The dominion which was originally given to man, and which is referred to in Psa. viii. 6, "Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands," but of which he was largely deprived through transgression, will be given back to him in the Millennial Age. In his epistle to the Hebrews, the apostle teaches that in the present state, all things are not subjected to man, but when he attains to that state in which he will rule with Christ, there will be nothing that is not subject to him.

The saints will be co-rulers with Christ, and will have a delegated sovereignty over the earth. "And he that overcometh, and he that keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give authority over the nations: and he shall rule them with a rod of iron, as the vessels of the potter are broken to shivers." "And they lived, and reigned with Christ a thousand years." Rev. ii. 26, 27; xx. 4. To rule with a rod of iron, observe, is not given to the church; this ruling does not belong to the present age; it will belong to the overcomers when the Christ shall claim as his own the kingdom of the world; and it implies a firm and strong rule, one that will show no favor to sin, one that will never connive at disobedience.

The saints will be constituted judges. "And judgment was given to the saints of the Most High." Dan. vii. 22. Professor Bush, who does not entertain the Millennarian view, and whose opinion, therefore, may be considered by some the more impartial, gives the meaning of judging. Remarking on Rev. xx. 4, he says, "Numerous passages to the same effect might be readily adduced, from which the inference can scarcely fail to be drawn, that by judgment being given to those that sat on the thrones, is meant, that they received authority to reign and govern, or the right of executing judgment according to the Hebrew sense of the word 'judge,' which is equivalent to that of 'reigning,' or putting forth the judicial and executive acts of the governing powers." We infer that judicial action will be taken upon some during the Millennial reign, from Isa. lx. and lxv. and Zech. xiv.

The worship and service of God will then be in purity; men will not come before him with feigned words; they will not dissemble, or attempt to conceal any thing, or come before him with any false pretences upon their lips, or perform service from an impure motive. "For then will I turn to the peoples a pure language, that they may all call upon the name of the Lord, to serve him with one consent." Zeph. iii. 9.

There will no divisions; even a oneness of opinion will exist. "The voice of thy watchmen! they lift up the voice, together do they sing: for they shall see eye to eye, when the Lord returneth to Zion." Isa. iii. 8.

There shall be a restoration of judges and counsellors who shall be righteous. "And I will restore thy judges as at the first, and thy counsellors as at the beginning: afterward thou shalt be called The city of righteousness, the faithful city. Zion shall be redeemed with judgment, and her converts with righteousness." Isa. i. 26. See also chap. xxxii. 1.

There will be a universal knowledge of God. No more will be heard from a vanished atheism, "For the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." Isa. xi. 9.

There shall also be among Israel universal righteousness. "Awake, awake, put on thy strength; put on thy beautiful garments, O Jerusalem, the Holy City: for henceforth there shall no more come into thee the uncircumcised and the unclean." Isa. lii. 1.

In the Millennium men will live to a wonderful old age. "For as the days of a tree shall be the days of my people, and my chosen shall long enjoy the work of their hands." Isa. lxv. 22. From the 20th verse it would appear that there will be no death at all among infants: that when a man dies at the age of a hundred years, he will be looked upon simply as a child, owing to the great age which men will generally reach. It is true the words in Isa. xxxiii. 24, "And the inhabitant shall not say, I am sick," seem to intimate that there will be no death; but they may mean that there will be no sickness in the form of disease; that health will be the universal rule, so that when men do die, it will be either from very old age, or as the punishment of transgression. Death will be a rare thing, but some will die. There will be death in the nations around, which we infer from Zech. xiv. 18. There is also a passage in Jer. xxxi. 29, 30, which is very explicit. "In those days they shall say no more, The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge. But every one shall die for his own iniquity: every man that eateth the sour grapes, his teeth shall be set on edge." The expression, "those days," must refer to the days of the Millennium, for since the days of our first parents until now, death comes upon all men as a sequence of Adam's sin. We all die in Adam, the apostle teaches. The righteous and the unrighteous, tens of thousands of infants and children as well as old people die for the sin of Adam; for he was the representative of the race. But during the Millennium, those who die shall die for their own sin. In the Millennial age, death, as the result of Adam's sin, will be done away; but it will exist as the result of personal sin. It is when the thousand years' reign has closed, and the judgments of the great white throne has come, that a complete end will be put to the power of death. After a description of the judgment, it is said, "And death and Hades were cast into the lake of fire." Rev. xx. 14.

Such will be some of the blessings of the Millennial reign of Christ, and until his reign is inaugurated, these blessings will never be enjoyed. Sin having entered into the world, and a terrible curse having followed sin, which has set all creation groaning, specially man, the Divine purpose in creation cannot be completed till the restoration takes place. In permitting sin, God has taught mankind the weakness of human nature to resist temptation. In permitting self-rule and unjust government and oppression, he has taught men their lack of wisdom and their want of fitness and disposition to rule in righteousness. He is thus preparing men to appreciate the government of the Christ when that government shall be established.

SILAS HENN.

The household of faith at this place will celebrate the Lord's Supper at our house two miles South of Attica, Kansas, on Thursday evening, April, 7th, 1887. All that can do so, are cordially invited to be present to celebrate with us. This may be the last opportunity this side of the kingdom. We soon, if faithful, will be permitted to enter the kingdom and share the glory and honor that awaits the child of God. Then let not any worldly care prevent us from keeping all God's requirements. They are intended to prepare us for that great and glorious work and for the high and exalted position that awaits the faithful few. Come one and all. S. C. OGDEN.

Any one sending us a new subscriber for 1887, and the subscription price of $2.00, may select books or tracts to the amount of 75 cents from our list, and they will be sent them free, postpaid. Sample copies of THE RESTITUTION furnished on application.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXVI. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, MARCH 9, 1887. NO. 10.

THE RESTITUTION

Terms—TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

Payable strictly in advance. Three and six Months in proportion.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The Restitution is devoted to the restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began. As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on this earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints of God's elect with him in the dominion of the universe; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous; and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief in the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for this salvation.

MONUMENTS AND THE BIBLE.

The Saturday Review in its notice of Captain Conder's "Syrian Stone Lore," says: "It has been contended by some of the German critics that the country ruled over by the kings of Israel and Judah was, at the best, poor and barbarous. There are, however, three monuments of recent discovery which distinctly prove the contrary. The Moabite Stone shows that the Moabite people built fortresses, palaces, towers and bridges, and that they could write. Is it likely that the kings of Samaria and Jerusalem should have ruled, in their own country, over a people less advanced than the subjects of King Mesha in wealth, power and knowledge? Again, Sennacherib records in his account of the siege of Jerusalem that Hezekiah sent him a tribute of 30 talents of gold, 800 talents of silver, precious stones, a chain of ivory, elephants' hides, elephants' tusks, rare woods, eunuchs, singing men and singing women. Therefore, it is fair to suppose, the kings of Jerusalem traded with Egypt, were rich enough to buy all kinds of precious things, cultivated music, and had considerable trains of slaves. The Siloam inscription, also, of an immense epigraphic and philological importance, proves by the form of its letters and their differences from the Phœnician and Moabite forms, how long the people must have possessed the art of writing. For the arguments by which Captain Conder seeks to establish the antiquity of the Pentateuch the reader must be referred to the work. They are new, startling, and wholly derived from those external discoveries which belong to the last fifteen years.

The following is Captain Conder's own summary of what we should know concerning the Hebrews had the Bible never been written at all:

1. The Hebrews were a people of common stock with the Canaanites, Moabites of Mesopotamia, but separated from them at an early historic period.

2. They worshiped Jehovah at least as early as 900 B. C., and probably much earlier.

3. They possessed the art of monumental writing, and an alphabet of common origin with that of Phœnicia and Moab some centuries before 700 B. C., and possibly as early as 1,600 B. C.

4. They were pastoral agriculturists, craftsmen and traders. They possessed horses and chariots, flocks and herds, fenced cities and villages.

5. The Hebrew monarchs were attended by slaves and musicians, made use of ivory thrones, and had treasures of gold, silver and precious stones, precious woods and other articles of foreign origin. They defied at times even the Assyrian kings, and allied themselves with Egyptians and Babylonians.

6. The Hebrews had a non-Assyrian calendar, and thus probably some knowledge of astronomy.

7. It is probable that Hebrew literature was preserved in records written on papyrus and leather, but the knowledge of writing seems to have been confined to the Scribes, and it was not extensively employed for sepulchral or other monumental purposes.

8. In civilization there is every reason to suppose the Hebrews equalled their immediate neighbors, the Phœnicians, although perhaps not attaining to the condition of the Egyptians.

9. They buried their dead in rocky tombs without embalming, and there is no monumental evidence that they expected any resurrection of the mortal body so buried.

10. Their art seems to have approached that of the early Babylonian age, their buildings being adorned with metals and woods, while there is no evidence of the general cultivation of sculpture among them.

The value of these results, as Captain Conder points out, lies chiefly in their refutation of the destructive school. It should be noted that these conclusions are in perfect accord with the picture of Hebrew society which may be drawn from the Books of Kings.

ALTHOUGH the storm has not burst upon the Eastern world, the clouds are growing darker and more threatening from day to day. New complications are arising in Bulgaria, and Russian hatred is becoming more and more intensified toward Germany, while it is said that "the popularity of France is becoming a sort of violent epidemic in Russia." From what we learn, we should not be surprised to hear that Russia had entered upon two great forward movements: one across the Danube into Bulgaria toward Constantinople, and the other into Central Asia toward the British possessions in the South of that continent. Time will soon show the correctness or incorrectness of these surmises.

IN another column will be found an obituary of a distinguished writer on the subject of Conditional Immortality, J. H. Pettingell. Many of our readers have become familiar with his name through the perusal of his different works on the all-important theme of Eternal Life only through our Lord Jesus Christ. No American writer has treated the subject of human destiny with more ability and comprehensiveness. With a masterly grasp of this question, as it is set forth in the Scriptures, with an accurate acquaintance with its theological treatment pro and con by opposing writers, and with a thorough knowledge of several languages both ancient and modern, he was enabled to present his ideas in forcible logic, as well as in a style at once impressive, convincing, and pleasing. About five years ago we met him in Philadelphia, and had some personal conversation with him for a short time on three different occasions. Incidentally the subject of the interpretation of prophecy, in regard to the difference of opinion entertained as to its fulfilment in the coming age, came up for a few remarks; and our lamented brother observed that his time had been so completely occupied in studies and investigations on the theme of future life, that he had not been able to give as much thought to Millennarian questions as he might otherwise have done. No one, who reads his works, will regret that he pursued the very course that he did. It is far better for the cause of Christ that he has treated the questions concerning human destiny in the exhaustive manner they are treated in his several works, than to have treated several subjects imperfectly and, therefore, in an unsatisfactory manner. We believe that it may be confidently affirmed that his works will do more to correct the gross errors entertained on the destiny of man than those of any other individual who has lived in this nineteenth century. During the last few years we have sent him THE RESTITUTION.

To the Church of God in Christ Jesus—Greeting.

And with many such parables spake he the word unto them as they were able to hear it. And without a parable spoke he not unto them: but privately unto his own disciples he expounded all things. Mark iv. 33, 34. R. V.

The above text embodies a few thoughts which, if taken in connection with other Scriptures may reflect upon them a new and clearer light.

The parties here referred to whom our Lord addressed in parables evidently were the Jews, his own people, for he came not, nor did he preach to, or teach the Gentiles. The figures of speech, or parables, which he used to illustrate his teachings to the multitudes who followed him, he expounded or explained to his own disciples. Many of these explanations are given for our instruction, though some are not but are left for us to study, to search into and to compare Scripture with Scripture, that we may thus learn to harmonize the united teachings of our divine Lord, with the teachings of those to whom he sent the Comforter, to bring to their remembrance all things which he had told them before ascending to his Father.

We should be careful not to go beyond reason in the application of this statement—"and without a parable spake he not unto them." This, it seems most reasonable to suppose referred only to his public lectures or his instructions to the multitudes. Hence we are not to infer that when his hearers were moved to ask questions, either with a desire for increase of knowledge, or for the purpose of "entangling him in his talk," that he replied to such enquiries by parables. Although, we know, at times he answered their foolish and designing questions by asking other questions, that so clearly demonstrated their fallacy as to hush them to silence. See Matt. xx. 33.

In Luke xx. 27, the Sadducees who denied a resurrection came to Jesus thinking they had a case to present that would either totally vanquish the doctrine of the resurrection or else introduce such a state of confusion into the future state as to render it very undesirable. They wished to know whose wife the woman would be in the resurrection state, who had married successively "seven brothers." This was a direct question, involving the entire basis of faith in, and hope for, future life. No illustration was necessary. Nothing but the plain statement of divine truth regarding the future state, and the subjects who would be deemed worthy to enter that state, by or through a resurrection from the dead.

They said to Jesus, verse 33, "In the resurrection therefore whose wife shall she be, for the seven had her to wife? Jesus said unto them, The sons of this age marry and are given in marriage; but they that are accounted worthy to attain to that age, and the resurrection from the dead neither marry nor are given in marriage, for neither can they die any more, for they are equal unto the angels, and are sons of God being sons of the resurrection. Of this answer to the Sadducees' question certain of the Scribes said, "Teacher thou hast well said, For they durst not any more ask him any question."

Now if this answer as to the subject of the resurrection state, and their condition when having attained to that state, was sufficient to silence the unbelieving Sadducees, ought not the same answer which is recorded for our instruction be sufficient to satisfy us on this vital question of our faith and hope? What more need we to ask or to know? They who shall be accounted worthy of a resurrection can die no more. They will be equal unto the angels. They will be the sons of God, for the fact of the resurrection constitutes them the sons of God. Christ was the firstborn from the dead, and he dieth no more, as he is so shall we also be. He was declared to be the Son of God with power by the spirit of holiness through a resurrection from the dead. He was the "first fruits," and those who come after will be of the same nature. We who believe in him, when the sleep of death is ended shall awake and rise to life immortal.

The whole tenor of the book goes to show that through the Christ alone cometh life beyond the grave. "He that hath the Son (by faith), hath the life. He that hath not the Son hath not the life." 1 John v. 12. The life here referred to now will dispute is the future life, "the life to come." 1 Tim. iv. 8. To him, the Christ, was given power over death. Death is the wages of sin. Future life is the gift of God through faith in his only begotten Son Jesus the Christ. Hence, those who fail to accept by faith this most precious gift of God, cannot see the life that is in Christ only, and so we read the wrath of God abideth on them. John iii. 36. They are dead, they shall not live, (margin); the dead live not, the deceased rise not, therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them and made all their memory to perish, Isa. xxvi. 14.

There are many who do not yet see the truth on the Scripture doctrine, yet it seems plain if the light only be let in. Our orthodox friends try to prove a future life out of Christ by quoting from Luke xvi., and insist that the rich man had a life after death and that life was full of misery. There who claim to have come out from the errors of paganism, and laid aside all Popish dogmas, will just as freely quote John v. 28, 29 and insist that all that are in their graves shall hear his voice and come forth, they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil into the resurrection of judgment.

By studying this Scripture closely in connection with Luke xx. 27, etc., we cannot but see that it is parabolic, illustrative, not literal. Those who are literally dead in literal graves cannot hear, neither will the sons of God —of resurrection—rise to shame and contempt. In Ezek. xxxvii. we have a parable from the prophet, very much like that of John v. In his vision of the valley of dry bones, the bones are represented as talking one to the other. This we know could not be literal any more than that the dead could hear. Vs. 11, "Then said he unto me, these bones are the whole house of Israel. Behold they say our bones are dried up, our hope is lost, we are clean cut off. Therefore prophesy and say unto them, thus saith the Lord God, behold, I will open your graves and cause you to come up out of your graves, O my people; and I will bring you into the land of Israel. And ye shall know that I am the Lord when I have opened your graves and caused you to come up out of your graves, O my people, saith the Lord."

The same thought is presented in Dan. xii. 2. And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life and some to shame and everlasting abhorrence. These parables have special reference to Israel as a nation. We know that nationally she has long been sleeping in the dust of earth, i. e., having no national life. But, glory to be to Israel's God, the clouds of her long dark night are beginning to scatter. The first streaks of Israel's dawning morn may be seen in the Orient and soon the gladsome, thrilling message will go forth unto her, "Shake thyself from the dust, arise and sit thee down, O Jerusalem. The bands of thy neck are loosed, O captive daughter of Zion." Isa. lii. 2.

PHELPS, Mo., Jan. 16, 1887.

Editor Restitution:

Your readers will doubtless remember that Brother P. Finn, of Carthage, Mo., and the writer, left an appointment, in December, 1885, at the Scott school house, in the vicinity of Ash Grove, to be filled at about the same time in the ensuing year, and to redeem that promise we met there on the evening of Dec. 3, 1886, to continue over ten days. We found some just as strong in the faith, so far as they were instructed, (if not stronger) than when we took the parting hand the year before. And, we think, taking into consideration the prejudice that is generally entertained towards Bible truths that are unadulterated with tradition or philosophy, that the interest is deep and lasting, but how many will confess Christ before men we must leave to the future to determine. The congregation was not so large as last year, but we had the same one about all the time, which I think is better than a large one which is continually changing, for the work is more thorough. There was some sickness in the vicinity which doubtless kept some away. I sent you three subscribers to THE RESTITUTION, and also sent Brother Donaldson three to the Book and Words of Truth, which I hope will be the means of more effective work than the humble efforts of the scribe.

Brother Thomason came out during the meeting, and was inducted into the sacred name of Christ by the assistance of Brother Finn. He has assumed a great obligation to which I shall ever pray that he may prove faithful, for many are called, but few chosen; and as he was a member of the Congregational church at Everton, pressure may be brought to bear upon him to lead him back to his old love. There are some others which I think will be willing and ready before long to sacrifice all and follow Christ. That he will watch over and keep them unto eternal life and administer unto them an abundant entrance into his everlasting kingdom is all my desire.

Now I want to say a few words about the people. All with whom we came in contact treated us as well as we desire to be treated, and we extend our sincere thanks to Mr. Stephenson and his very kind family for their hospitality and assistance by singing during the meeting. Sister Myers and her husband were the same as of yore, free and generous, to a fault. Sister Guthrie, of the Seventh Day Adventists, entertained us royally whenever we went, and we have a standing invitation to her home when we choose to accept it. There is Mr. Boyd and his amiable wife, and many others to whom we are indebted for their efforts to make us happy while we were with them. That God will bless them and return a hundred fold is my prayer. Brother Finn preached in the Shiloh school house on his way up and at the Mountain on the way down, to crowded houses, and I think the discourse was the most complete thing I ever heard, and was well handled. He is a workman who needs not be ashamed. We desire the prayers of the brotherhood that we may continue faithful unto the end, and receive a crown of life.

TEMPERANCE.

And to my view the rum-shop appears,
Where the vases of dire misery swell;
How it cleans "cross the seas of tumultuous years,
The horrible flight-house of hell!

RUIN, SLOW BUT SURE.

Alcohol does not destroy its victims, in most cases, suddenly, as in the dead sleep of profound intoxication or in the wild maniacal ravings of delirium tremens. By slow and measured steps, in most cases by inducing cirrhosis of the liver, Bright's disease of the kidneys, amaurosis, apoplexy, nervous insomnia, pessimistic gout, defective vision, fatty degeneration of the heart, arterial and muscular system, which finally end in paralysis, imbecility and insanity, alcohol encircles its victims in iron clasp and everlasting ruin. Without doubt alcohol occasions a vast amount of disease, and carries death, destruction, dishonor and shame into thousands of happy homes. Alcohol is at the bottom of a large proportion of the crimes committed. Alcohol dethrones reason and poisons the fountains of sentiment and morals, and is even more destructive upon the moral and intellectual nature than upon the physical organism of man.

THE ROBSELLER'S WORK.

I have a loathing, I have a thorough disgust for the gewgaws of rum-bought wealth, says Wendell Phillips. When I go into the horse cars and smell the foul stench of liquor, when I go into the streets and find the same, I see behind me that brown-stone mansion on our Neck, built of rum, and behind that again I see the pallid faces, shivering forms and flattering rags of a numberless host. And I would have had one of the daughters of the owner of that mansion stand by at the door and watch her father's victims, as they march into the dock of the police court every day. I would take another child, and the police should lead her through all the dark alleys and passages where broken-hearted mothers, and children without parents or food, attest to the manner in which her parent made his money. Intemperance cannot be cured by legislation or sermons. The tamseller is the root of the evil, and until it is made a crime to sell intoxicating beverages, intemperance will continue to exist.

DRINK AND THE GAOLS.

Four-fifths of all the inmates of American gaols, penitentiaries and reformatories, are brought there directly or indirectly by strong drink. There are 500,000 of these criminals in the United States today; every institution is full of them, and the number is rapidly increasing. Then there are 800,000 insane persons, idiots, helpless inebriates and paupers in the poor houses and charitable institutions of the country, costing the tax-payers $100,000,000 per annum. But this is not all. No pen but the recording angel's is able truthfully to portray the sorrow that is inflicted upon loving hearts by the infernal habit of drinking stimulants. No class is so high in the social scale that it is not dragged down by it, and no class is so poor and degraded that it is not made more inhuman and miserable by it. A drunken parent bestows a curse upon his offspring, even to a third and fourth generation. Science shows how vice of any kind vitiates the blood, and although it may skip one generation, it is certain to crop out further down the stream. A dead drunkard often reaches out his hand from the grave, and, with his skeleton finger, palsies the brains of his descendants, and sends them jabbering idiots to the insane asylum to be supported by charity.

THE OUTLOOK.

There has been a very large concentration of troops upon the frontier lately, and all the movements have been conducted in the quietest manner possible, and with an evident desire to maintain secrecy. Not a particle of fuss nor display has been in the Paris streets. Now and then long lines of soldiery have been noticed marching silently, but the people have almost ostentatiously avoided any notice of the regiments. If there do occur at any subsequent period during the spring or summer, any such manifestations as those of the midsummer of 1870 I shall be greatly mistaken. Every worthy citizen now feels the pressure of war directly upon himself; there is no longer a professional army which is dispatched to the frontier and cheered to the echo as it goes away. Every home and every heart is touched. The trading class itself, once so selfish and so willing to urge on the military party to undertake campaigns, this time is wise because it is itself a part of the army. If the change in sentiment which has been going on for a week becomes more pronounced there may be public manifestations, but they will be in good order and for a definite purpose.—Paris Letter.

FRANCE'S STRENGTH.

France is at present stronger than Germany suspects, than perhaps she herself knows. If goaded into a national struggle, it is quite on the cards she will display a strength and heroism that will surpass all that it has recorded to her glory. The Frenchmen may fight like furies among themselves, over forms of government, over political programmes, alliances and budgets, but no chink will be found in their united front opposed to an adversary who shared his triumph in 1871 by picking the very bones of his captive, and it would be well for the Germans to look back on that dark period. It was not the French nation that declared war against Germany, for the people were not represented in the Corps Legislatif; but the nation soon perceived that they had an affair, not with a generous adversary, but with a power resolved to wipe them out as a nation in Europe. They fought against terrible odds; it was a contest between the scientifically equipped and the disintegrated, and despite the absence of cohesion, of strategetical homogeneity, the French in their raw legions, material and mal-armed, maintained to the close the military spirit of their race unbroken.

Though Sedan and Metz had deprived France of almost all her officers, there was no lack of evidence that the hastily raised and untrained levies, wherever led by men of noble heart or undoubted capacity, were able to hold their own against the veterans of Prince Frederick Charles. The French troops are now well officered, and there is no reason, should the opportunity unhappily arrive, why the Third Republic might not also to recreate its Hoche, its Marceau its Kleber and its Desaix.

FRANCE'S WAR PIGEONS.

Gen. Boulanger has recently given prizes to the best trainers of carrier-pigeons in the Department of the Seine. Pigeon-training in France has become a branch of the military service, and plenty of well-trained birds are to be found in the comfy and beautiful little establishments that have been built for them. They are furnished with modern improvements and luxuries that vulgar and ignorant pigeons could never appreciate. Among the pigeons now in the possession of the Government are several veterans of the siege of Paris, and one among them is a genuine old hero. In 1870 this bird was taken up in the Paris balloon called the Virgo, and was captured by the Prussians. Prince Frederick Charles sent him a present to his mother, the Princess Charles of Prussia, who put him among her own collection of birds, where he was treated with all possible kindness. But he was a patriot. The bitter bread of exile did not agree with him. He flew away and reached his home in the pigeon-house in the Boulevard Clichy. The owner of this establishment handed him over to the military authorities, and he is now once more in the service of his native country, and doubtless hopes to win additional glory in the future.

COWEN.—At Georgetown, Col., Feb. 7, 1887. Gertie Cowen, daughter of John and Jennie Cowen, aged six years, nine months, and seven days.

Little Gertie was born in Golden City, Col., May 1, 1880. She was very delicate during her stay with us on this earth, but was never really sick until just before her death which was caused by scarlet fever. At five years of age she was attending the Sisters' school, and on attaining the age of six she was sent to the public school where she learned very rapidly for one so young. On Thursday, Feb. 3, she came home apparently in the best of health and seemingly as well as ever. She partook of a hearty dinner and then went back to school. About three o'clock that afternoon she complained of feeling ill, and returning home she put her little head in her dear mamma's lap, and looking up into that maternal face with that innocent expression so characteristic with a child, she said, "Mamma, I am afraid I am going to die, I am so sick." She grew worse and worse and ere she bid us all good bye for the last time in this life, she put her little arms around her mamma's neck and said, "Don't cry mamma, I am getting better," she meant better off. As the sullen hand of death was fast coiling her to its fond embrace, her last moments were passed very peacefully; not a struggle seemed to writhe her little tender frame. This little lifeless lump of clay was deposited in its windowless palace of repose Golden. Many kind friends in Golden attended the last sad rites. She now lies by the side of her little brother, there to rest till Jesus Christ shall be revealed from heaven.

A LONG AND ACTIVE LIFE.

Death Terminates the Labors of John H. Pettingell.

John Hancock Pettingell died at a quarter after eight o'clock, Feb 27, 1887, at 629 Chapel street, at the age of seventy-two years. For the last six or eight months he had been suffering from an incurable complaint that is characterized by Dr. Sanford, his physician, as a "chronic inflammation of the stomach and bowels complicated by one or more tumors." These troubles had been for some days accompanied by hemorrhages. He leaves a widow and one daughter.

Mr. Pettingell was an author of distinction, having written on theological subjects, many works that have reached large sales, particularly in the western states, in England and on the continent. These works belong to the school known as progressive theology. He maintained the doctrine of eternal life only in Christ, which he held to be the one taught in the Scriptures and the doctrine of the early Christian church until it became corrupted by Platonism. Some of his books have been translated into German, Italian and other European languages. He is esteemed in England as one of the brightest and most vigorous writers on his side of theology. Edward White of London, president of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, in one his most ardent admirers and has written introductions to one or two of his works.

Mr. Pettingall wrote the Homiletical Index, a reference book for clergymen, "The Theological Trilemma," "Platonism vs. Christianity," "Bible Terminology," "The Life Everlasting," "The Unspeakable Gift," "Views and it views in Eschatology," and other well known productions.

His advanced views did not at first meet with recognition or acceptance, and he suffered in consequence financial embarrassment, religious persecution and some social ostracism. His works, with the exception of the Homiletical Index, treat of conditional immortality, against the commonly accepted theory, and in favor of the death of the soul. He had great difficulty in getting his books printed, owing to public and clerical opposition, but his ideas are gaining ground and his publications now have a ready sale, his "Unspeakable Gift" having reached several editions. A new edition of this work—6,000 copies—is soon to be issued by F. M. Atwood of Chicago, Ill., and several others of his admirers, and they intend to distribute several hundred copies gratuitously, placing the others on sale at a low price. His writings are not as well known in this part of the country as they are elsewhere, as his views are not so well understood. He had at the time of his death a large following, devotedly attached to him, and during the last few weeks of his life he was in constant receipt of letters from friends and converts in this country, and in Europe. He was greatly esteemed by all who knew him personally or were familiar with his works as a singularly vigorous and convincing writer and deep thinker. In England his books have reached several editions, having been extensively republished; "and there," said one of his friends recently, "clergymen and members of both the Independent and established churches are fast coming to his lines of thought and belief."

He was born at Manchester, Vt., May 11, 1815, was educated at Yale in the class of '37 and was a classmate of Morrison R. Waite, and Professor Chester S. Lyman of this city, the latter of whom was a life-long friend of the deceased. After a course at the Union Theological seminary in New York city, Mr. Pettingell was a professor in the Deaf and Dumb Institute, New York, until 1843. He was pastor of the Congregational church in South Dennis, Mass., from 1843 to 1847 in Saybrook, Conn., from 1847 to 1853. He was, after this, district secretary of the American Board of Foreign Missions and resided at Albany. He next visited the missions of the A. B. F. M. in Servia, Turkey and Greece. Returning, he settled in Saxonville, Mass., where he remained from 1860 to 1863; was in Westbrook, Conn., from 1863 to 1866. In 1866 he became chaplain of the Seamen's Friend Society stationed at Antwerp, Belgium, and remained there till 1872.

During the six years he resided in Europe he traveled extensively in behalf of the American Seamen's Friend Society. He was publicly thanked by the Belgian government for his devotion to the sick during the prevalence of the cholera in 1866. His last work, "Views and Reviews in Eschatology," was a collection of his latest essays, but he leaves a large number of others unpublished, and which will probably be collected and printed by his friends. He was married twice. His first wife was Rebecca S. Parker of Falmouth, Mass., whom he married in 1845. In 1863 he married Jennie Copeland, daughter of the mayor of Brooklyn, L. I. He had two children, both by his first marriage—Llewellyn, who was born June 3, 1852, and died in December, 1880, and Louisa C., who was born April 6, 1856 and who is now a teacher in one of the grammar schools of New York city. In 1872 he returned to this country and resided for a time in New York, afterwards removing to Philadelphia, where most of his books and essays were written and where, about eight months ago, he was attacked by his insidious and fatal malady. He is spoken of by those who knew him as a Christian gentleman whose noble traits of character had endeared him to all he met and whose vigorous writing had made enthusiastic proselytes throughout Christendom.—New Haven Daily Palladium.

Publisher's Notes.

On Thursday, Mar. 3, 1887, we received the following letter:

MILWAUKEE, WIS.

MR. A. R. UNDERWOOD,

Publisher Restitution,

DEAR SIR: — Mrs. R. Tuttle, formerly of Chicago, now residing in Erie, Ill., wishes me to remit to you, for her, the sum of $100, as a donation to your paper, which she prizes very highly. Her age (eighty-two years) prevents her writing to you personally.

Respectfully Yours,

E. P. MATTHEWS.

A draft for the amount was enclosed, for which we promptly receipted. This generous donation by our aged Sister, will be used as she would wish, in sending our paper to those known by us to be too poor to pay for it—the Lord's poor—and in scattering books and tracts wherever the way seems open for doing good. Thank you, Sister Tuttle, for thus assisting us in our work of spreading the glad tidings of the soon coming of Jesus Christ.

We wish to say, for the benefit of all concerned, that no "sinking fund" exists at this office, but every dollar entrusted to our care is, to the very best of our ability, immediately set at work in the Master's vineyard. Every one now connected with THE RESTITUTION, is paid for his labor, and requires no donations. It is the Lord's work we are engaged in, and any aid for his cause will be judiciously expended.

Bro. H. R. Carter writes that he will soon start from Centropolis, Franklin Co., Kansas, for Sumner Co., Kansas, traveling by buggy, and asks that any one wishing his labors along the route write him immediately at Centropolis, Kan. Bro. Carter has sample copies of THE RESTITUTION to distribute, and is authorized to receive subscription for our paper.

---

"A Lover of Truth" sends us 30 cents to send tracts to J. Spence of India. The same is hereby acknowledged, as no name was signed to the letter.

---

We have secured a supply of Cruden's Concordance, and can supply all who wish this Standard aid to Bible research. See advertisement in another column.

---

Brother J. H. Pettingell's latest work—"Views and Reviews in Eschatology"—is placed on our book list this week. All who have read this author's other works should lose no time in securing this his last work. It contains 500 pages, divided into thirty different divisions, and without detracting in the least from other noble efforts, we consider this the "cream" of our lamented brother's literary labor. See advertisement elsewhere.

Do you want tracts to distribute? Read the list under our Pound Package offer. For only Sixty Cents you can get reading matter enough to set several hundred people studying. You can sow the seed—God will give the increase. If you cannot send the money, secure a new subscriber for THE RESTITUTION, and you may order 1½ pounds of these tracts for every new name you send for a year.

---

We are ready to receive orders for Bro. J. P. Weethee's new book—The Eastern Question in its various phases, which is about ready for delivery. The price of this work will be $3.50, or we will send the two—Coming Age, and Eastern Question—for $3.00.

---

Any one sending us 4 new subscriber for 1887, and the subscription price of $2.00, may select books or tracts to the amount of 75 cents from our list, and they will be sent them free, post paid. Sample copies of THE RESTITUTION furnished on application.

OH! WEEP FOR THOSE.

Oh! weep for those who wept by Babel's stream,
Whose shrines are desolate, whose land, a dream!
Weep for the harp of Judah's broken shell;
Mourn—where their God hath dwelt, the godless dwell.

And where shall Israel lave her bleeding feet?
And where shall Zion's song again seem sweet?
And Judah's melody once more rejoice
The hearts that trop'd before its heavenly voice?

Tribes of the wandering foot and weary breast,
How shall ye flee away and be at rest!
The wild dove hath her nest, the fox his cave,
Mankind their country—Israel but the grave!

"THE CHURCH OF GOD."

The word "Church," like many others in our language, is somewhat the worse for the wear; nevertheless, when stripped of the excrescences that have become attached to it, it is simple and pure. It claims to be derived from a word which signifies "to call," or "call out." It simply means, therefore, the called out, without respect to the person or matter which called them out. Every one of the called out has obeyed the call.

Demetrius, the silversmith to the godess Diana, called out his fellow craftsmen, and collected a crowd, to protect themselves from the preaching of Paul. This was the church of Demetrius, and not a bad type of many churches that have been collected together since that time. The church of God is composed of those who have been called out by him from the rest of mankind. The call is a special one, and wholly in the interests of the invited, or called out; for they are all perishing, through their own disobediences of previous calls made by Jehovah. This call is named "the good news," or, "glad tidings," and sometimes called "the glad tidings of the kingdom of God," because it is an invitation to men without inheritance, without life, and without behavior worthy of any of these things, to change from their foolish practices and serve him. This call is likened to a king who made a marriage for his son, and sent out his servants to invite his special friends to the marriage feast. Every circumstance connected with this call is favorably to its being well received. Man is created for society: his chief enjoyment is found in friendship. An invitation to a feast is what is never refused if it be possible to attend, and to a marriage feast there is a still greater inducement to go; and again, the marriage of a king's son gives the concentration of all the inducements to the invited to make sure of their presence. It must be apparent at a glance, that the invited are really the most highly favored by the invitor. The call is to glory and honor in the palace of the King, and to the full enjoyment of his friendship. Friendship and fellowship with the Sovereign of the whole earth is implied upon the face of the invitation; or, the call. Along with the call, the intimation comes, that the Sovereign of men has arranged a day, or set time, to judge them in righteousness, by his Son, after the marriage takes place. This will be the most extraordinary revelation of the Sovereign which has ever been made to mankind; for his Son is to judge the living and the dead at the time of his appearing, and as he enters upon his reign for the subduing of all things to the will of the Sovereign.

We do not suppose that to judge the living and the dead means simply to rule the living and the dead; as the dead, so long as they are so, are incapable of being affected by what is done to, or for, them. The living comprises all ranks and conditions of men, and the dead does the very same. The living of today stand related to every revelation of the Sovereign will which he has made up till this present time, and the dead do the same up till the day of their death. The living today classify themselves by their attitude to the generous call of the King. There is no reason for thinking that in the first instance he will make any change in this respect, as we are assured that "every one will give an account of himself;" that is, of why he acts as he has done up to the time of judgment. If all the living and dead were good, or bad, no judgment could be needed, excepting determining the degrees of goodness or badness. But we are assured that "those who have done good shall come forth to a resurrection of life, and those who have done evil to the resurrection of condemnation." Thus we are told, that doing good or doing evil forms the ground of classification. Nothing could be fairer than this, seeing actions cannot deceive. The actions are the fruits, and bad actions cannot be found in a good man any more than bad fruit can be found upon a good tree. The Sovereign's revelation of his will, when believed and obeyed, invariably makes a man good just as the rejection of his will makes the rejecter bad. Thus the revelation of the Sovereign forms the basis, or starting ground, for the judgment of the living and the dead. In this there is a foreshadowing of gradation among the good, in the giving of five talents to one, two to another, and one to another. The possessor of the five gives an account of himself, and of himself only, and is judged and rewarded accordingly; and so of the others. The one who received the one talent did evil, inasmuch as he hid it, and thus prevented his neighbors from knowing that he was in possession of his master's goods.

This parable sufficiently illustrates the existence of two classes among those who were entrusted by the Master with his goods. There is no attempt to deny responsibility, except in his estimate of the character of his master, and this excuse is in itself the ground of his condemnation. "Thou knewest," said the Lord. His own confession was the only ground of his condemnation. This is not the case of a rejecter of his Lord's jurisdiction over him, but of a disobedient servant. He was present, along with the other two, as his talent was taken from him and given to him that had the ten.

We have thus two distinct classes among the servants.

But the Lord, in the instructions given to his disciples, said: "He that believeth not shall be condemned." Here is a class that shall be condemned. They are represented as those who despised the favor of the Sovereign, and said, "We will not have this man to reign over us." They themselves have chosen the portion of despisers, who wander and perish against the good will of the Sovereign. There is another class, who have persecuted unto death those who bore to them the Sovereign's message. In any righteous judgment these will be classified according to the intelligence they had, for it is a righteous thing with God to recompense tribulation to the troublers of his called out ones, when he gives rest to the troubled. This, also, is described as "the time when he will take vengeance upon those who know not God, and on those who obey not his call to repentance to life."

The Church of God is therefore that company of people who have obeyed his invitation to glory, honor, and immortality. In its aggregate it embraces all in every age, until the call is withdrawn. In its details it comprises those in every place who have separated themselves in obedience to the call, whether few or many, and under whatever organization. For it is the Church, or called out ones, who make the organization; and not the organization that makes the Church. If he who has called them out be God, then those who have obeyed his call are his church; whereas, if persons are called by any other being or system, they are simply the church of the system or person which they have obeyed.

Today the market-place of the world is full of callers, shouting all sorts of discordant sounds. The results of these callings are as varied as the voices. There are thus churches many and callers many. It is surely vain to call all those called out, the called out of God; unless we affirm that he is the author of all the different contradictory calls.

There is only one marriage to take place, and only one bride, one set of virgin attendants, one King, and one King's Son. Whence, then, have come all these different companies? They themselves speedily make answer, for each caller has the object of his supreme devotion inscribed upon the banner he carries. He classifies himself, and in his own classification we leave him until the Lord, the Righteous Judge, will judge both him and us out of our own mouths. To those we say: Turn from your lying vanities, and hear the voice of the gracious Living God while yet the Bridegroom tarries; for he is the Savior, and there is none apart from him.—Wm. Ellis, Editor Christian Lamp.

Speculating in Spiritual Futures.

Speculating is one of the common sins of our times. In their eagerness to get rich without that steady and prolonged application to legitimate business methods and honest work, men are everywhere venturing out into the wide, wild, and uncertain sea of speculation. In this they are ready to have and take all the risk of loss and bankruptcy, and even worse. For it often happens that, to get money with which to speculate, men who are trusted and honored with the confidence of the community, and their employers will use money not their own, hoping to replace it with the gains of their speculative ventures. In this they hazard not only their own and their employer's money, but their own good names and characters. Well, a man may speculate and lose; and if it is nothing but money, he may recover himself, or he may even live a respectable life thereafter, though it be in comparative poverty. Still in any case, "it is only evil, and that every day," for men to speculate.

There is one form of speculation, however, that is vastly more disastrous than the worst results of commercial hazard. That is, speculations in the future of our souls. It is the fashion nowadays to turn aside from the old paths and the well-ascertained truths of revealed religion and give rein to the wildest speculations as to the future destiny of our soul. Even among men who still cling to the Scriptures there is a disposition to adopt the speculations of some undoubtedly good men as to the possibility of a future probation or a probation after death. Yet it is a matter of common consent that this doctrine does not rest on any clear teaching of Scripture, but is, at best, an inference and a possibility. Nevertheless, there are multitudes of careless persons anxious to "climb into heaven by some other way" than by him who is the "Door, the Way, the Truth, and the Life," who eagerly seize upon this new doctrine or speculation, and stake their everlasting future upon its being true. If they lose here, and it is difficult to see how they can do otherwise, they are ruined and lost beyond recall. We say it is impossible that they should do otherwise than lose; for if they reject Christ now and live on in sin, expecting that they will have another opportunity of repentance after death, it is certain that they will wake up in eternity to an everlasting disappointment. To reject Christ, on the hearsay of being able to accept him when sin may no longer be indulged, is to expect Christ to be a minister to sin.

The advocates of the so-called "new theology" only affirm their doctrine so far as it relates to the heathen or to those who have never had an opportunity of accepting Christ in this world. Nevertheless, there are thousands in our own country, where the Gospel is as a household word, who take up this vague speculation, announced by certain theologians with reference to the heathen, and blindly apply it to themselves, and because of it, refuse the offer of life now in Christ. This is a part of that folly and madness with which the god of this world succeeds in deluding the children of the world. We counsel all such to abandon this speculation in spiritual "futures," and buy of Christ "gold tried in the fire."

Remarkable Incident.

"Cover my defenceless head
With the shadow of thy wing."

A party of Northern tourists formed part of a large company gathered on the deck of an excursion steamer that was moving slowly down the historic Potomac one beautiful evening in the summer of 1881. A gentleman who has since gained a national reputation as an evangelist of song had been delighting the party with the happy rendering of many familiar hymns, the last being the sweet petition so dear to every Christian heart, "Jesus, lover of my soul."

The singer gave the first two verses with much feeling, and a peculiar emphasis upon the concluding lines that thrilled every heart. A hush had fallen upon the listeners that was not broken for some seconds after the musical notes had died away. Then a gentleman made his way from the outskirts of the crowd to the side of the singer, and accosted him with, "Beg your pardon, stranger, but were you actively engaged in the late war?"

"Yes, sir," the man of song answered, courteously; "I fought under General Grant."

"Well," the first speaker continued with something like a sigh, "I did my fighting on the other side, and think, indeed, am quite sure, I was very near you one bright night eighteen years ago this very month. It was much such a night as this. If I am not mistaken, you were on guard duty. We of the South had sharp business on hand, and you were one of the enemy. I crept near your post of duty, my murderous weapon in my hand; the shadow hid me. As you paced back and forth you were humming the tune of the hymn you have just sung. I raised my gun and aimed at your heart, and I had been selected by our commander for the work because I was a sure shot. Then out upon the night rang the words:

"Cover my defenceless head
with the shadow of thy wing."

"Your prayer was answered. I couldn't fire after that. And there was no attack made upon your camp that night. I felt sure when I heard you sing this evening, that you were the man whose life I was spared from taking."

The singer grasped the hand of the southerner, and said with much emotion: "I remember the night very well, and distinctly the feeling of depression and loneliness with which I went forth to my duty. I knew my post was one of great danger, and I was more dejected than I remember to have been at any other time during the service. I paced my lonely beat, thinking of home and friends and all that life holds dear. Then the thought of God's care for all that he has created came to me with peculiar force. If he so cared for the sparrow, how much more for man created in his own image; and I sang the prayer of my heart, and ceased to feel alone. How the prayer was answered I never knew until this evening. My heavenly Father thought best to keep the knowledge from me for eighteen years. How much of his goodness to us we shall be ignorant of until it is revealed by the light of eternity! 'Jesus, lover of my soul,' has been a favorite hymn; now it will be inexpressibly dear."

The incident related in the above sketch is a true one, and was related to the writer by a lady who was one of the party on the steamer.—London Freeman.

What Is Resurrection?

The Scripture word for it is anastasis. This means a standing up again in life. The verb egeiro is frequently used to describe the method of it. This means to arouse as if from sleep. It implies a previous condition of slumber.

The idea of a life after death has taken hold, in some form, of all races of men.

1. The positivist reduces the idea down to such low elements that it virtually disappears. He makes man to live again in transmitted traits, in influence upon other mens lives.

2. The transmigrationist believes that the soul of man lives again in other bodies born into the world—it may be that of an insect or a beast. It may be a human body of either lower or higher type than the previous one. The embodiment is always according to previous character.

3. The Christian belief is that man is to live again in the life of manhood. Here, however, we must distinguish between that archetypal manhood which is the perfected image of God—which is endowed with eternal life, and of which Christ is the first-born from the dead, Col. i. 15–20. To be raised into this form of life is that exanastasis—that out-resurrection from among the dead which was the object of the apostle's earnest striving, Phil. iii. 8–11. To this high honor an elect portion of the human race are called, Rom. viii. 14–30; Eph. i.; Jas. i. 18. The resurrection of the mass of mankind must evidently be of a lower order than this, and will be according to character, and on the principle of recompense, Luke xiv. 14; John v. 29; Rev. xx. 11–14. Scripture speaks of two great orders in manhood, the earthy and the heavenly, and two grades of embodiment, the terrestrial and the celestial (exanpostasis). The last order is that of the second man, the Lord from heaven. Only the saints shall rise into this heavenly order, 1 Cor. xv. 49; Phil. iii. 21. It follows therefore that other men must "come forth" in the "natural" order; that is, with bodies still under subjection to the natural system. Whereas the prime characteristic of the heavenly manhood is its unfettered mastery over this system and all the powers that rule in it. It is "the liberty of the glory of the children of God," Rom. viii. 19–21.—Words of Reconciliation.

Trust and Work.

Do your work, but do it in quietness and confidence; do your duty, but do it without this corroding anxiety; and he who even in the desert spreads his table for the birds, who clothes the flowers in their embroideries of beauty, will feed and clothe you. That trust which, unconsciously, God's humbler creatures show, that do ye show reflectingly and consciously. Trust in God for these lower things, because he gives, and will give, and has given to you, higher things than these. Do not degrade and drag down your life in the mire by the spirit of mean, selfish, grudging, untrusting accumulations. If you seek first the kingdom of God, all these other things, or things transcendently better than these, shall be added unto you. There is nothing wrong in your trade or your merchandise, and your daily work to earn your own living; that is altogether right; so far from being a rival business to these, the seeking of the kingdom of heaven is a divine law which should regulate, a divine temper which should pervade and transfigure them. Only for the sake of all that makes your life worth living, for the sake alike of your temporal and eternal happiness, do not seek the dross of earth more, and love it better than the gold of heaven. Let conscience and faith enter into every necessary act of your daily life. Learn to feel habitually that the life, the true life, the spiritual life, is more than food, and the body than raiment. Let justice, goodness, kindness and purity be your aim; not the selfish scramble of scheming competition, not the brutal appetences of sensual desire. Do not let your daily necessities blunt the edge of your ideal aspirations; do not sink into groveling appetites or money making machines. Man lives by bread, but he does not live by bread alone. — Archdeacon Farrar.

The Lessons of the Street.

On the corners we may find them.
Or in cloisters here and there:
In the day time or the night time,
All along the thoroughfare;
Standing idly and forgetting
They should earn the bread they eat,
And the many who are learning
All the lessons of the street.

In their homes is naught inviting;
Poverty and want are there;
Wasting demons—thirsting ever—
Serve to keep the cupboard bare;
And the little babies wander
Out of doors on toddling feet,
Quick to learn the lessons taught them
Every hour upon the street

Shame and Crime, their ready pupils,
Here of every age may find:
Sons of wealth and rank, to swell
And to idleness inclined;
In the school of vice progressing,
They with base-born rogues compete,
Who have won a high distinction
From their training in the street.

Maidens fresh in youthful beauty,
Cherished in the heart and home:
Dearly loved ones—vain and thoughtless—
From the fireside choose to roam;
Knowing naught the many dangers
And disasters they may meet,
By their everyday attendance
On the lessons of the street.

Many a life that started bravely,
Full of promise, pride and zeal—
Stirred within by holy passions
That the knavish never feel—
Has been overthrown in battle,
Led to sure and swift defeat,
By the poison and pollution
Of the lessons of the street.

Oh, ye mothers, train your darlings
So to love their homes, that they
With the idle and the vicious
Will not ever go astray.
With a chain of strong affection
Bind them to the safe retreat,
That their minds may not be tainted
By the lessons of the street.

Dear Children:

Come and give me your attention a little while, for I have yet another interesting story to tell you, unfolding the trying circumstances of the Jews under a certain king whose name signifies "Head or Chief." In the third year of his reign he called together all the nobles and princes of a hundred and twenty seven provinces, which were his vast domain, desiring them to partake of a rich feast and to see the grandeur of his glorious kingdom and the honor of his excellent majesty. After that another feast was spread for all the people in the king's garden, when they were invited to drink the wine of the kingdom (margin) from vessels of gold, the king having made a law that none should be compelled to drink, but every man should do according to his own will.

When the seventh day dawned, the king desiring greatly that the beauty of the queen should be made manifest, sent a kind message to her, entreating her to come, decked in her royal robes, that the princes and people might behold her lovely countenance, for she was fair to look on. But she refused to obey the royal command which made the king very angry. Then the king said to those who knew law and judgment, what shall we do unto the queen who refused to obey my command? The wise who knew the times answered, Let there go forth a royal command which cannot be altered, and let the king give her royal estate to another better than she. This pleased the king, and while herself and companions were partaking of a feast of her own preparing, a decree was signed that the queen, whose name signifies "A Thread," should be put away, and one bringing forth the fruits of righteousness should wear the royal crown. After this officers were sent through all the king's provinces to seek out such as were of the virgin type, beautiful in form and countenance, for the king who desired to unite himself to another bride. Many were called, but one there was whom the king loved above all the rest, one whose faith was in the God of Israel. And when she had made herself ready, the king, who greatly desired her beauty, placed upon her lovely brow the royal crown, making her queen instead of the disobedient one. When she was united to her royal head, release or rest was given, also good gifts. Another feast was spread, which the king named, "the hidden or secret" one's feast, for this is the meaning of the bride's name.

Among the king's servants were two unfaithful men who tried to take the king's life, but the plot was discovered by a Jew who was uncle to the queen. His relationship was unknown in the royal courts, but having saved the life of the king, his name was recorded in the king's book of remembrance. The king's prime minister was a proud, overbearing, cruel man, and each characteristic unfolded the meaning of his name, "Noise and tumult." His arrogant spirit demanded every subject should bow to him, which the Jew who sat at the king's gate refused to do, and to punish him, he told the king there was a certain people scattered abroad, whose laws differed from the king's, and were of no profit to the king, for whom he offered the goodly sum of ten thousand talents of silver if the king would have them destroyed. The king took off his ring and gave it to him saying, the silver is given to thee also the Jewish people to do to them as it seemeth good to thee. Quickly letters were written which were sealed with the king's seal and sent into all parts of the kingdom, that on a certain day the rulers were to destroy, to kill, and cause to perish, every Jew, old and young, and their goods to be given to their destroyers. When the poor Jew who sat at the gate heard the sad news he rent his clothes, put on sackcloth and going through the city he cried with a loud and bitter cry, and there was great mourning, all the Jews, fasting, weeping and wailing.

When the queen heard of it she sent to her uncle, who gave the messenger a copy of the king's decree, entreating her to go in unto the king and make supplication for her own people, the Jews. But this the sorrowful queen could not do, as the king had made a law that none could come into his presence, not even the queen, except he called for them; and to break the king's command was sure death unless he held out to the suppliant his golden sceptre. This intelligence she sent to her sad uncle, whose name signifies "the contrite one." Again he sent this message, "Hold not thy peace at this time, for thou being a Jewess shall not escape more than all the Jews. And who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this? Then the mourning queen, who dare not tell her husband her deep sorrow, sent a message to all the Jews to fast three days for her, and herself and maidens would do the same. On the third day the lovely queen put on her royal robes, though weak with fasting, and trembling greatly with fear, "because the sentence of death rested upon her," she ventured into the inner court, saying, "If I perish, I perish."

The king was sitting on his throne and when he saw the beautiful queen who had come to supplicate without a call, his love became stronger than death, when he lovingly held out to her the golden scepter, which tenderness drew the secret one near to him, that she might touch the golden emblem of life. Affectionately the king said to her, What wilt thou? and what is thy request? it shall be given thee to the half of my kingdom. The queen said, Let the king and his prime minister come to a banquet of wine which I have spread. This honor pleased the proud minister, and he told all his friends of the royal dignity conferred upon him. Yet said he, all this availeth me nothing while the Jew sitteth at the gate. His wife said, Let a gallows be made for him, and ask the king that he may be hanged thereon. The gallows was erected, but on the same night the king could not sleep, and requested the book of records might be read to him, and behold the name of the contrite one was written there. And the king said what has been done for this faithful Jew? The servants said, No honor has been given him?

Just at that moment, when the books were opened, and the time to reward the faithful had come, the prime minister was waiting to ask permission to hang him. When the king saw him he said, What shall be done to the man whom the king delighteth to honor? Supposing the king intended to confer it on him, he said, Let the royal apparel be brought, which the king useth to wear, and the horse that the king rideth upon, and the crown royal, and let one of the king's most noble princes array the man whom the king delighteth to honor. Then the king said, Make haste and do even as thou hast said to the Jew who sitteth at the king's gate. After this was done the prime minister led him through the streets of the city, proclaiming, "Thus shall it be done to the man whom the king delighteth to honor."

This caused the minister to hasten to his house mourning, with his head covered. His wife gave him no comfort declaring if he was a Jew before whom he had begun to fall, he would surely prevail against him. The king then sent a hasty message to him to come to the queen's banquet. While the wine was before them, the king said to her, What is thy petition? or what thy request? It shall be given to half of the kingdom. The queen answered, O king, let my life be given me, and my people at my request; for we are sold, I and my people, to be slain and to perish. Then the king said, Who is he? and where is he? who dare to presume in his heart to do so? The queen answered, the adversary and enemy is this wicked man who sitteth at the banquet.

Then the king was full of wrath, and said, Hang him on the gallows he has prepared for the contrite one. Then the secret one unfolded to the king that the Jew was her uncle who had tenderly brought her up. Instantly the king took his ring off his finger, and placed it on the hand of the Jew, making him prime minister. Still the lovely queen was full of grief because of the decree which had gone forth to destroy her people, and imploring the king she said, How can I endure to see the destruction of my kindred? This moved the king and he sent hasty letters to all the Jews to stand for their life, and destroy the power of those who dare assault them. And the city rejoiced to see the contrite one who a few days before was weeping and wailing, now clothed in royal apparel, with a great crown of gold on his head, and all the Jews had light and gladness, joy and honor, and many people became Jews; and the Jews who dwelt in unwalled villages made it a day of gladness and feasting, sending portions one to another.

Children beloved, this history unfolds God's wonderful purposes toward the Jewish people. The one whose name signifies "a thread" was a true type of the Jewish church. The hidden, secret one, the Gentiles, who heard the glad tidings of the King's messengers and came when called, thus bringing forth the fruits of righteousness; and although the sentence of death has rested upon her, yet because of the King's great love for her it has been revoked. The Jew sitting at the king's gate, represents the Jewish nation whose memory can never be blotted out of the King's record, although all the governments of the earth may try to destroy them. And when their King shall come, whose name signifies "Head or Chief," they will be chief among all the nations, working out the King's royal commands. When the hidden secret one, or the King's lovely Bride, who has laid hold of the King's golden sceptre of life, or Israel's hope, shall be made manifest and into her hands shall be given the house of tumult and noise that the wickedness of the wicked may come to an end, and peace, glorious peace shall flow like a river.

Your affectionate Teacher,
E. COPPMAN.

EXPLANATION OF LABEL MARKS.

Some having complained that they do not know what the marks on labels mean, we will just say, "Jay" means January, and when it is followed by a figure "6" and reads "Jay6" it means your subscription expired the first day of January, 1886. "Feb" February, "Mar" March, "Apr" April, and "May" are well understood, but "Jun" meaning June seems to confuse some, and to be taken to mean January; "Jun" means June. "Jul" is July, "Aug" August, "Sep" September, "Oct" October, "Nov" November, and "Dec" December. The figure following the month stands for the year, "1" means 1881, "2" means 1882, etc. A postal card of inquiry will bring you any information you wish.

GRAVE OF A CHRISTIAN.

There is a spot—a lovely spot,
Embosomed in a valley's dales
The eye of splendor marks it not,
Nor traveller of its beauties tells.

The hazel forms a green bower there—
Beneath the grassy covering lies:
And sweet flowers, surpassing fair,
Mingle their soft and lovely dyes.

More decks the spot with mayor's gem,
And the first beam of Eastern ray
Lights up a spark in each of them,
That seems to hail the opening day.

When first that beam of morning breaks,
The fairy bars a smile may see,
Like that when first the saints awakes
At dawn of immortality.

The free birds love to seek the shade,
And here they sing their sweetest lays:
Most requiem!—He who there was laid,
Breathed his last dying voice to praise.

THE WAY BACK FROM THE GRAVE.

How many of us have gone to the grave and left a loved one there! Few, at least, have not visited the place where a loved one's ashes lie and dropped a tear, as we recalled the happy, joyous times we have spent in the society of him, or her, whose face we can look on no longer.

"Friend after friend departs:
Who has not lost a friend?"

A father, on whose strong and loving arm our most ardent confidence was stayed; or mother—name ever dear to our hearts—whose tender caresses still linger upon us. The husband, our stay, our comfort and our pride; or wife, dearest and closest heart's companion of our life, in all its joys and sorrows. Or children, dear to our hearts by their early and constant claims on our care, love, and service, and entwined in our affections in a way known only to those who have had, and lost them. The son, who was his widowed mother's only treasure left to her: all those he buried in the grave; and along with them, oh, how much of the joy of our lives!

Hear the cry of one father after his first-born and only child: "She bore it all so quietly and patiently; our hearts sore looking on, and able to do so little for her; our prayers going out for her, that her young life might be spared, but all in vain! She dies; and with her went a great deal of light and sunshine out of our hearts and home. With her many little ways she had entwined herself round our hearts before she fell ill. Almost every day she seemed to grow more intelligent; and learned to do little things. My step quickened at dinner and tea hours to get her in my arms: and she knew my step so well. Though her age was only counted by months, she brightened our home, and kept us cheerful. Surely the young life is not quenched for ever! Surely death shall not for ever hold the young ones in his ruthless grasp!"

Such is the cry, not from one only, but from thousands of hearts, yearning after those who have gone to the grave. Wondering, hoping, inquiring: Shall they ever return? Is there a way back from the grave?

And here the thought comes up to us, that we ourselves must one day be buried in the grave. The thought is not a pleasant one; and, while ready at all times to acknowledge its truth, we are fain to believe that, to us, the grave is yet a good way off. Still, the truth, that our breath is in our nostrils, ever ready to depart, keeps staring us in the face. "It is appointed unto men once to die." However far off our love of life may lead us to fancy the day of our death, that day shall assuredly come; when the last services of friends shall be performed for us, and they shall bury us out of their sight.

Just as this sad truth imprints itself on our minds, and according to the vividness of the light in which we see it, so is the eagerness with which we exclaim: "If a man die shall he live again!" Is there a way back from the grave?

Our experience and observation answer: None that we know of.

"All nature dies, and lives again."

Spring and summer regularly succeed autumn and winter; but we have seen no summer to our dead. The icy hand of the grave is still unthawed. Must it ever be so?

Sometimes we take heart from the analogies of nature. "The chrysalis that lay motionless and dry, wakes up to a higher life; and, gloriously arrayed, rises into the air, nestles in the bosom of the rose, and sips the nectar of the choicest flowers;" and so men sometimes fancy that they shall likewise return from the prison-house of hades to the joyousness of renewed and higher life. But, alas! the pleasing fancy disappears when brought into the light of truth and reason.

The chrysalis was not really dead; the creature was only in process of development. from the condition of a crawling worm to that of a gay and painted butterfly—a worm with wings; which, having reached the maturity of its being, shall shortly die and be no more.

The acorn, too, bursts its husky coverings; becomes a sapling, and, in time, a sturdy oak, which may live a thousand years. But when the oak dies and crumbles into rottenness, it never lives again.

And must our dead ones, and we ourselves, so go the way whence we shall not return? We, too, and our beginning in a tiny germ, which became a living form—a child, a boy, a man; and in our destiny to be, when dead, to live no more, like a decayed old oak? We would not like it so; we shudder at the thought of being blotted out for ever from conscious, sentient existence.

"For who would lose,
Though full of pain, this intellectual being,
These thoughts that wander through eternity?"

And so we raise our eyes to God, our Maker, and anxiously inquire of him, Is there a way back from the grave?

The cry is heard. Hark! A voice comes, clear and thrilling, from the Son of God himself; "Fear not! I am the first and the last; I am he that liveth, and was dead; and, behold, I am alive for evermore. Amen, and have the keys of hades and of death." There, there is the way back from the grave; and there is no other!

Having thus led our thoughts up to the Fountain of Life, even life from the dead, let us drink thereof, and gain that life which never ends. Let us recount and meditate a while, on the words of Jesus and his Apostles, regarding the hope of resurrection from the dead.

First, turn to that touching scene at Bethany, when Jesus brought from the grave Lazarus, the brother of Mary and Martha, after he had been buried four days: "Martha, as soon as she heard that Jesus was coming, went and met him;" and said unto him, "Lord, if Thou hadst been here my brother had not died; but I know that even now, whatsoever Thou wilt ask of God, God will give it Thee. Jesus said unto her, Thy brother shall raise again. Martha said unto him: I know that he shall rise again, in the resurrection at the last day. Jesus said unto her: I am the resurrection and the life, he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in Me shall never die," John xi. 20–26.

In these words the Lord Jesus claims to be the cause, or source of Resurrection; that in him was vested the power to effect resurrection and life to the dead. He had done so previously to this; and very strong and explicit were the terms he used: "As the Father raiseth up the dead and quickeneth them, even so the Son quickeneth whom he will." "Verily I say unto you: The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear shall live," John v. 21, 15.

These words were verified, when, moved with compassion at the sight of a widow weeping for the loss of her only Son, as she followed him to the grave, Jesus touched the bier, and the mournful procession stood still; and in obedience to the call: "Young man, I say unto thee arise: he that was dead sat up and began to speak; and was restored to his mother," Luke vii. 12, 25. So also in the case of Jairus' little daughter, Jesus took her by the hand, saying: "Maid, arise; and her spirit came again, and she arose straightway," Luke viii. 54, 55. And again, when at the grave of Lazarus, Jesus "cried with a loud voice: Lazarus, come forth: and he that was dead came forth," John xi. 43, 44. Manifestly, the dead did hear the voice of the Son of God, and lived again. It was to these and such like events the Lord referred when he said: "The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live." These, however, were but the earnest of the results of his mighty life-restoring power. "Marvel not at this," said he, "for the hour is coming in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice; and shall come forth. They that have done good unto the resurrection of life: and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of condemnation," John v. 28, 29.

The same prerogative is claimed for the Son of God, by the Apostle Paul, "Since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead; for as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive," 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22.

The redemption brought in by the Second Adam—the Lord from heaven—fully covers the ruin wrought by the first Adam. The first brought death to all; the second brings life to all men, by the resurrection from death—the consequence of Adam's sin. Even to the last, Jesus is the way back from the dead. He died and rose and revived that "He might be Lord both of the dead and the living." And "all that are in the grave shall hear his voice and shall come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil to the resurrection of condemnation;" to die the second death—not for the transgression of another, but for their own sin.

The resurrection of life, however, is that which the Scriptures bring most into prominence. And no wonder. It is of it that Jesus spoke when he said to Martha: "I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." Only to those who believe in him, can the resurrection be a matter of hope and joy. "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection; on such the second death hath no power." "They that are count worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from among the dead, cannot die any more," and "are equal unto the angels." "The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first, then we which are alive, and remain, shall be caught away together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord." Wherefore comfort one another with these words."

Well they might; and well may we, if we are Christ's. Why should we sorrow, like those who have no hope, for the loved ones who have fallen asleep? As surely as Jesus died and rose again, so shall they. And if we be found in Christ at his coming, we shall see them all again; and, along with them, be ever with the Lord.

"A few short years of toil and pain
We'll reach the happy shore,
Where earth-dimmed eyes no more shall weep,
Nor hearts shall bleed to part, no more."

And so it is that, though we grieve for the dear ones lying in the grave, we sorrow, not in despair, but in hope. And more it is that, in full consciousness of passing away, the believer in Jesus departs in peace—

"Leaves this world without a tear,
Save for the friends he holds so dear."

The old disciple, full of days; the brother and sister, in the prime of life; the tender youth, like a budded newly blown flower—peacefully and hopefully, breathe out their life, concerned only for the grief of those they are leaving.

Death comes alike to all: it may very soon come to you, dear reader, and to me. Union with him who is the Resurrection and the Life, by a living faith, is the only way back from the grave to incorruptibility and joy. Shall we see him, and not be ashamed?

—W. Leitch, in Rainbow.

"Sent in Due Season."

To each dispensation, as marked off in the prophetic record, belongs certain grand truths. We have reached a period located by holy seers "in the last days" that for solemn and awful importance is justly entitled to be called the "crowning event" in human history. To Bible Students I need not say this is the translation of the children of God. While each dispensation has truth, peculiar to itself, it also has another peculiarity, certain ones to proclaim those truths, to give to the household of faith, meat in due season. Let us all thank God that through our beloved Bro. Silas Henn, the sublime truths of the soon coming translation have been set in order, and earnest exhortation to ponder these truths given to all the waiting ones. Shall we heed the timely warning? When the short interval of seven days only remained before the flood, "God shut Noah and his family in the ark." Here was a complete separation from the guilty and doomed world. O, brother and sister in Christ Jesus, have you withdrawn from the world? are you "shut in" securely in the antitypical ark of safety? Are you awaiting the glorious change? Are you ready? Is your work for God all done?

Come now and let us reason together, the signs proclaim in unmistakable language that we are in the "time of the end," the time when the destiny of some will be forever fixed. Do you expect to be gathered with the faithful? Oh, the inconceivable horror of realising that the "harvest is past, the summer is ended and I am not saved." To be left in a world of sin when every pure and holy one has been taken away. The thought is too terrible to bear. Who, in contemplating a journey would fail to make all necessary preparation. As the time approaches how carefully each item is thought over in order that nothing may be overlooked. Then as the time for the train approaches how earnest and prompt is every movement. What a disappointment if the train has left the station when the traveller reaches it, even though another train will soon pass. But this grand opportunity will only occur once in the world's history. But one opportunity to form a part of the Lord's cabinet, but one time appointed for the general assembly of all God's chosen ones. On the eve of one of the bloodie battles that drenched the soil of Europe the voice of the czar's ander rang down the line "Tonight England expects every man to do his duty." So to day the voice of the Master speaks in thunder tones to every faithful one "Be ye therefore ready," "and what I say unto you, I say unto all "Watch." In view of all this "what manner of persons ought we to be?" May the grace of God enable us to overcome and more than conquerors through his blood. Even now waiting for the Master.

DIED.

KESTER.—Fell asleep in Jesus the Anointed, at Brooklyn, Ont., January 22, 1887, Isaiah Kester, aged 75 years.

In May, 1833 Brother Kester was married to Elizabeth Howard, who only survived six days. Her age was 71 years and 9 months. Her death was caused by over exertion and anxiety for her husband, with whom she had lived as husband and wife about, over 52 years.

Brother and Sister Kester were among the first in Ontario, who embraced the doctrine that Jesus was coming to reign on the earth. But they were not like many, who, upon the passing of times, went back to the nominal church, or come to the conclusion that they had learned it all. But their course was onward in the narrow way that leads to the highlands of glory—searching the Scriptures of Israel. Therefore they were firm believers that there was no future life outside of the plan of human redemption or Jesus the Life Giver! Also in the restitution of all things God had foretold by his Holy Prophets.

Brother and Sister Kester were Scripturally immersed into the all saving name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, by the writer, in 1860. In 1859 the writer became acquainted with them, and from that time to the day of their death there was never an unkind word between us, and their house was always a welcome home for me when preaching in that place or passing through, and a warm invitation has been extended to me by their children to make it my home as usual. Says the Editor of the Brooklyn Times, "To say that they were loved, is only to say all that is embraced in the term," when applied to mortal man. To their death two sons and one daughter, who survive them, the neighborhood, the world, the church of God, the writer and his companion, have met with a loss that never can be made up in this age. Then one after another of the old soldiers in the Advent movement are passing away under the power and dominion of death for a time! But who, I often ask, is rising up to fill their places?

B. V. LYON.

PEIRCE.—At Nobby, Benton County, Mo., Oct. 24, 1886, Minnie Frances, daughter of A. C. and M. E. Peirce, aged 2 years, 11 months and 27 days.

The cause of her death was pneumonia. She was a very talented child. The last sensible word she spoke was, "Good bye, ma." She is now in the land of the enemy, but she will live again. Jeremiah says children will come from the land of the enemy. Jesus says, "Suffer little children to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of God." Little Minnie will live again in the restitution age. Good bye little grand daughter till Jesus comes to restore all things.

JONAH PEIRCE.

MINER.—At Douglass, Kan., Jan. 11, 1887, H. M. Miner, in the 77th year of his age.

For many years he was a member of the Methodist church, but seventeen years ago, after hearing the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ, he yielded obedience by being baptized into Christ for the remission of sins, since which time he has endeavored to live a Christian life, and we trust he sleeps in Jesus. Death came very suddenly, but we sorrow not as those who have no hope. We expect ere long to meet him in the kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

THE COMING AGE,

Nature and Proximity.

—By J. P. WESTRUP.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar causes, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research, covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of supposed interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand is in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, politics, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty, and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 300 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $1.00. Send to this office for this work.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXVI. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, MARCH 16, 1887. NO. 11.

THE RESTITUTION

Terms--TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

Payable in advance. Three and Six Months the same ratio.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the governance of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

WILL THE DEAD EMERGE FROM THE GRAVE IMMORTAL? No. 4.

A Discussion in which Carrie Williams affirms they will, and the Editor denies - claiming the dead will emerge Mortal and be Judged before they receive Immortality.

Mr. Williams, I much regret the necessity of using space, to call so experienced a disputant as you are to a point of order. You seem to have entirely lost sight of the question under discussion. The challenge I sent to Mr. Moyer, may be found in RESTITUTION, Sept. 15th, 1886: and reads as follows: "I submit then Mr. Moyer, that the question at issue is 1 Cor. xv. 35. How are the dead (in Christ, for Paul here spoke of no others) raised, and with what manner of body do they come? I affirm, that the Scriptures teach that they come forth from, or out of the grave, in incorruption, in glory, power, in spiritual bodies; and I call you as a leader of the Christadelphian body, and the one who sought publicly to refute my writings thereon, to bring forward your Scripture evidence for such denial." You Mr. W., have stepped forward in Mr. Moyer's stead. You have in the first paper, given your construction of the question, (than which nothing more awkward has ever appeared in journalism) but in it even, by your own construction, you admit that the question only refers to those who will attain to immortality, as you claim that "the dead will emerge from the grave mortal, and be judged before they receive immortality." We, in this discussion, have nothing to say about the resurrection of the unjust, and therefore Acts xxiv. 15, setting forth what the Pharisees believed, is not relevant to the subject in hand. Paul did not preach, or teach the resurrection of the unjust, as will be seen by reading his entire defense down to where King Agrippa declared that much learning made him mad, in chap. xxvi. What he did preach and teach, was the hope of Israel as set forth in Moses and the Prophets—and this hope was the Christ. How he was the first that should rise from the dead, Acts xxvi. 23. Col. i. 18. In the resurrection of the Christ centered all hope of the fulfilment of the promises made unto the fathers. This is what the hope of Israel embraced, and this is the hope, for the sake of which Paul was bound with a chain.

The question in hand is, "How are the dead in Christ, raised up, and with what manner of body do they come?" Jno. v. 28, 29, sheds no light on this subject. Neither does Dan. xii. 2.

I never denied that Lazarus, and many others were brought back to physical life. But I did say, and now repeat, that Lazarus was the only one who was called back from the corruption of the grave, before Christ's resurrection. "Martha said unto him, Lord, by this time he stinketh: for he hath been dead four days." John xi. 39. Will you please state who the others were? All the cases hitherto mentioned, have no bearing on the question of the waking up of those who sleep in Christ as they were special manifestations of God's power.

Mr. W. your entire second paragraph, I can allude to only, as most miserable subterfuge—wanting in a single argument; and I here beg to suggest that it might perhaps be as well to trust to the intelligence of your readers to judge of my childishness, and keep to the question.

Your third proposition is on the same plane as you second. In your fourth you have exhausted all your ingenuity and eloquence, to twist a meaning out of the clause, "I have not yet ascended" that it does not contain. Now just for the sake of exposing the shallowness of your position, granting that Jesus meant that he had not yet ascended to the Father nature, what reason was there in that fact for not suffering Mary to touch him? If he was merely a flesh and blood nature as he was before he was crucified, why was there any need of an interdict to touch him. What effect could the touch of Mary have had on Jesus whether he were mortal or immortal? Again, why should she go tell the disciples that he would ascend to the Father nature? What have you gained by all this turning and twisting? Nothing, absolutely nothing. You beg the whole question and yet you make this the corner stone of your mortal resurrection theory. We have no record that Mary or any one else ever bore such a message to the disciples. Take this clause as I presented it in my last article—as the closing act in the wonderful life of our blessed Lord, and all is plain.

Fifth paragraph. In this you vainly try to show that "anabaino"—ascend, does not signify change of place from a lower to a higher locality. All the texts you quote have not a feather's weight in your favor.

"Why do thoughts arise in your hearts?" Luke xxiv. 38. The heart is not the organ of thought, therefore we must take this as a figurative expression in which the Savior personifies thought as though it were a body, and bodily rose from the heart to the countenance where it gave expression to doubt. Mark iv. 7. "But when it is sown it groweth up." Mr. W., can you not see that the sown seed comes up out of the earth beneath, into the air above? It changes localities from a lower, to a higher. Seed put into the ground, must come up out of it, (though in another form of life) else there is no vegetation: and further, if the soil be not good in quality the sown seed descends or becomes poorer than that sown. All science and experience is against your absurd construction of this language.

Matt. xiii. 7, and Mark iv. 8, have the same signification. You might better not have quoted them at all as they will not sustain your unscriptural theory. Nay it must fall before the light of divine truth. You next give Rev. xi. 12, "And they heard a great voice from heaven saying, come up hither, and they went up in a cloud and their enemies beheld them." This without any authority, you claim refers to the ascension of the two witnesses to power. The voice that called them was from heaven, and they were called up there. The word "ouranos" here does not signify power, but sky or air. So you gain nothing from this. Rev. vi. 1, The same reasoning will apply here. Symbolically John ascended into the air, and took as it were, a "bird's eye view" through the spirit, of what was to come to pass hereafter. When John, and all the worthies who have long been sleeping in the dust of earth, and those who will be found watching and waiting—in reality ascend, will be when "the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout (of encouragement "keleusma") with the voice of the archangel and the trumpet of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first (there is no mixture here mentioned of "good and bad saints,") then we that are alive, that are left, shall with them be caught up in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord." 1 Thess. iv. 16. When he descends to earth, and before him shall be gathered all the living nations of earth, we will come with him, Amen. I wait to hear from you again on Rom. viii. 2, and now pass on to 1 Cor. xv.

8th Stone—"There is one glory of the sun." 9th stone—"and another glory of the moon." 10th stone—"and another glory of the stars." All these heavenly bodies differ one from the other in apparent brilliancy and grandeur, yet they are each maintained in their respective orbits, without the least confusion. Now, O ye Corinthians, are ye still without the knowledge of God? Know ye not that all these mysterious and stupendous works which ye behold, but cannot comprehend, are the works of the Great Jehovah. They are not the works of blind chance or fate, not the works of the heathen gods whom you have forsaken for the God who made heaven and earth, yea all things that we behold are of him, and "So also is the resurrection of the dead," which we have seen only in the person of Christ. I have proved to you by hundreds of living witnesses, that he rose from the dead.

I have led you on, and up, through the various manifestations of God's power in the visible creation. I have pointed you to the blue vault of heaven, bestudded with millions of worlds moving on in silent harmony, no confusion, no disruption. All these work, and under the control of the Almighty Power: and surely he whose omnipotence grasps all these works, has also power to raise the dead. Hence I assert that the adverbial clause "So also," connects all the preceding sentences, describing or delineating the visible works of the Great Jehovah with the as yet invisible work, the resurrection of the dead; and places that which is yet to be manifested as the work of the same Great Author, as the visible which is all of him, and therefore Paul says: "So also is the resurrection of the dead" (of him). If this be not Paul's teachings to the Corinthians, I know not the meaning of words, nor the force of language. But let us go on in this chapter, verse 42.

1. It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption. I have previously, in other writings, shown that according to our best Lexicographers, to sow is to "plant by strewing, to plant in any way:" and they define plant, "to put in the ground and cover, as seed for growth." It cannot be denied that Paul is here speaking of the condition in which the dead are, when they are put out of sight, covered up in the ground as grain was sown. That condition he represents in four separate phases, the first of which is corruptible, which clearly signifies in a state subject to corruption or decay. "It is sown in corruption," it, the dead, "is raised in incorruption." Here we see that the dead were put in the ground, and they will forever remain there, unless they are brought or raised out of it. The Corinthians ask Paul: How, (Pos) in what fashion, or with what manner, or kind of body do they come out of the death state, in which they have been placed in a corruptible condition? To this query Paul replies, "It, the dead, is raised in incorruption," the very opposite condition from that in which it was put into the ground. Not at all like grain which always yields the same, or a "body of its own" kind. The word raised as here used is from the Greek egeiro, and simple means to raise up from a lower position, but has no reference to the condition in which the body is when raised. That condition is here described by the word incorruption. The Greek word qun, rendered to raise up, or to be caused to rise, signifies to be exalted to power, as given in 2 Sam. xxiii, 1. Mr. Williams, please note this fact.

2. "It is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory." A state of death is not an honorable one. Solomon said in contrasting the two conditions: "A living dog is better than a dead lion." "It is raised in KN not in Eis, which signifies to, but 'on'—in glory." This state of glory is the one in which they are brought forth out of the death state if language has any true meaning. This is in contrast to the raising of grain. The condition of the sown grain is in every way similar to the raised grain. The condition of the sown body to the raised body is antithetical, or opposite.

D. V., the third and fourth will appear in my next.

EDITOR'S REPLY.

In the foregoing we find:

1. Considerable space devoted to scolding because the writer thinks we have not kept to a proposition she made to Brother Moyer.

2. That the resurrection of the unjust is not in issue; that "Paul did not preach or teach the resurrection of the unjust; and that the issue only involves the question of the resurrection of the just.

3. That it is claimed by the writer that she "never denied that Lazarus and many others were brought back to physical life."

4. A number of mere assertions about "subterfuge;" "wanting in a single argument," etc., etc.

5. That though the word anabaino is rendered grew up, in the case of thorns growing; and ascend, in the case of the ascension of the witnesses to power, yet it means "a particular object changing places." Also that thoughts arising in the heart is figurative of a body rising from the heart to the countenance.

6. That the words "sown a natural body" means the burial of the dead body, and "raised a spiritual body" means coming forth from the grave immortal.

1. In answer to what appears under this heading, we simply say, that our experience has been, that when an opponent finds the ground sinking from under his feet, he always begins to raise "points of order," and quibble about departing from the proposition. Now if Mrs. Williams will refer to the cover of the Advocate for October 1886, she will find the proposition stated as follows: "Will the dead emerge from the grave immortal?" In answer to this, Mrs. Williams sent her affirmative argument. This is the origin of our discussion, and we ask Mrs. Williams to stick to it, and not avoid because we do not pay attention to something she said a long time ago in THE RESTITUTION.

2. In answer to the second part, we claim that the issue is the resurrection of the dead; and as the Scriptures teach the resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust, we are certainly within the bounds of our proposition when dealing with either class; especially when we have shown that the same language which applies to the coming forth from the grave of the one class, also applies to the other.

The reason Mrs. Williams raises a cry here about the resurrection of the wicked not being the issue, is because she does not like to be held down to her statement that "mortal resurrection is not mentioned in the Bible." Indeed, rather than admit that she was mistaken in that statement, she now seems inclined to deny that the Scriptures teach the resurrection of the unjust. We have tried to get Mrs. Williams to be candid, but so far confess our failure; but we will try once more, by putting the questions in such a form as to demand a yes or no. We do this more as a test of candor than anything else, because we have no desire to continue the discussion, if Mrs. Williams lacks frankness to admit her mistake in even an unimportant matter, when she is unquestionably shown to be wrong. If there is not frankness in small matters, there will not be in those of greater importance.

Now Mrs. Williams, you have said.

First. That mortal resurrection is not mentioned in the Bible? Have you not? Answer yes or no.

Second. You have also said that Lazarus and many others had, before Christ, been raised to mortal life, have you not? Answer yes or no.

Third. If the second statement is true, then the Bible in mentioning these cases must have mentioned mortal resurrection, must it not? Answer yes or no. If your answer be yes, then Fourth. Were you not mistaken in the first statement?

Fifth. If your answer be no, then were you mistaken in the second statement? Answer yes or no.

If your frankness be drawn out by these questions, then you will probably be of a broken and contite spirit, and will tremble at God's word sufficiently to admit its truth, and your own mistake in the following matter which is of more grave importance.

Sixth. You have said in the foregoing article, that "Paul did not teach the resurrection of the unjust," have you not?

Seventh. Does not Paul say, Acts xxiv. 14, 15, that he believed, and they (his persecutors) allowed, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust?

Eighth. Do you believe in the resurrection of the wicked? If you answer no, then we would ask,

Ninth. Did not Jesus teach their resurrection when he said: "They that have done evil shall come forth to a resurrection of damnation?" John v. 29, and Tenth. Did not Daniel too, when he said "Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, * * * some to shame and everlasting contempt?" Dan. xii. 2.

If your candor compels you to admit that these texts teach the resurrection of the wicked, then I would ask,

Eleventh. Will they come forth mortal?

You can refer to these questions by number, and say yes or no to each one; and from your manner of dealing with these, we shall be able to judge whether it is of any use to prolong this discussion, or quoting any more Scripture to you.

3. In answer to the statement that the resurrection of Lazarus to physical life has never been denied, we say, our friend, by denying that mortal resurrection was ever mentioned in the Bible, denied that Lazarus was raised to mortal life.

4 There is nothing under this heading but assertions about subterfuge, etc., and so it goes for nothing.

5 The different uses of the word anabaino, and the words of John xx. 18, we leave now to our readers and pass on.

6. Here we find ourselves in the much disputed chapter, 1 Cor. xv. Before showing the fallacy of Mrs. Williams' treatment of this, however, we must say a few words relative to Rom. viii. 11.

On page 246, Mrs. Williams says: "Dear readers, please turn and read carefully this chapter. See, there is no mention of resurrection, no reference to it till verse 17." Now, if our readers have read this chapter, they certainly will have been struck with wonder at Mrs. Williams' blindness in reading it and not seeing any mention of resurrection till reaching the seventeenth verse. When they reach the eleventh verse and read: "He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies," they will see the "mention" of Christ being raised from the dead, and that those to whom Paul was writing shall also have their mortal bodies quickened. Anyone who can read this verse and say it does not speak of resurrection, must either be blind or willfully reckless. The former is the more charitable view to take. Instead of "quicken your mortal bodies," the Diaglott renders it "make alive your mortal bodies." Mrs. Williams snatches at one definition which Young gives of the word rendered quicken, viz: preserve. True he says under the word zoopoieo, "To give or preserve life, but in this text it is the mortal body that is to be quickened—made alive. Surely the mortal body is not to be preserved, for Paul says the outer man will perish; the earthly house will be dissolved; mortality will be swallowed up. No preservation therefore for the mortal body; but at the resurrection, the Spirit that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken—make alive your mortal bodies. It made alive him—Christ's—and it shall also do for you what it did for him. Now Christ's mortal body existed—did not see corruption—and was quickened. In order for Paul's words to be fulfilled the mortal bodies of those he wrote to must, at the resurrection, be brought into existence—in order that they also may be quickened or made alive. This verse we are now willing to leave to the candor of those who have any, and pass on to 1 Cor. xv.

It is not necessary to follow Mrs. Williams up into the air-castle she has been building out of the numerous stones dug up out of her prolific imagination. We will confine ourselves to the point in dispute. The first that claims attention is our friend's reckless declaration that Paul is not comparing the resurrection with the process of raising grain. In refutation of this, all we need do is refer our readers to the question the Apostle starts with in verse 35, and then notice his answer through the chapter. "How are the dead raised up, and with what body do they come?" is the question, and immediately the raising of grain is introduced, in the following verses. After stating that that which is sown is not quickened except it die; and that what is sown is not the body or grain that shall be, but bare grain, of wheat or of some other grain, etc., he says: "So also is the resurrection of the dead." "It is sown in corruption and raised in incorruption. * * * It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body.

The next question is, What does Paul mean by sown a natural body and raised a spiritual body? Mrs. Williams claims that he means, buried a dead body and raised out of the grave a spiritual body; but this would not be an answer to his question, which is not, How are the dead buried, but how are the dead raised up and with what body do they come? This is the great question needing answer for the Corinthians. They were not troubled about how the dead were buried, but how they are raised? It is this that Paul therefore answers, by saying: "So also is the resurrection of the dead. * * * "It" (the dead body) "is sown," which means cast out, "a natural body, and" after being sown or cast out, "raised a spiritual body." That which is sown here, is a natural body; let us therefore try to find from Paul, what he means by a natural body. In verse 44, he says: "There is a natural body," in proof of which he quotes what is written, viz: "The first man Adam was made a living soul." Paul's definition therefore of a natural body, is living soul. So with his own definition of his own terms, let us now turn to verse 44. "It is sown a natural body"—living soul—and then, from that lower nature which is the first in the order of resurrection, as it is in the creation, it is raised a spiritual body, which is the higher nature—second in the order of resurrection, as in creation; for "that is not first which is spiritual" in the resurrection, (for it is the resurrection Paul is talking about) "but that which is natural, and afterward that which is spiritual," verse 49.

We have dealt so elaborately with this chapter in the articles which have appeared in the Advocate, which we hope to publish soon, in pamphlet form, that we cannot afford space to go over the ground again; and therefore now we ask attention to another part of Holy Writ in proof that there will be a reformation of the body at the resurrection, as there was a formation in the creation.

The prophet Ezekiel, chap. xxxvii. was "set down" in a valley of dry bones, and heard the question asked: "Can these bones live?" after which he saw "and the bones came together, bone to his bone; sinews were laid upon them, and flesh, and they were covered with skin. Then the Lord God breathed into them and they lived. In the formation of the natural body, or living soul, the man was formed of the dust, the breath of life was breathed into him, and he became a living soul. In the reformation, a singular process will take place, and the dead will again be made living souls or natural bodies, as shown in this chapter in harmony with 1 Cor. xv. But, we think we can hear Mrs. Williams exclaiming: Ezekiel was not talking about the resurrection of the dead, but about the restoration of Israel, as shown by verse 11. True, he is showing that Israel which is now dead as a nation, shall have a resurrection to natural life, but by what does the Prophet illustrate it? Does he not take the Scriptural method, by which the dead will be literally reformed, to teach by analogy that the nation of Israel will be nationally reformed? This being the case, our argument is just as well sustained, as if he had been speaking specially of the resurrection of dead bodies.

God is Love.

"We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." 1 John iii. 14. Again, "By this we know that we love the children of God when we love God, and keep his commandments." 1 John v. 2. "My little children, let us not love in word, neither in tongue, but in deed and in truth." 1 John iii. 18.

Thus we see there is something more than expressions with the tongue, or expressions in words. Dear ones of like precious faith, I have not been idle these many months, but have been in the field all the fall and winter. I have been in Illinois nearly three months visiting the brethren in Edgar County and at Lamark; had some good meetings. I also visited the dear ones in the city of Chicago. Was there ten days. On Sunday I attended a very good meeting conducted by Brother Reed. Had a pleasant visit with Brother and Sister Simonds.

I have learned to have love for those I may differ with, when I remember how our dear Father in heaven loves us and bears with his children; so we should bear and forbear, as Paul says, forbearing one another in love. O, that we love, may God help us to see what is in the word love, and may we all feel that love that Christians should toward one another. Says John, Herein is our love made perfect that we may have boldness in the day of judgment. Yes, dear ones, we will want boldness then, the weighing time will then have come. Let us, dear ones, act now toward one another as if we were at the throne of God, for there all things will be adjusted. God help us to love one another. I, for one, would rather act in this life as a peacemaker, for they shall be called the children of God.

While in Chicago I also called on Brother Thomas Wilson at his place of business, and Bros. W. H. Wilson and C. H. Jones, and had a pleasant visit with Brother Chas. Gardner at Brother Reed's; on Sunday afternoon met Sisters Stephenson and McDonald and found some new ones at the meeting. I have a son in the city, a printer by trade. I am sorry to say there is some hardness among the brethren in places on points of difference on Bible doctrine and I fear they do not have that love for one another.

O love, love, that crowning attribute of our dear Father, how much we need thee every day, and every hour we need thee. John says, God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth on him might not perish but have everlasting life. Again John says, If a man say I love God and hateth his brother he is a liar: for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen, if God so loved us we ought also to love one another. Dear ones, we may deceive one another in this life, but in that world God will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, then shall every man have praise of the Lord. Be not deceived, God is not mocked.

While in the city of Chicago, I visited the place of making type and saw with what rapidity they made the type, and remarked to Bro. Wilson it seemed to be speedy work, his remarks were "It passes through many hands before it reaches the men who examine it with the microscope, then after all that work of other workmen there is a large portion of it thrown to one side as useless," and then he said, "I think of the time when the Christian will pass the all-searching eye of God in the day of judgment, then there will be many flaws that man cannot see."

That struck me with terrible force, it came home to me.

O Lord, will I be able to stand? Dear brethren let us pray for one another and live for God and his cause. Let us never put a stumbling block or an occasion to fall in our brother's way. We must have more love or charity for one another. Let us try to build up, all work together for good, never tell an untruth on any one. God help me to so live that I may never wound any ones feelings. I want to try still harder to do all the good I can in this world, and of myself I can do nothing. Let us treat one another in love and kindness, and if we do differ let it be in love.

The Lord is good to us, let us be good to one another. The Lord is kind to us, let us be kind to one another; the Lord loves us, let us love one another; the Lord forgives us, let us forgive one another, the tender mercies of the Lord are over all of us, let us be tender toward one another. Paul says, "I will not eat meat while the world stands if it causes my brother to offend or he is made weak, then tells us the reason, Christ has died for that brother. Let us all think of these things then not accordingly. Let us act in view of the great judgment day; let us live as if we expected to meet the Judge today or tomorrow, the day is drawing nearer and nearer, brethren and sisters, we have no time to waste, let us be up and doing for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed. May the dear Lord soon come. Come Lord Jesus, come quickly.

THE political condition in the Old World may be tersely summed up in a few words—Crying peace, peace, and constantly preparing for war.

FROM an Exchange we quote a part of an expressive prayer by Spurgeon: "End these days of anarchy and unbelief, worldliness and luxury, filthiness and vice—and them all, we beseech Thee! cut short these delaying days and come quickly. By all the bleeding wounds of earth, by all the impious blasphemies which are invented against Thy great Majesty, come and reign."

---

FROM the Watchword we take the following under the heading

DEAD-LETTER PRAYERS.

A writer in the Texas Observer draws some sharp analogies between the "Dead-Letter Office" and the Dead-Prayer Office. Like many letters which never reach their destination, many prayers have to be marked "missent," or with some other fatal brand, and consigned to oblivion. Sometimes prayers remain unanswered because they are not directed right—not addressed to God, but to the audience. Other prayers never "go through" because the address is not legible. They are too full of pomp and rhetorical flourish—mere "monologues of flowery prose." Other prayers get lost because they are "unavailable matter"—prayers whose answers might gratify us, but would fall like showers of daggers on our neighbors—and so are denied passage through the divine channels, as sharp-edged tools, corroding acids, explosives, and the like, are not allowed in the mails. No legally "stamped" sincerely directed and well-meaning prayer is ever lost. The answer may be delayed, but the prayer is on file.

To the following letter we have intended to write a reply by examining the Sabbath question in the light of the Scriptures, and thus publishing our answer through the columns of our paper. This purpose we have not relinquished although we have not found the time for carrying out our design as yet. We give the letter with an article written by Elder J. Litch some years ago, which we copy from the Crisis with some preparatory remarks by the person sending it to that paper. Elder Litch's article is brief but to the point. God has constituted his Son the Head and Lawgiver of his church and not Moses. Hence we read that "The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ," Jno. i. 17. We, who are in Christ Jesus, "are not under the law, but under grace." Of the two "houses" spoken of in Heb. iii. 1–7—the one of Moses and the other of Christ,—we prefer to stay in Christ's House, and keep his commandments; for we learn that he has "become the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him," and that "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city." With the change of the priesthood, under which the law was given, there was made a change of the law, because it made "nothing perfect." It is the "better hope" that has been "brought in" that makes perfect even the (gospel) hope, Heb. vii. 11–19; Col. i. 21–23. As "by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified," and as we are "justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus," we cleave to the gospel. But read the letter that has been delayed too long, and then read Elder Litch's short and able article as given below.

Editor Restitution:

I take this opportunity of asking through the columns of THE RESTITUTION (if you can afford space). If any of your readers would kindly give me some light respecting the Jewish Sabbath, whether we as Gentiles, and believers and followers of the blessed Lord, are required to keep it, as was required in the Law of Moses. I ask this; not because I wish to start a useless and therefore needless controversy, but because I want to get at the truth. It is only by following the truth that we can honor and glorify our heavenly Father. I want to be led by its radiant beams, whether it leads me through the path of prosperity or adversity. I know that we have to buy the truth if we get it at all, but then we value it all the more for that. I am one who is earnestly longing for the coming of the blessed Master, and I do not think I shall have to wait long. I have just buried one of my little boys, aged six years and six months, this making the second I have laid to rest within three years. But what a comfort to know that this night of weeping will be followed by the morning of joy, and during the short interval before the Master comes let us be up and doing, working for the Lord, who has done so much for us, ever remembering that the least we do for him will be kindly remembered by him when he comes. O Lord Jesus, come quickly. I remain, dear brother in Christ, yours in the same blessed hope of immortality and eternal glory.

THE JEWISH SABBATH.

The following article from the pen of Elder J. Litch was published several years years ago in Messiah's Herald and copied in the Pacific Coast Advocate. It is a brief, concise and pointed argument upon the "Sabbath question," and was written in answer to an inquiry as to why he and other Adventists had not embraced the doctrine of the Jewish Sabbath and the law? This is a subject that is frequently thrust upon many of the Crisis readers, especially in the mid and far west, where a small tract or leaflet, short, concise, and right to the point, suitable in style and price for free distribution, is greatly needed.—E. S. Mansfield.

"1. Because 'the ten commandments' were the 'old covenant,' made with the Jews when they came out of Egypt. Deut. iv. 13; v. 2–7. 'And he declared unto you his covenant, which he commanded you to perform, even ten commandments; and he wrote them upon two tables of stone.' 'The Lord our God made a covenant with us in Horeb. The Lord made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us, even us, who are all of us here alive this day. The Lord talked with you face to face in the mount out of the midst of the fire, (I stood between the Lord and you at that time to show you the word of the Lord; for ye were afraid by reason of the fire, and went not up into the mount,) saying, I am the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage. Thou shalt have none other gods before me, etc.'

"2. These ten commandments being the covenant which God made with the Israelites, and with nobody else, they were never binding on Christians. All that Christ made obligatory on his followers under the 'new covenant,' of which he is the 'mediator,' he quoted and reinforced in the gospel. And that is the substance of all the commandments, except the fourth; and that he never enjoined on them.

"3. There is no record in the New Testament that the apostles or early Church ever held religious service on the Jewish Sabbath, except as they for convenience went into Jewish meetings as Sabbatarians go into the congregations of Sunday keepers in our own day.

"4. The Jerusalem Council decided the question, as they declared that it seemed good to them and the Holy Ghost to lay on believing Gentiles, as follows: Acts xv. 23, 24, 'And they wrote letters by them after this manner: The apostles, and elders, and brethren, send greeting unto the brethren which are of the Gentiles in Antioch, and Syria, and Cilicia: Forasmuch as we have heard, that certain which went out from us have troubled you with words, subverting your souls, saying, ye must be circumcised, and keep the law; to whom we gave no such commandment.' In all their deliberations they said not one word about keeping the Sabbath.

"5. Paul wrote to the Romans: 'Wherefore, my brethren, ye also are become dead to the law by the body of Christ; that ye should be married to another, even to him who raised from the dead, that we should bring forth fruit unto God....But now we are delivered from the law, that being dead wherein we were held, that we should serve in newness of spirit and not in the oldness of the letter, Rom. vii. 4, 6.

"But it is claimed that Paul referred to the ceremonial law, not to the moral, i. e., ten commandments. Let us see how this is. 2 Cor. iii. 7. 'But if the ministration of death, written and engraven on tables of stone (the ten commandments) was glorious, so that the children of Israel could not steadfastly behold the face of Moses, for the glory of his countenance; which (not the glory, but that which was engraven on stone) was to be done away, how shall not the ministration of the Spirit be rather glorious?' Then the ten commandments, as they only were engraven on stone, were to be done away, and clearly Paul embraced them in the word 'law.'

"6. When Christ commissioned his ministers to go and teach all nations, he gave them the subject matter of their teaching: 'Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you.' Matt. xxviii. 20. Not one word did he instruct them to teach us of an observance, as taught by Moses. Christ had incorporated into his teachings all of the Mosaic teachings which it was necessary for his followers to observe. His commandments were perfect in themselves. 'Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth.' I would not therefore dishonor my one master, 'even Christ,' by going back to Mosaic observance, which he never once enjoined for perfection in righteousness; but like the apostles and Christians of all ages, keep the memorial day of the new life, in honor of his name, resurrection and headship.

"7. The covenant of the ten commandments never being enjoined on anybody but the Jewish people, not even on their fathers; see Deut. v. 2, 3; and there being no evidence that he has enjoined them on Christ's followers we are under no manner of obligation as Christian believers or ministers, to either hold, practice or teach the observance of the Jewish Sabbath.

"8. If Christian believers are 'married to Christ,' they are adulterers if the law is not dead, and they are also held by that.

"The whole question centers here. The law in any of its parts as given to Israel by Moses was never by any divine authority imposed on Christian believers. I hold myself responsible to God and man for this declaration, and am prepared to vindicate it."

MILLFIELD, O., March 6, '87.

Having returned from a three weeks' trip from another part of the State, allow me to say that my visits to two congregations were interesting and profitable. The two congregations were Mt. Zion and Byesville, the one in Noble County, the other in Guernsey County. Two were immersed at Mt. Zion. So far as the stormy weather would allow the meetings were well attended.

These congregations have been formed by and are under the ministrations of Brother Wesley McBroom, of whom I am happy to have the pleasure of speaking, since his labors have been so abundantly successful. In this part of Ohio he has formed a number of churches and very much increased the membership of a number of others. He labors for six congregations, which, I believe, are all organized as "Churches of God." One is located at Franklin, Harrison County, one in Noble County, one in Guernsey County, two in Hocking County and one in Jackson County. They are quite prosperous, and very much attached to their minister.

Having been a moderator for Bro. McBroom in two discussions, I can speak from personal knowledge. He is a pleasant and very rapid speaker; clear, argumentative and forcible beyond the most of speakers.

He carries with him at once convincing power, and delivers his sentiments with great energy, and with the convictions of the truth of his message. He is about forty years old, and in the prime of active usefulness.

Should he have occasion to go west to visit our congregations, I know of no one whose influence would be superior.

I have visited another place (Readville) where we have a family (David Wilson's) who are very firm friends to THE RESTITUTION, having taken it for many years. They are very zealous and liberal. Sister Wilson was raised in Edinburgh, Scotland. Brother Wilson is also from Scotland. They make THE RESTITUTION teach our doctrines (the Bible truths) among all denominations. I spent some very pleasant hours with them, talking over the great prophetic truths. Readville is a mining village, and our brother has charge of three extensive coal mines. Any tracts or publications you have to spare will be made missionaries in this field.

My new work, "The Eastern Question," is all in print, and will, in a few days, be ready for delivery. It contains 632 royal octavo pages. It discusses the Eastern Question in all its phases, and contains a vast fund of historical information showing the prophetic position of the great nations of the earth. It will, perhaps, be as well to let others speak after they have mastered its contents.

We have, for many years, been watching the movements of the nations of Europe towards the Orient, and have seen the hand of God in their vast preparations.

I have seen no advances since I began to write that has obliged me to make any alterations. The powers which occupy the positions of kings of the North and South are developing their missions very rapidly, and it is well that we keep ourselves well posted as to coming events.

Christ severely reprimanded the Jews because they did not discern the signs of the times, relative to his first advent. How much more guilty is the church of this age for not discerning the near approach of Messiah, as shadowed forth in the events transpiring among the nations.

How can the Messiah occupy the throne of his father David, in a universal empire, without the final overthrow and removal of all Gentile domination? "Rule thou in the midst of thine enemies." "He must reign until he hath put all enemies under his feet." 1 Cor. xv. 25.

Such a result is clearly taught in Dan. ii. The stone makes dust of the image, becomes a mountain and fills the whole earth. The Gentile governments are not so organized as to be fit material for the holy kingdom of the Messiah.

The events now transpiring in the East, especially in Europe, cannot be mistaken as to their final results. France and Germany, Russia and Austria, hold positions that are readily understood as to their national bearings; but as to final results these nations have no clear and definite ideas. As to the Jews and their return to the land of promise, the nationalities are in total darkness. The holding back of Russia is not understood. The gradual union of the Balkan States, some five in number, seems but little understood. Should they form an independent union, how could Russia reach Constantinople? With the Balkan confederacy backed by Turkey, Austria, Italy and England, how could Russia reach Constantinople?

This obstacle is seen by Russia, and therefore she is laboring to defeat these plans.

But enough for the present. These points are discussed in my late forthcoming work. I hope and trust that THE RESTITUTION is doing a noble work. Let us hold fast till we are called to the rapture and into the kingdom. "Thy kingdom come." "Come Lord Jesus," quickly.

J. P. WESTHEER.

Report.

To the brethren and sisters who have so kindly contributed to our aged brother and sister in their need, I am glad to say that their contributions have been blessed in saving this worthy couple from actual want. I have been enabled to send them one check for fifty dollars, another for twenty-five dollars, and another for twenty-three dollars and thirty cents, so that they have been considerably helped, and as he says in a line to me, those who have aided them will indeed be rewarded. A few dollars laid up in heaven is a better treasure than the uncertain securities of earth. The promise of God that "ye shall in no wise lose your reward," is better than the promises of men which are so often broken from utter inability to keep them. But the bank of heaven never breaks, the promises of the King can never fail, and the investments made in God's cause are sure to bring a rich reward. If there are any others who wish to contribute to this charity I will forward it for them, even if it is only a dollar.

Your sister in hope,

MRS. H. V. REED.

News Items.

BOSTON, March 14.—A frightful accident occurred this morning on the Dedham branch of the Boston and Providence Railroad between Forest Hill and Roslindale, at what is known as Bussey Park Bridge. The 7 o'clock train from Dedham, consisting of seven cars and a baggage-car, under charge of Conductor Tilden, broke through the bridge. The engine and three cars went over safely, but five others fell through the bridge to the road beneath, a distance of thirty feet. The last car, which was the smoker, turned completely over and struck on top of the others, all being crushed almost out of shape.

The number reported killed is thirty-three, and forty injured. Among these are many women.

LONDON, March 2.—Mr. James Glashier, chairman of the Palestine exploration committee, has received a letter from Captain Claude Condor, of the Royal Engineers, announcing his discovery of the language in which are written the mysterious Hittite inscriptions first found by Burckhardt in 1808 and rediscovered in 1872. It is said these inscriptions will throw great light on the early chapters of the Book of Genesis.

The more important and certainly decipherable of the inscriptions are invocations to the gods of heaven, the ocean and the earth—exactly the deities included in a set which we know, from Egyptian and cuneiform tablets to have been adored by tribes in Asia Minor.

The discoverer submits a few of those texts. The following is a specimen. It was addressed to the sun:—

"May the Holy One, mighty and powerful, hear the uprising prayers. I call upon the Most High, shine, Lord Great Spirit. He gives me the rain of heaven."

A second prayer is addressed to the God of the Water, the Sky and the Ocean:

"I pray to my God of the Water, the God of Heaven. I make an inscription in his honor. I extol him. I cause a great libation to be made as an offering. I make an offering to the most holy the King of the Water."

It would seem, if we have here the prayers of the Hittites, the Hivites, Jebusites, etc., who surrounded the Israelites, that new interest will be given to the second and third Commandments and to the Biblical prohibitions against worshiping the water, the earth, the sky, and the like.

Youth's Column.

The First Tangle

Once in an Eastern palace wide
A little child sat weaving;
So patiently her task she plied
The men and women at her side
Plucked around her almost grieving.

"How is it, little one," they said,
"You always work so cheerily?
You never seem to break your thread,
Or snarl or tangle it instead
Of working smooth and clearly.

"Our weaving gets so worn and soiled
Our silk so frayed and broken;
For all we've fretted, wept and toiled,
We know the lovely pattern's spoiled
Before the king has spoken."

The little child looked in their eyes,
So full of care and trouble;
And pity caused the sweet surprise
That filled her own, as sometimes flies
The rainbow in a bubble.

"I only go and tell the king,"
She said, abashed and meekly;
"You know he said, 'in every thing—'"
"Why, so do we!" they cried; "we bring Him all our troubles weekly!"

She turned her little head aside;
A moment let them wrangle;
"Ah, but," she softly then replied,
"I go and get the knot untied
At the first little tangle."

O little children, weavers all,
Our brotherly we spangle
With many a tear that need not fall,
If on our King we would but call,
At the first little tangle.

The Alpine Rose.

The following beautiful story of an Alpine rose was written by a German girl, fifteen years of age, who possessed but a limited knowledge of the English language. It was written many years ago, and was found in a composition book that contained a collection of school essays. We deem it worthy of publication:—

April had just passed with its spows and changeable weather, and the first warm sun of May was shining upon the earth; the snowdrops began to peep out of the ground, and by the soft ringing of their delicate white bells seemed to announce to the other flowers that it was time to appear and decorate the world by their sweet perfumes and brilliant colors. The birds that had been so long absent, commenced to sing and express their joy;—all was happiness and glee; the whole world seemed to have put on its festive garment in order to welcome the return of Spring. Thus was all nature amongst the mountains of beautiful Switzerland! The astonished and almost dazzled eye of the spectator does not know where to fix its gaze, and what to admire most of all in this inspiring picture of extreme loveliness. There, on the top of the mountains, are magnificent glaciers in which are mirrored the brilliant rays of the sun, so that they appear to be strewn with rubies, emeralds and amathysts, while farther down there is a vast space which is covered with the most splendid white Alpine roses, intermingled with ferns and broad leaved ivy.

One would think it was impossible for any one to look at this beautiful landscape without pleasure and admiration, and yet there was one person who could not feel thus on looking at these lovely flowers among which he was standing. It was a boy about fourteen years of age, dressed in the costume of the Swiss peasants. The morning wind had dishevelled his dark brown hair, and his eyes appeared swollen from weeping; he seemed to be in deep thought as he filled his little basket with roses, and he seemed greatly touched by a rosebud which looked so delicate as it peeped out of the green leaves by which it was surrounded. To a close observer it was evident that he knew not what he did; from time to time he cried out, "O, Lillie, my dear, dear little sister; and so I must lose you,—also you—the last consolation left to me after my dear father's death: Oh, shall I never see you smile again—never will my labors be rewarded by your thankful looks; never shall your beloved lips say: 'Charlie, my own dear brother, these are the last flowers I can gather for you,' and oh, they are to adorn your death bed!" And thus he went on with this outburst of grief as he slowly strolled down to the foot of the mountain, entered a little cottage, and went into the room where his poor dead sister lay. He knelt down by her side, and as he looked into the pale, but angel-like face before him, his sobs gradually ceased;—he became more calm, and his lips moved in prayer.

He then arose, and taking the basket strewed the white roses over the silent death bed, buried a beautiful wreath among her fair ringlets, and placed the half-opened rose-bud in her little folded hands; and she too, indeed, resembled that rose bud, though pale, not less lovely, and as the rose-bud had been plucked from its stem, so had she been taken away from life before she had attained her full bloom. There were no signs of terrors of death to be seen in the quiet heavenly expression of that innocent face. The child seemed to sleep and to be dreaming of happy remembrances which caused a sweet smile to play upon her face. Two days had passed. It was the morning on which Lillie should be buried. For the last time Charlie came to cast a long and look at the beloved one; he took from her hand the faded rose bud, and pressing it to her cold lips, fervently exclaimed: "If I should ever be about to depart from the way of virtue I will look at this flower and it will remind me of you, darling sister, and preserve me from giving way to temptation; then I may hope to rejoin you in heaven," never more to be parted." One last fond kiss on the pale brow, and then he left her to the care of those who should carry her away to her dark cold grave. He could not accompany them, he had bade adieu and made the necessary arrangements with the clergyman of the village, and would now wander far, far away from his native village where nothing more was left for him to love or to cherish.

Thus he went away—away from his own loved home, guarding the precious rose-bud carefully wrapt up in his little bundle as a last remembrance of his fond Lillie. He often looked upon it during his long and solitary journey, it softened his fatigues and consoled him in his loneliness.

At length he arrived at Paris, where he had often to suffer hunger and fatigue. Often he was about to despair, often having sought whole days in vain for employment, but he looked on his rose and he began his researches again with renewed strength.

It is needless to say how he passed his time in Paris; how often he was nearly falling into the snares of the Evil one, and how often his little rose-bud,—the souvenir of his sister, protected him from all harm. One day he was sent by a merchant to take a parcel to a rich man's house. He was waiting in the parlor for the return of the gentleman; he took the rose out perhaps for the thousandth time in his life and gazed upon it, not noticing that the gentleman stood watching him. All at once he approached, and laying his hand gently on the boy's shoulder, questioned him thus: "My boy, why do you always look at that faded flower? I have already seen you do so before, and marked how attentively you fixed your thoughts upon it, and I told Mr. G——— to send you here in order that I might enquire its history. It is not from a mere curiosity that I have done so." "Oh, sir," replied Charlie, "it is a remembrance of my dead sister, and a safe-guard that shall always keep me from the broad paths of sin and vice and guide me into the narrow one of virtue." He then told the gentleman all we have already related, and in such a simple and touching manner that it brought tears into the eyes of his listener. "Will you stay with me, my boy? I, too, have lost a treasure,—my beloved and only son. I have wished for a boy whom I might have to cheer me in my old age. I will be a loving father to you; confide and trust in me." Charlie then flung himself into the outstretched arms of his new found friend that his rose-bud had procured him, and never again quitted him. He returned to see the graves of all his beloved ones, but then his native valley seemed so lonely to him that he soon left it. The rose-bud was now always kept in a golden case, and before his death he ordered it to be put into his hands, and expired looking upon it, his lips pronouncing at the same time the dear, beloved name of Lillie. The rose was placed as he had wished to the grave with him, and thus ended the history of a simple Alpine rose.—Our Young Men.

OBITUARY.

BARBER.—Thursday, Feb 24, 1887, Jennie Barber, son of John and Hannah Barber, after three days of severe suffering, aged 14 years and 20 days.

The deceased was a very promising boy indeed, very large for his age, intelligent and kind hearted. The 31st of last October while out hunting the breach bursted from his gun, striking him above the left eye and making a dangerous wound through which the brain could be seen. The physician visited him twice each day and dressed the wound. He soon recovered and we supposed was out of danger. He was not allowed to go to school on account of his eye being weak, but had resumed work and was seemingly well. Last Monday morning, Feb. 21st, he went with his father to work as usual, and in a couple of hours was taken with a severe pain in the back of the head, and came home. The doctor was summoned, but all that human hands could do was of no avail. Rapidly the grim monster death claimed our brother, and in three short days we had to realize more fully than ever before, the shortness and uncertainty of this life. The post mortem examination showed that the brain was filled with pus from the wound, which caused his death.

Brother Elton, of Cleveland, preached the funeral, Sunday, Feb 27th, to an audience of over three hundred. The comforting words were the hope of the soon coming of the Lord, and that this same hope has existed since the promise that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head, and will exist till the coming of the Master, was abundantly proven, "Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast." Is it not "a strong consolation to those who have fled for refuge, to lay hold of the hope set before us." Brother Elton had been here three weeks before and held a series of meetings in Goshen township, five miles from town. We have reason to rejoice that two young ladies, having a knowledge of the one faith, one hope, one baptism, were not ashamed to own their Master and be buried with him in baptism, arising to walk in newness of life. It had only been three weeks since Brother Elton closed his meetings and returned home. He, too, was much pained to so soon be called back on so sad an occasion. This is the third time Brother Elton has thus been sent for by the same family in less than two years; two years ago the 20th of this month to preach the funeral of Mrs. Emma V. Barber, an aunt, who died suddenly of pneumonia, and less than a year ago—the 25th of June—to preach the funeral of Hannie Barber, son of John Barber, who was sick only a short time with congestion of the brain. Thus the family is bereft of two brothers in less than a year. NANCY BARBER.

THE PALM TREE.

The lofty shade is o'er the lovely stream,
What through Judea's wasted valley flows!
The form is mirrored in the fountain-gleams
As lofty and as bright as long ago.

And still thy graceful leaves are gently stirr'd
By the soft breeze, beside the laughing waters,
As when at eve the voice of song was heard,
And feet with them pattered the steps of Israel's daughters.

By stately form still towers in Lebanon—
Still waves on Sinai's steep and Hor's sides,
And where upon its glowing top there glows
Glory resplendent men could not abide.

Yet now, perchance, by the tall trunk inviting
Some oriental wanderer of the Promised Land,
There waves a lonely but yet stately offshoot
Remembrancer of the glorious and the grand.

And more before his view the temple shines,
And "mount of snow" upon the sacred hill;
And he shall there those days, as they do seem,
The real brook murmuring from Siloa's rill.

WHAT THE BIBLE SAYS ABOUT IMMORTALITY.

The subject that is to occupy our attention is immortality, a subject which might be considered in many different ways, but that we are to consider in one way, which is not only the best, but the only way that is of any practical value. The existence of a conception of immortality, and a longing for immortality in the human mind, which sees in its daily surroundings nothing to suggest such a thought, is a very wonderful thing; the various ideas and opinions which have existed and do exist upon the matter, from the superstitions of the savage to the speculations of the philosopher and the visions of the Christian, these are matters of the highest interest and unlimited importance in an historical and philosophical sense, but there their uses ends. We want to know, not what the mind is capable of conceiving, but if any revealed truth meets and satisfies this conception and this longing that we have; if there is any real, satisfying sustenance to feed our hungry hearts. If that is to be found, we shall find it in the Bible, and nowhere else. We want to know, not so much what men have believed and do believe concerning immortality, as what they ought and we ought to believe upon the subject, and this we can only discover from the Word of God. Nature may have some analogies that suggest the probableness of the belief in a future and life forever; certain courses of reasoning may lead us towards such conclusions, while glowing dreams and visions of a boundless eternity may well enchain our attention and excite our hearts: yet not one of these can ever by any possibility afford us the needed knowledge, nor a basis for conviction. If that is what we desire we must seek for it in the Bible.

When we turn to the Bible for information, we, most of us, do so with our minds made up, and the force of habit is needed, not merely to interest and impress us, but, in many cases also to break down a barrier, if not of prejudice, then at least of previous conviction. I do not claim superiority to the influence of foregone conclusions, but will ask you to read with me such passages as concern our present enquiry, and we will do our very best to judge fairly and impartially.

Let us then proceed with our subject in the best and most fairly it seems to us by reading first of all those passages in which the word "immortality" occurs, and though we should go no further we may claim to know at first hand fully and conclusively "what the Bible says about immortality."

The first occurrence of the term is in 1 Tim. vi. 7, which let us carefully consider with so much of the context as may be helpful:—"Who (i. e., God) will render to every man according to his deeds: to them who by patient continuance in well-doing seek for glory and honor and immortality, eternal life; but unto them that are contentious, and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, indignation and wrath." Life is only in an incidental sense here. The Apostle speaks of immortality, but the allusion is none the less of the most definite character. "Glory, honor, and immortality," are the things sought for. We have not yet seen, immortality. The way for them is by "patient continuance in well-doing;" and the reward for seeking, "eternal life." More than this might only dim the luminousness of the passage alike in its intellectual and its moral meaning. It is clear and unmistakable.

The next occurrences of the term are in 1 Cor. xv. 53-54:—"For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality: but when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory." Take the detached phrase by itself, "This mortal must put on immortality;" it is very plain in its teaching that immortality was no part of the furnishing either of Paul or of those to whom, and for whom, he wrote, but something that had to be "put on." But look at the context and mark the general bearing of the passage. Paul's subject throughout the chapter is the Resurrection of the Dead, that is his main subject. But along with that there is another which he could not but associate therewith—the Coming of the Lord—the object of early Christian hope, as it ought to be the object of ours. This was regarded as an event which might take place at any time, and its occurrence during the natural lifetime of the early believers was the subject, if not of confident anticipation, at least of earnest desire. But whether they should be living or dead at that time they must undergo a change to make them physically fit for the destiny before them. "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption." Then, continuing, the Apostle seems to speak on behalf of the living, as he hoped himself to be:—"Behold, I show you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." Two words are here used to describe our present state—"corruptible" and "mortal;" other two, expressing the strongest possible contrast, describe what shall be the blessed experience of those to whom the Savior comes to take them to himself: "incorruptible" and "immortal." How great the love of God towards his undeserving children! how glorious the hope that is set before us! how grand the consummation that shall crown the ages of waiting and striving, when the uniform experience of mankind is at once contradicted and reversed, and "death is swallowed up in victory!"

Our next passage is also from the writings of Paul, 1 Tim. vi. 16. We read the context also, and begin at verse 13:—"I give thee charge in the sight of God, who quickeneth all things, and before Christ Jesus, who before Pontius Pilate witnessed a good confession, that thou keep this commandment without spot, unrebukable, until the appearing of our Lord Jesus: which in his times he shall show, who is the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords; who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto; whom no man hath seen, nor can see: to whom be honor and power everlasting. Amen." This is one of those passages, so numerous in the writings of Paul, wherein the wealth of his mental possession seems to make him lavish in his use of it. He is not careful to reserve his loftiest thoughts and choicest language for a glowing peroration. His style is exuberant throughout, ever ready to burst into bloom. On the bosom of the cold, black earth the loveliest flowers are growing, for the soil is full of food for them, and it needs but the winds and rains and sunshine of heaven to quicken them into abundant life and loveliness. So with the writings of Paul, for as argumentative and didactic as they generally are, yet his mind is so full of fructifying energy, so moistened by the compassions of Jesus, and so warmed by the love of God, that his utterances are at once beautiful with literary flowers and rich with moral fruit. In the passage before us he is charging Timothy to keep a certain commandment, without spot and unrebukable until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ. For this appearing he looked to God, "which in his times he shall show," at which point he breaks off into a glowing ascription of honor and power to him who is the Source and Centre of all. He is "the King of kings and Lord of lords," farther above the mightiest of human rulers than they are from their meanest subjects: compared with him they are simply nothing; he is "the blessed and only Potentate;" earth's great ones may try to shroud themselves in mystery and glory; he is "dwelling in the light, which no man can approach unto; whom no man hath seen nor can see." All creation receives its life from him, and some of his creatures he even endows with unending life; but he is the Immortal One, "who only hath immortality." Men rule on earth because he delegates to them "a little brief authority;" and men may become immortal, because he in his infinite goodness has promised them the gift; on "them who by patient continuance in well-doing seek for glory, honor, and immortality," he has promised to bestow "eternal life."

The next and last occurrence of the word is in 2 Tim. i. 10. We will read the context also and begin at verse 8:—"Be not then therefore ashamed of the testimony of the Lord, nor of me his prisoner: but be thou partaker of the afflictions of the gospel according to the power of God; who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began, but is now made manifest by the appearing of our Savior Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel: whereunto I am appointed a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles." There is something very beautiful and suggestive in this phrase (in the 10th verse) considered by itself, but its full significance is only to be apprehended when we read what precedes it, and mark its meaning too. We read, then, from the 9th verse—"Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling" (omitting the parenthesis) "which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began, but is now made manifest by the appearing of our Savior Jesus Christ." How grand and wonderful a thought is here! In the foresight and purpose of God, the saints (of whom were Paul and Timothy, and of whom you and I may be) were called with an holy calling in Christ Jesus "before the world began." The revised version gives it "before times eternal," a phrase of considerable ambiguity to the English reader, though suggestive enough too. This, then, was an intention and a certainty which existed throughout long ages, unrevealed, or no more than faintly indicated, to even the holiest men of old, but "now made manifest by the appearing of our Savior Jesus Christ." Then follows that most far-sweeping and all-embracing phrase, which seems to comprehend in its vast scope, past, present, and future; purposes, means, methods, and glorious consummation:—"who hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel." Since the transgression in Eden, Death the tyrant had ruled, and none dared dispute his sovereignty; now, he had been fought upon his own ground and utterly vanquished. And what of "life and immortality," the eternal opposite of death? These had indeed been seen afar off by some of the men of God in past ages. What glimmerings of light upon the subject there were among the Israelitish people in general, it is indeed hard to determine; and as for the rest of the world, though its wise ones may have guessed and theorized upon the matter, and its common people have been well content with a popular mythology or demonology, the true description of their state was that given by Paul, "without God and without hope in the world." But Jesus came to teach men of every race what they could not learn for themselves, and offer them what they could never obtain for themselves—life in place of death, life joyous and for evermore! Even through the gloom of night, the weary traveller rejoices to see the lights of the distant city twinkling out of the darkness like stars of hope; but, after daybreak, when its domes and turrets stand revealed in the clear air, all glorious with the morning sun, how inspiring the sight! And though yet there be a rough road to travel, with steeps to climb and valleys to pass through, he is gladdened by its beauty and cheered by the assurance of coming rest.

But now a truce to figures of speech: are there any plain direct statements in the Bible about this "life and immortality" which Jesus has brought to light through the gospel? We have read all the passages where the word "immortality" is used; they, with unequivocal and unvarying testimony, represent this attribute as one belonging to God and not to man, as something to be sought for, something to be put on, something which is "brought to light through the gospel;" what then has the gospel to say upon the matter? Speak, O ye oracles of truth! men have been speaking long and loudly, but what have ye to tell? Speak plainly and let us know! The word "immortality,"—we care not for the word—give us the thought, be it in any words; but O, as ye are faithful and true, resolve our doubts and assure our hearts for ever!

Hearken then, every one who would learn; hold up thy tiny goblet to the fountain of pure knowledge; drink, and it shall be life to thy soul.

The words of the Master himself were these:—"Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth My word, and believeth on him that sent Me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life," John v. 24. "My sheep hear My voice, and I know them, and they follow Me: and I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of My hand," John x. 27, 28. "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up; that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life. For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life," John iii. 14-16. Then here is the testimony of the beloved Apostle John—"And this is the promise that he hath promised us, even eternal life," 1 John ii. 25. "If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater: for this is the witness of God which he hath testified of his Son. He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself: he that believeth not God hath made him a liar: because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son. And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life in his Son. He that hath the Son hath the life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not the life. These things have I written unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God, that ye may know that ye have eternal life, and that ye may believe on the name of the Son of God," 1 John v. 9-12. And here once more are the words of Paul, words which contain in one sentence the essence of the whole matter, alike in its negative and positive aspects:—"For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord," Rom. vi. 23. One testimony runs through all these passages of Scripture; aye and one and the same testimony runs through all the Scriptures, from beginning to end: mortality, or death—to perish, to cease to be—is the penalty of sin; immortality or eternal life—the power of living for ever—is the gift of God through Jesus Christ. Though we should read a hundred more passages to the same effect it could not make the matter one whit clearer, nor the deliverance one whit more authoritative. This is "What the Bible says about Immortality," and if any man says aught to the contrary he does so at his peril.

Of course I am not unaware that multitudes of good, and learned, and wise persons hold and declare views the exact contrary of those which I have maintained to be the uniform teaching of Scripture; nor could I be ignorant of the fact that various passages are often quoted from which inferences are drawn unfavorable to these ideas. But such inferences must be false, because they are opposed to the plain declaration of the Word of God. It is reasonable to ask us how we understand this passage or that, in view of our belief regarding man's non-Immortality, but to argue from an inference to the contradiction of a plain statement, to set suppositions against facts, is a method of procedure to be laughed out of court in every-day life and utterly ridiculous and bad in dealing with such sacred matters. The Bible nowhere affirms the immortality of man, or any part of him; it again and again affirms the contrary; and there ought to be an end of the matter. Let even the voice of Christendom (though it should be an all but unanimous voice for many centuries), be hushed in a moment when God speaks from his high and holy place. The wisest, grandest, and most beautiful sayings of preacher, philosopher, or poet, are no more than so much babble and chatter when they say that which is not according to the oracles of heaven.

And now, dear reader, I might seek to drive the matter home to you and urge you to decide just now, once for ever, that what has been read as Scripture teaching on immortality is true, and that some of your most cherished convictions that have grown with your growth, and seemed of the very essence of your Christian hope are unscriptural, and therefore false; but rather would I urge upon you, and plead with you to "search the Scriptures daily, and see whether these things are so," and give your mind no rest till you have decided what is truth. O, there is a miserable, weak-kneed, twaddling sort of religion much in vogue which persuades itself that truth and error are all one if only the feelings be right, as though God gave us reason to use in all the affairs of every-day life, but not at all in what concerns our higher destinies! Surely there is no more fitting and noble use of reason than to learn the ways of God with men; and, having learned, to contend earnestly for what is true; and above all, to hold it fast.

But there is another, and a dread possibility before us, and that is that we may master the facts of the case, know all the pros and cons of the controversy, be able to quote numerous proof texts, to rebut all manner of objections, to fully vindicate our intellectual position, and yet have our hearts untouched. "Death," "resurrection," "judgment to come," "the doom of the wicked," "the gift of immortality,"—these are all most important points in the case, argumentatively considered, but what if they neither chill nor warm our hearts, much less affect our daily lives? We go on our way, sometimes wearily, often merrily, with but a distant and occasional thought of God, his judgment and his gifts; and it is in mercy as well as in wisdom that he now and again makes us pause upon our way—pause and consider. Did ever the Angel of Death come into your happy home and seize in his cold embrace one whom you loved as your very life? If so, then death has become to you more than a solemn word, more than a serious thought, even a dreadful reality. Or have you never had so bitter an experience? Still, surely, you have sympathy and a human heart, and can in a measure realize what the reality must be. Aye, there are very few of us who have not at times this unhappy verity deeply impressed upon our hearts. But it is a fact that we do not often dwell upon; and not alone because we are giddy and thoughtless, or too busy to find time for meditation, but also because of the instinctive abhorrence and dread with which we turn away from the subject. But for our sin, God has made us what we are, and he has implanted in our breasts that abhorrence and that dread; and why? we may reverently ask, if not because he has shown us a light beyond the darkness, a victory over death; "whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead" who went before to show us the way, and is coming to make us like unto himself when we "see him as he is." "I am the Resurrection and the Life," were his own blessed words; "he that believeth on Me, though he die, yet shall he live."

Thus God, our loving Father, who knows our loathings and our fears, our longings and our hopes, hath, through the gospel, promised us eternal life and shown us how it is to be attained, even through him who is "the Way, the Truth and the Life." The resurrection is an object of hope to the Christian, but it is an object of certainty to all. There is a "resurrection unto condemnation" as well as "a resurrection unto life." But why should any one of us have to stand ashamed, confounded, self-condemned before the judgment seat of God, and be sent away from thence to die "the second death," wherefrom is no awaking, when it might be so happily otherwise? "His yoke is easy, his burden light." We need not but hear and obey his loving call, who died for us and lives for us, and is coming back for us, if we be ready, to take us home to his heart. Oh! sad perversity of all who go upon that road, however broad and smooth it be, that leadeth to destruction! Hear, ere it be too late, the voice of thy Father who loves thee still, and calleth after thee with tenderest solicitude:—"Turn ye! turn ye! Why will ye die?"—Jas. Bowie, in Messenger.

EXPOSITION AND PARAPHRASE.—Heb. xi.

Now faith is the ground, or foundation, of those things which are the objects of hope, the argument of invisible things. And by this precious faith the elders both received and gave a good testimony, or witness, to the truth of God's promises. They received witness that they pleased God, and gave witness that they believed him by their lives and conversation; which plainly showed that they realized unseen things, and expected a future reward, and in that expectation endured all kinds of trials—believing the promise of Jehovah, that in the fulness of time all things should be united in Christ. Therefore they confessed a good confession,—the same which their Head witnessed before Pilate, confessing, "My kingdom is not now from hence." By faith alone we believe that the ages were framed, or fitted to their proper place, succeeding each other in God's own appointed time, at the very moment which he has ordained; the arrangement of these ages, or dispensations, having been committed to Christ. Heb. i. 2. By the same faith we understand that the things which are now seen were formed out of things which are not seen. By faith in the coming One, the woman's Seed, Abel offered a bloody sacrifice, knowing that without blood there was no remission of sins; and God witnessed that this gift was accepted, by consuming it with fire from heaven. Cain, standing in his own righteousness, presented only a thank-offering. No fire consumed it, and his countenance fell. The Lord condescended to inquire the cause, and to tell him that if he did well, if he was truly righteous, his person should be accepted; but otherwise, a sin offering must be presented. Blood must be shed, for he was a sinner. Abel's blood was shed; whereby he was the first martyr, or witness. By his faith he set us an example; or yet liveth, though dead; for they who are justified by faith shall live. Heb. x. 38. By faith Enoch was translated. He believed God's word; he had faith in the coming One, and was a preacher of that righteousness which the King will execute in the earth; and having thus given witness to the truth of God, he received a witness that God was well pleased with him:—he walked with God, and was removed from earth without tasting of death. But without faith it is impossible to please God; for faith is requisite to acknowledge the being of a God, and also to understand that he will reward those who diligently seek him. "To him that walketh uprightly is a sure reward." By faith Noah, being divinely warned of the destruction which was coming upon the earth, and having well received the warning, prepared the ark, when there was no apparent indication that such a calamity was approaching. By this faith in God's word, this realizing unseen things, he condemned the rest of mankind and was justified; he became an heir of salvation the moment he believed the word of God, and for more than a hundred years he preached this saving faith to the inhabitants of the world. When the judgment of God began to come upon the earth, Noah and his family went into the ark and were saved, while all others perished.

Jesus is risen and ascended into the heavens, the everlasting Gospel is proclaimed; and those who exercise faith in his words will, when he appears to judgment, be raised, or changed, and in immortal bodies enter into that place which he has prepared for their refuge.

By faith in the promise of God, Abraham became a pilgrim, and dwelt in tents or tabernacles, with the heirs of the promises, looking for that perfect tabernacle which is now invisible. Abraham looked for the city which hath foundations, of which David speaks, Ps. xlvi. 4; xlviii. 1; lxxxvii. 3, and to which Paul alludes—Gal. iv. 26, 27, compared with Isa. liv.—"the heavenly Jerusalem." Rev. iii. 12. By faith Sarah had a Son, and by faith the Virgin had the Son. Both believed that God was able to perform what he had promised, though no power of nature could accomplish it. There sprang from Sarah's son an innumerable multitude, according to the flesh; and from the Virgin's Son a multitude of spiritual offspring which no man can number. All these lived by faith, not having received the promises, but only having seen them at a distance, and gladly welcomed them; and they died in full assurance of being raised from the dead to immortality, to partake of them altogether. They confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims (Hebrews) on the earth, seeking an inheritance which was future. They might have returned to the country from whence they came out; but they looked not back; they did not apostatize; they had a longing desire for eternal inheritance; they regarded it with outstretched neck, looking through the long vista of ages with an assured hope of obtaining the crown; and therefore they contemned all the world could give as nothing, in comparison with that eternal inheritance which by faith they eulogized. God has not set a false hope before them; he has indeed prepared for them a city, and therefore he is not ashamed to be called their God. There is sufficient proof in existence, although it is yet invisible. For this the whole creation groans, and when the sons of God shall be openly manifested, the city which God hath builded shall appear as the place of their habitation. "The heritage of the Lord's servants is sure." Isa. liv. 17. Firm faith was manifested when Abraham presented his Isaac, the seed in which all the promises stood. Yet he believed that God would raise him even from among the dead, from whence he brought him in a parable. In this transaction Abraham saw the day of Christ—his only son and heir was bound willingly and laid upon the altar, dead, by the counsel of God for three previous days. He took him, raised him from the altar, as it was from the dead; and in seeing this he looked forward to the "Hour of the world" laying down his life and raising from the grave on the third day, entering into the heavens, and there taking possession of the purchased acquisition. Abraham rejoiced in the future day of Christ, and in faith the risen Isaac blessed Jacob and Esau concerning things to come. By faith the dying Jacob blessed both the sons of Joseph—worshiping the Rod of Jesse, the Angel who had redeemed him from all evil—looking to the end of that dispensation when the Lord should send the Rod of his power out of Zion, and rule in the midst of his enemies. Ps. cx. 2; Isa. xi. 1. By faith Joseph prophesied of the deliverance of his brethren from Egyptian bondage, and commanded that his bones should be carried into the Promised Land. By faith Moses was hidden by his parents, because they saw he was fair towards God, Acts vii. 20; therefore they feared not the king's commandment. By faith Moses denied being the son of Pharaoh's daughter, and acknowledged the oppressed Israelites as his brethren according to the flesh. He refused the temporal crown of Egypt, looking forward to the crown of eternal life, and preferred suffering with God's people to enjoying the pleasures of sin for a season. He esteemed the rebuke of Christ greater riches than all the treasures of Egypt; for he looked for the recompense of the reward—for that inheritance which would endure not for a few years only, but throughout the age of ages. To his faith was added virtue, or courage, and he feared not the king's anger. By faith he saw him who is invisible, and left Egypt, renouncing all worldly honors, and becoming a stranger in a strange land. By faith he celebrated the passover, he killed the kid, and sprinkled the blood on the dwellings of the Israelites, lest he that destroyed the first-born should touch them. By faith he led the people through the midst of the Red Sea; while the Egyptians, trying to follow him, were swallowed up in the sight of those to whom the water had been a wall on each side, as they marched through the channel of the river. By faith Rahab perished not with the unbelievers, who, though warned of the approaching fall of their city (for they heard the Lord had given the land to the Hebrews—Joshua xi. 9,) believed it not. But Rahab exercised faith in God's Word, and she was saved; she proved by her works that she had faith, she became an heir of righteousness which is by faith, and was one of those three Gentile women from whom descended the Savior of the world.

But time would fail to speak of all those who through the mighty power of faith overcame every evil, and even received the dead raised to life again. The world was not worthy of them! They are all witnesses to the power of faith, and they died without having received the object of their hope; God having foreseen some better thing for us, in order that they without us should not be made perfect. Every one of these witnesses, this noble army of martyrs, had faith in the promises of God; their hope was sure and steadfast; a "Hope which maketh not ashamed." The same promises are secured to us, who are fellow-heirs with Christ, their Heir of all things. The same hope of eternal life is set before us, and their example may serve to animate us in our surrender of all worldly advantages, and to support us in the confession we must make before an unbelieving world.—Wm. Ellis, in Christian Lamp.

The True Church of Christ.

The Church of Christ consists of all true believers of every land, age, complexion, and tribe. This structure is not bounded by narrow ecclesiastical limits. It is greater than any titled organization. It cannot be fully represented by theological views, nor can its census be taken from denominational statistics. No sect can justly claim, however correct its orthodoxy or high its standard of spiritual proprieties, to be the only Church of Christ. The New Testament knows of no exclusive community organized as the alone visible church. No society of kindred believers can arrogate to itself the ministry, the means of grace, and the sacraments. The foundation is Christ, the apostles, and the prophets: Jesus Christ being the chief, the corner stone, binding the old and the new dispensations into one.

The Church of God is the purchase of his blood, not a company united under a human head or by a human bond. The base and boundary of all believers are broad as the Bible, Christ, the apostles, and the prophets. The Lamb's Book of Life is the only correct register of believers. The Church of the First Born is not Roman nor Protestant, Greek nor Anglican, Episcopal nor Presbyterian, Baptist nor Methodist.

It is no national church, for no nation under heaven is big enough to give it name. It is nothing less nor lower than the great multitude which no man can number, of all kindreds and peoples and tongues. The foundation, laid in Zion, is immensely broad—broader than Plymouth Rock, broader than all the Augsburgs in Germany, broader than the seven hills by the Tiber. The corner-stone in Zion is firm enough for an immortal superstructure that shall rise above the sun.

WATCHMAN! WHAT OF THE NIGHT?

Say, watchman, what of the night?
Do the dawn of the morning fall?
Have the Orient shies a border of light,
Like the fringe of a funeral pall?

"The night is fast waning on high,
And soon shall the darkness flee,
And the morn shall spread o'er the blushing sky,
And bright shall its glories be."

But, watchman, what of the night,
When sorrow and pain are mine,
And the pleasures of life, so sweet and bright,
No longer around me shine?

"That night of sorrow thy soul
May surely prepare to meet,
But away shall the clouds of thy heaviness roll,
And the morning of joy be sweet."

But, watchman, what of the night,
When the snow of death is shed,
And the grass which no lingering star can light,
Shall be my sleeping bed?

"That night is near—and the cheerless tomb
Shall keep thy body in store,
Till the morn of eternity arise on the gloom,
And night—shall be no more!"

Paternity, Genealogy, Nature and Character of Jesus, in the Light of the Covenants; being two Lectures, with some Additions, Delivered at Wyoming, Delaware, by Dr. J. C. Thomas.—No. 4.

"What think ye of Christ? Whose Son is he?" Matt. xxii. 42.

I say the Father had revealed the great truth concerning his Son, to a number; not only to Mary and Joseph, but also to John the Baptist; who said, "I knew him not; but he that sent me to baptize with water, said unto me, upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending and remaining on him, the same is he which baptizeth with the Holy Spirit. And I saw and bare record that this is the SON OF GOD." That this is the way he was revealed or made known to John; who said to the Jews, "there standeth one among you whom ye know not." John i. 33.

The same great truth was revealed to the shepherds. The angel said unto them, "Behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people: for unto you is born this day in the city of David a Savior which is Christ THE LORD." Luke ii. 10, 11. Was this Joseph's son—a mere man? Did the angel tell a lie, when he said he was the Messiah, the Lord?

It was also revealed to Simeon, who waited for the consolation of Israel, the Messiah: "and the Holy Spirit was upon him: and it was revealed unto him by the Holy Spirit, that he should not see death, before he had seen the Lord's Christ." Luke ii. 25. Was this a mere man?

Thus we see that in those days the Father took various ways to reveal or make known the great fundamental truth that Jesus was the Christ the Son of the living God, who had been so long looked for. But all those various ways and circumstances have been made known by the Holy Spirit, (as Paul said) whose revelations have since been written down in words, to be taken and received by us as the Father's own revealed and most important truth, if we would know Jesus Christ whom he hath sent, and thus obtain eternal life. In those days he could be personally known only by direct personal revelation, but now by the Spirit's written words—the word of God, which plainly reveals and declares that most sublime and comprehensive truth, "GOD was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself."

Again, Jesus testifies concerning himself, sixty-three years after he went to his Father, as follows: "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and ending, saith the Lord, the God (see the Greek in the Diaglott, and the R. V.) which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty." Rev. i. 8, and verses 5, 7. From this we learn that Jesus himself testifies that he was God, or the Almighty, as before shown, and as he claimed when here in the days of his flesh; not the Father in person, but in origin, in Spirit, in name, in mind and character—the Father-Spirit, (The word "spirit," is used to mean the moral and intellectual powers of the mind, about two hundred times. Paul said he was "pressed in spirit.") the Father's only begotten Son—the one who was, as here testified, God manifested in the flesh, 1 Tim. iii. 16, and being now God in a higher sense, that is, in the nature, of his body, which at his resurrection was changed from flesh and blood, from mortal to the "divine nature," spirit-substance; whereby he became a born Son in Spirit nature, in whom dwells the Godhead bodily; previously the begotten Son. He is therefore, also the one who is, and the one who is to come, as Emmanuel, God with us; King of kings, and Lord of Lord's; when it will be said, "Sing praises for God is the King of all the earth;" and "the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and GOD HIMSELF shall be with them and be their God: and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain: for the former things are passed away; and he that sitteth upon the throne saith, behold I make all things new." Rev. xxi. 3, 5.

We see by all the above Scriptures the testimony of Jesus, plainly stated, as to his origin and paternity. We have no account that he ever once said or even intimated, in all his thirty-three years here in the flesh, that he was the son of Joseph, but invariably the reverse.

Now let us hear Paul's testimony. The very first thing after his conversion and baptism, was to proclaim the great truth. "And straightway he preached Christ in the synagogues, that he is the Son of God." Acts ix. 20. We learn by this Scripture two or three important things. First, that to preach Christ, is to preach that he is the Son of God. Second, that immediately he was taught and enlightened by the disciples of Damascus—Ananias and others—with whom he remained certain days; and by the Holy Spirit, with which he was filled; (verses 17–19); I say, by these means or agencies, in the hands of the Father, viz: the disciples and the Holy Spirit, and also by Jesus himself; Paul became one of "the taught of God;" see John vi. 45; he was taught what he did not know before, that Jesus was the Son of God. He was taught by those means, and by Jesus himself on the road to Damascus, that the one he was persecuting, and whose followers he was trying to kill, was not a mere man, a son of Joseph, an imposter claiming to be what he was not, as Paul up to that time had supposed, like the other wicked Jews; but that he was actually the expected Messiah the Son of God. And he was further taught that the first thing he was to do was to preach that great truth which had thus been revealed or made known to him. In writing to the churches at Galatia, and speaking of this great truth—the chief thing concerning the name, and the gospel—he says, he did not receive it by man, "but by the revelation of Jesus Christ. . . . .It pleased God to reveal HIS Son to me, that I might preach HIM to the nations." Gal. i. 16. (The Greek reads, "the Son of himself." See Diaglott). To preach Jesus therefore, that he is God's Son, "that he died for our sins, was buried, and rose again according to the Scriptures;" and that he is coming again to reign on the throne of his father David over the house of Jacob (the twelve tribes) forever, and of that reign—his kingdom—there shall be no end;" and that the kingdom will consist in "the restoration of the kingdom to Israel," is called preaching Christ, preaching the word, preaching the gospel. See 1 Cor. xv. 1–4; Acts viii. 4, 5, 12, 25, 35; Luke i. 32, 33.

Again, Paul says, "God . . . . hath in these last days spoken to us by his Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things, by whom he made the worlds, being the brightness of his glory and (now) the express image of his person;" Heb. i. 3; at first mentally and spiritually, now physically or bodily. When he was here in the days of his flesh, GOD was in Christ, Christ reconciling the world unto himself." Thus also, said Paul. Could this be a mere man?

Again, Paul says of him, as follows: "Who is the Image of the invisible God, the first born of every creature. For by him were all things created. (When he was the Logos or Power, the word with God, not as a person. See John i. 3. "He made the earth by his Power." Jer. x. 12.) All things were created by him and for him: and he is before all things, and by him all things consist. And he is the head of the body, the church, who is the beginning the first born from the dead; that in all things he might have the pre-eminence. For it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell." Col. i. 15–19. How is it possible for any person to think that such language as this could apply to a mere man?

But Paul said even more, viz: "In him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." Col. ii. 9. That is, at the time Paul wrote this, the body of Jesus had been made in its nature, like unto his Father's. He had been raised from the dead incorruptible. In the days of his flesh he was mentally or in mind like his Father, but after his resurrection his body also, was Spirit-substance, "The express image of his Father's person"—the very image of his substance, R. V. It is written that "God is a Spirit," and that Jesus also, is now "a life-giving Spirit." Webster defines Godhead, divine essence. What he calls divine essence, the word calls Holy Spirit—Power of the Highest. Hence Jesus from his conception and birth was in mind constituted of the Father-Spirit, the Power of the Highest—"all fulness." chap. i. 19. Thus "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself:" 1 Tim. iii. 16, by his Spirit; for God gave not his Spirit by measure unto him: John iii. 34; and at his resurrection, he was filled with the Godhead bodily,—in his body. So also are all the members of his body—all his brethren—ultimately to be filled with "the fulness of him." Eph. i. 23; iv. 13; "all the fulness of God." Eph. iii. 19. That is, those who in this life, by faith and obedience, "have put off the old man with his deeds, and have put on the new man which is renewed in mind by knowledge, after the image of him that created him;" Col. iii. 10, are Christ's brethren; (Jesus said, "my brethren are these that hear the word of God and do it.") and are ultimately to be conformed to the image of God's Son, in body, at the resurrection. Rom. viii. 29.

But again, Paul says of Jesus as follows: "Who being in the form of God, thought it not robbery, (usurpation, Dia.) to be equal with God." How would that sound applied to a mere man?

Again, Paul says, "Blessed be God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." 2 Cor. i. 3. It is very evident Paul meant that God was the Father or originator and producer of Jesus, in a very different sense from that in which he is Paul's or our Father.

Again, he says, "There is one God and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus." 1 Tim. ii. 5. It is evident that in the purpose of God, it was necessary that the mediator between God and man should be both Son of man and Son of God, Son of David and David's Lord, somehow. God sent his angel to inform Mary, the woman through whom that Son and Mediator was to be produced, "HOW this should be"—how God's purpose and word should be accomplished—how the word was to be made flesh—how the wonderful Being required in the purpose of God for Mediator, should be produced; and informing her that he should be named after his Father, God—called Son of God—Jesus—Savior—Emmanuel—God with us.

SHOALS, Ind.

Editor Restitution:

I read with delight many essays, sermons, discourses and letters written and delivered by the dear brethren and sisters of the one faith, who are for the time being isolated in body but are one and inseparable in spirit. Now God is a spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in verity. The delight which I experience from reading the sermons, discourses, letters and essays from the brothers and sisters, coupled with the study of the holy word, is heightened by the knowledge I gain of heavenly things, and riveting my attention to the words of divine inspiration, and ofttimes my faith more and more firmly to that within the vail, or to that unseen by mortal vision.

I notice in THE RESTITUTION of Feb. 23rd, a short but good essay from the pen of R. Coffman on the power of Jesus to heal diseases. And there are also many other things which Jesus did, the which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written. Amen. St. John xxi. 25. And as we cannot write upon the "many other things which Jesus did," we will have to write, if we write at all, upon things which have already been written, and written upon, although I doubt not that Matthew, Mark and Luke have written some of the "many other things" which John speaks about. To a mind credulous enough to believe that Jesus could raise the dead to life, would also have the credulity to believe that the Savior Jesus had power on earth to forgive sins. As sin is at the root of all diseases, the woman who touched the Savior's garment with great faith in his power to heal immediately, and believing that his great love for suffering humanity would not turn her away without healing, therefore her faith was doubly strengthened, and she simply touched his garment and was immediately healed. The occurrence is recorded by Mark, 5th chapter and 25th verse. A certain woman which had an issue of blood twelve years, and had suffered many things of physicians, and was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse, vs. 26.

No person will wonder at the account when he considers the therapeutics of the Jewish physicians in reference to hemorrhages, especially of the kind with which this woman was afflicted. Rabbi Jochanan advises to "Take of gum of Alexandria, alum and Cucumber-seeds the weight of a zuzee each; let them be bruised together, and given in wine to the woman who hath an issue of blood." But if this fail, take of Persian onions nine logs, boil them in wine and give it to her to drink, and say, "Arise from thy flux." But if this fail, set her in a place where two ways meet, and let her hold in her hand a cup of wine, and let somebody come behind her and affright her, and say, "Arise from thy flux." But if this should do no good, take a handful of cummin, and a handful of green Greek fern), let these be boiled and given her to drink and say, "Arise from thy flux." But if this should fail, dig seven trenches, and burn in them some cuttings of vines, not yet circumcised (vines not four years old), and let her take in her hand a cup of wine, and let her be led from this trench, and not down over that; and let her be removed from that, and set down over another; and in each removal say unto her, "Arise from thy flux."

Doctor Lightfoot gives these as samples out of many others. And from some of these nostrums it is evident the woman could not be bettered, and from some others, it is as evident that she must be made worse; and from all together it is indubitably certain that she must have suffered many things, and from the persons employed, the expense of medicines, and the number of years she was afflicted, as she was not a person of great opulence. It is most perfectly credible that she spent all she had. She was therefore a fit patient for the Great Physician. The case of this woman was a very afflicting one. 1st. Because of the nature of her disease; it was such as could not be made public without exposing her to shame and contempt. 2nd. It was an inveterate disease, it had lasted twelve years. 3d. It was continual; she appears to have had no interval of health. 4th. Her disease was aggravated by the medicines used—"She suffered much," etc. 5th. Her disease was ruinous both to her health and circumstances—"She spent all that she had." 6th. She was now brought to the last point of wretchedness and want, but although not quite to despair; she was growing worse, and had neither money nor goods to make another trial to procure her health. 7th. She was brought so low by her disease as to be incapable of earning anything to support her miserable life a little longer. It has been said, and truly so, that "Man's extremity is God's opportunity." Never could the power and goodness of God be shown in a more difficult and distressful case. And now Jesus comes and she is healed. She had formed her resolution in faith, she executes it notwithstanding her weakness, etc., with courage, and now she finds it crowned with success. Faith is the connecting link to secure the union of man to his Redeemer because the Savior says, "Ye can do nothing without me." And "I am the vine and ye are the branches." Poor trembling, loving lambs, be faithful a little longer, and your faith will soon terminate in full fruition. The reward of endless life surely awaits you, and a crown of never-fading glory awaits your (at present) throbbing, aching brows. It is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom. Now brothers and sisters, may you ever stand firm in the cause of your Redeemer, and at his coming and kingdom receive the crown of life that fadeth not away, is the prayer of one as low as your brother in the one faith.

O. N. MCDONALD.

To Florida—Very Cheap.

During the month of March the Vandalia Line will run a series of ten cheap excursions to Florida. Rates will be the lowest ever offered, only one limited fare for the round trip. Tickets will be sold on Tuesdays and Wednesdays in March. Stop-over of ten days allowed on the going trip at points south of the Ohio River. Don't fail to take advantage of this last chance for cheap excursion rates. For full information call on or write to any ticket agent of the Vandalia Line.

EXPLANATION OF LABEL MARKS.

Some having complained that they do not know what the marks on labels mean, we will just say, "Jny" means January, and when it is followed by a figure "6" and reads "Jny6" it means your subscription expired the first day of January, 1886. "Feb" February, "Mar" March, "Apr" April, and "May" are well understood, but "Jun" meaning June seems to confuse some, and to be taken to mean January, "Jun" means June, "Jul" is July, "Aug" August, "Sep" September, "Oct" October, "Nov" November, and "Dec" December. The figure following the month stands for the year, "1" means 1881, "2" means 1882, etc. A postal card of inquiry will bring you any information you wish.

The church of God at Cleveland, O., will hold meetings at 10:30 a. m. every Sunday (D. V. in Bland and Heller's Block, Rooms 28, 29, Ontario Street, Owner of Bolivar, north of Central Market. Feels free. Brethren from abroad of like faith and all searchers after truth are welcome.

Cheap Excursions to the South.

Excursion tickets to all points in Florida at greatly reduced rates will be sold by the Pennsylvania Lines West of Pittsburgh for five low rate excursions on Tuesdays, March 1st, 8th, 15th, 22d and 29th. Tickets will permit stop-over on the going trip at any point south of the Ohio River within ten days and will be good for return passage until thirty days from date of sale. The Pennsylvania Lines make direct connection at Cincinnati and Louisville with trains carrying through palace cars and day coaches to all Southern points, and offer you choice of the greatest variety of routes. These low rate excursions present unequalled opportunity for inspecting the Southern States and enjoying a sojourn in the Florida climate. For full particulars address the nearest agent of the Pennsylvania Company, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati & St. Louis Railway Company, and Chicago, St. Louis & Pittsburgh Railroad Company.

THE COMING AGE,

Nature and Proximity.

—BY J. P. WESTNER.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern invention, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar items, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the COMING AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand is in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the will of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 300 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $1.50. Send to this office for their work.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXVI. Read PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, MARCH 23, 1887. NO. 12.

THE RESTITUTION

Terms--TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

Payable in advance. Three and Six Months the same rate.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates "the actual restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief in the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for admission.

MONEY OR WEALTH.

"The love of money is the root of all evil: which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows." 1 Tim. vi. 10.

By this text we see the wholesome words of exhortation Timothy is to give to the church. For "godliness with contentment is great gain." Paul does not show that it is wicked to be rich in this world's goods, or righteous to be poor in them. He condemns neither the rich nor the poor. He knew that "The rich and the poor meet together; the Lord is the maker of them all," Proverbs xxii. 2.

We have Bible examples of some of God's people holding great wealth. When Abram was called out from his native country, he with his wife and nephew taking with them "all their substance which they had gathered," Gen. xii. 5. And later when they came up out of Egypt we read: "And Abram was very rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold," ch. xiii. 2. Of Job it is said, "His substance also was seven thousand sheep, and three thousand camels, and five hundred yoke of oxen, and five hundred she asses, and a very great household: so that this man was the greatest of all the men of the east," Job. i. 3. When calamity had befallen him he said, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." v. 21. And when God saw that Job sinned not in the day of his trial, "The Lord gave Job twice as much as he had before," ch. xlii. 10. "So the Lord blessed the latter end of Job more than the beginning: for he had fourteen thousand sheep, and six thousand camels, and a thousand yoke of oxen, and a thousand she asses," v. 12. This is a fair sample of the Old Testament Scriptures, and we find nothing in them that will condemn a man because he is rich.

And when a certain man who was rich came unto Jesus and said, "Good Master, what good thing shall I do, that I may have eternal life?" Matt. xix. 16, Jesus did not say to him, you cannot have eternal life because you have great possessions, but he called his attention to the law under which he lived, with this law he was conversant, and to it he was obedient, he was a man of good moral character. Mark says, "Jesus beholding him loved him," ch. x. 21. Thus far we find nothing objectionable to wealth.

Paul does not say, "Money" is "the root of all evil," as we sometimes hear it quoted, but he does say, "The love of money is the root of all evil." The love of wealth was always objectionable to God, because what a man loves he is apt to worship. So God charged the children of Israel saying, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me," Ex. xx. 3.

We see in Abraham's character a willingness first to honor God, his riches were secondary in his mind, God first, then wealth. Abraham was ready to sacrifice all of this world's goods for God. This is manifest in the obedience to God in offering his son Isaac. His generosity to man was also manifest when he separated from Lot, giving him his choice of lands. Job also loved God more than his riches, for when he was severely tried, he sinned not against God, and though his life became bitter to him, he was patient under all his trials.

But the certain ruler who came to Jesus, and asked him, "What shall I do to inherit eternal life?" Did not compare well in character with Abraham and Job. And while the sympathy of our Savior was moved by his high standard of morality, he proposed to put him under a test trial, as Abraham and Job had been tried, so Jesus "said unto him, One thing thou lackest yet: sell all that thou hast, and distribute to the poor, (with the promise) and thou shalt have 'treasures in heaven: and come, follow me. But when he heard these things, he became exceeding sorrowful; for he was very rich." Then Jesus turned to his disciples and said to them, "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God!" Luke xviii. 22, 25. R. V. But the young man "went away sorrowful, for he had great possessions," Matt. xix. 22. "Lo, this is the man that made not God his strength, but trusted in the abundance of his riches," Psa. lii. 7.

So Paul says to Timothy, "Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not highminded, nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy," 1 Tim. vi. 17. "If riches increase set not your heart upon them," Ps. lxii. 10.

Paul is very careful how he instructs both Timothy and Titus in their selection of overseers for the church, that they be "not greedy of filthy lucre," 1 Tim. iii. 3; Titus i. 7; "No lover of money." R. V. Peter also says, "Feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof, not by constraint, but willingly; not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind." 1 Peter v. 2. The deacons, too, should come to the same standard of character. See 1 Tim. iii. 8.

Money is a medium of exchange, it is an indispensable article, it is as necessary as our bread and water. Abraham purchased a burying place for Sarah his wife, with money, "Four hundred shekels of silver, current money with the merchant," Gen. xxiii. 16.

Jesus said, when the penny was shown to him, "Render therefore unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's," Matt. xxii. 21. And when Jesus and his disciples were out of money on one occasion he furnished money by the mouth of a fish that they might pay tribute, Matt. xvii. 27. Paul taught the same thing. He said, "Render therefore to all their dues: tribute to whom tribute is due," Rom. xiii. 7; many other Scriptures can be referred to, that will show the need of money.

The purpose of Paul, therefore is, to instruct the church to guard against covetousness. We should not set our affections on the things of this world, but "lay up treasures in heaven." Jesus said, "Ye cannot serve God and mammon." Now some had crept into the church, who tried to do this, so Paul said, "The love of money is the root of all evil; which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows." It is better then for us that we "flee these things; and follows after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness." Because, they that will be rich fall into temptation, and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition."

The trouble is when men covet after riches and obtain them, they become oppressive, overbearing, merciless, forgetting their first love, thus erring from the faith. James realized this when he said, "Hearken, my beloved brethren, Hath not God chosen the poor of this world, rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom, which he hath promised to them that love him? But ye have despised the poor, do not rich men oppress you, and draw you before the judgment seats?" James ii. 5, 6.

But this world's goods are only agelasting. For, "The rich man shall lie down, but he shall not be gathered: he openeth his eyes, and he is not." Job xxvii. 19. "For when he dieth he shall carry nothing away; his glory shall not descend after him." Psa. xlix. 17.

Yet for all this we see men, even men who profess to be disciples of Christ, who are craving after this world's goods, to heap to themselves riches, the more they have, the more they seem to want. Still wealth is an indispensable commodity, the enterprise of the world depends largely upon capital, it is a gift from God, to be used to accomplish his ends. While much has been used indiscreetly, yet much has been used discreetly. By it God's word has been published in many different languages and dialects, and spread upon the face of the earth. Like casting "bread upon the water, for thou shalt find it after many days," Ecc. xi. 1. By the sowing of this seed (the word of God), "God is taking out a people from among the Gentiles for his name." Acts xv. 14.

How much money has been used in the building of rail roads and steam vessels; the erecting of telegraphs, the laying of cables, and while men have used of their means for the purpose of pecuniary gain, yet in the mind of God, a much higher thought is manifest, and these things prove to us that we are living in the days of his preparation, for he said by the prophet Nahum, "The chariots shall be with flaming torches in the day of his preparation, and the fir trees shall be terribly shaken. The chariots shall rage in the streets, they shall justle one against another in the broad ways, they shall seem like torches, they shall run like the lightning," Nahum ii. 3, 4. And by these enterprises, "many run to and fro, and knowledge is increased," Dan. xii. 4.

And as Solomon desired an understanding heart God also gave to him, "both riches and honor," 1 Kings iii. 13. Solomon had the temple of the Lord to build, and the grandeur of this house was so great, that it required great capital. Therefore, as we are nearing the building up of the "City of the Great King," and the highway to it, the way of holiness, when "the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads," Isa. xxxv. 10. "It shall come to pass in that day that the Lord shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people, which shall be left, from Assyria," etc., Isa. xi. 11. "And they shall dwell in their own land." See Jer. xxiii. Great capital will be required to accomplish this end.

So now we see great riches in the hands of certain people, especially among the Israelites, even the Rothschilds, so that when God speaks, there will be no lack of means. God is never at a loss to accomplish his purpose.

Therefore, money is a great blessing, it accomplishes much good, it feeds the hungry, it clothes the naked, it has, and will accomplish all that God pleases. But if we through covetousness set our affections upon it, and make it our God, then it becomes a curse to us.

Is it not better than for us, to offer the prayer of Agur, "Remove far from me vanity and lies; give me neither poverty nor riches: feed me with convenient for me: Lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, Who is the Lord? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain," Prov. xxx. 8, 9.

EXPLANATION OF A MISUNDERSTOOD TEXT.

"For as in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive"—1 Cor. xv. 22.

This text does not speak of two races, as some erroneously teach, but of one race under two conditions. The Adamic race is the only race referred to; but they are referred to, first, as they now are, mortal, under the condemnation of death through the sin of Adam; and they are referred to, second, as they will be at some period in the future, raised again to life through the obedience of Christ. Temporal death and the resurrection from that death are the subject of this passage: death as a consequence of Adam's sin; resurrection as the result of Christ's work. To twist this text into any thing else, is to violate the laws of language, and lose sight of the particular point in the apostle's great argument. It is sought to limit the word all in the latter part of the passage to those who believe in Christ; and make the being made alive to refer to spiritual and eternal life. This can only be done by an utter disregard to the obvious point made prominent in Paul's reasoning, and by reading into the text what is utterly foreign to it. Whatever is meant by the word all in the former part of the passage, the same is meant by the word all in the latter part of the passage. And whatever is meant by the death that all die in Adam, the being made alive is its exact opposite.

The phrase "in Christ" in this text is clearly used in a different sense from what it is used in some other texts. It is generally used in the sense of being united to Christ by a living faith. But the latter part of the passage shows very conclusively that this is not the sense intended here. And the scope and bearing and design of the context should always be taken into account in deciding the sense in which any particular word or phrase is used. "So also in Christ shall all be made alive." Understand this being made alive to imply the future life hidden with Christ in God, or the new and endless life, and we make the passage to teach universal salvation. The life in this passage is not conditional on faith. It is as unconditional as the death. We die, whether we will or not, as the consequence of the first man's transgression; we shall be raised from the dead, whether we will or not, as the consequence of the second Adam's righteousness. It is surprising that any should interpret the being made alive of any thing but the resurrection. It is the resurrection that the apostle is treating of. The verse preceding the one in question reads, "For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead." The phrase, "as in Adam all die" means that death comes upon all men through Adam. It is a sequence of his transgression. Forfeiting immortality, becoming mortal by his sin, his progeny are also mortal. Death comes through Adam, or by the disobedient act of Adam, is clearly the meaning of the first phrase; hence the latter phrase, "also in Christ shall all be made alive," means that resurrection shall come through Christ, or in virtue of his propitiation. And the resurrection shall be co-extensive with the death. All mankind who have entered the death state through the first Adam, shall be resurrected, or made alive, through the second Adam. The analogy of Scripture requires this sense. The text, therefore, does not speak in the latter clause, as some teach, of a race "Who will come into spiritual life by spiritual begettal of the word of truth, and regeneration into spiritual life," and who will attain eternal life. The text teaches not only that those who are in Christ, in the sense of being spiritually begotten, or born from above, but that all in him, or through him, or by him, whether regenerated or not, shall be made alive, or resurrected.

On this text an old commentator has the following remarks: "As through Adam all men die, so through Christ, by virtue of his obedience, shall all men be restored to life again. It appears from what follows, that the apostle speaks chiefly in this chapter of the resurrection of the just, and not of the wicked; but yet the above two verses seem to speak of the resurrection in the general sense, viz., of both good and bad."

Another commentator, Theophylact, says, "For in Adam, i. e., because of Adam's transgression, all men fell under death; and therefore in like manner in Christ all shall rise again: i. e., because Christ was found sinless, and not subject to death, because he died voluntarily, and rose again, because it was not possible that he should be holden of death, being the Prince of Life."

From the copious notes of Barnes on this passage, we select the following, explanatory of the latter part:—"As the death of all was occasioned by the sin of one, even so, in like manner, the resurrection of all shall be produced by one. His resurrection shall meet and counteract the evils introduced by the other, so far as the subject under discussion is concerned; that is, so far as relates to temporal death. In Christ. By Christ; in virtue of him; or as the result of his death and resurrection." Thus, referring, to the view we are combating, he says, "But to this view there are manifest objections. (1). It is not the obvious sense; it is not that which will occur to the great mass of men who interpret the Scriptures on the principles of common sense; it is an interpretation which is to be made out by reasoning and by theology—always a suspicious circumstance in interpreting the Bible. (2). It is not necessary. All the wicked will be raised up from the dead, as well as the righteous, Dan. xii. 2; John v. 28, 29. (3). The form of the passage requires us to understand the word "all" in the same sense in both members, unless there be some indispensible necessity for limiting the one or the other. (4). The argument of the apostle requires this. For his object is to show that the effect of the sin of Adam, by introducing temporal death, will be counteracted by Christ in raising up all who die; which would not be shown if the apostle meant to say that only a part of those who had died in consequence of the sin of Adam would be raised up. The argument would then be inconclusive. But now it is complete if it be shown that all shall be raised up, whatever may become of them afterwards. The scepter of death shall be broken, and his dominion destroyed, by the fact that all shall be raised up from the dead."

This point is of such importance that we will also give the critical and explanatory note of Dean Alford, which fully confirms the above. "In Adam.....in Christ; in community with, as partakers in a common nature with Adam and Christ: who are respectively the sources, to the whole of that nature (all men), of death, and life, i. e. (here) physical death, and rescue from physical death. The practice of St. Paul to insulate the objects of his present attention from all ulterior considerations, must be carefully here borne in mind. The antithesis is merely between the bringing in of death by Adam, and of life (its opposite) by Christ. No consequence, whether on the side of death or of life, is brought into consideration.....is not so much as thought of, while the two great opposites, Death and Life, are under consideration. This has been missed by many interpreters, and the reasoning thereby marred. But the ancients, and the best of the moderns keep to the universal reference."

We have given, we think, the correct sense of the apostle's words, and trust our remarks will be prayerfully considered. Error on one point often involves error on other points, while truth must always be wholesome and beneficial.

BRIEF NOTES.

Brother J. P. Westhee's new book announced recently, I expect to want and order in due time. Its title and the author's masterly, mature and comprehensive teaching in his work on revelation, commends it (in general) to my mind and heart.

He stands out among expositors on such themes like king Saul in Israel—head and shoulders above the people. True, he had the subject opened by the partial fulfilment in advance of his predecessors. Our generation has witnessed wonders that have thrown light on the geography and chronology, the time, locality and order in fulfilling prophecy. This is now noted less I should fail of a word for his good cheer, to which he is every way entitled.

Brother E. A. Adams, March 2nd, noted his desire, if erring, to "be set right" as to "antichrist." Hence, with courtesy and brotherly love, it may be helpful for a would be "helper to the truth" to note some few facts that, in themselves, "set the subject right." The truth and right belong only to the revelation of "the times of the Gentiles" and their recorded accomplishment. The succession and adjustment of the facts "set us all right," if accepted and confessed.

1. Their number, however, varied in terms, is only and always given as "four." Their names are "Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece and Rome." Their internal changes and evolutions do not alter their number, succession or duration. Each one has and holds its name, number and revealed events of time to fill out the history—God's general record of "his goings!" It is the record of his fidelity to his word, and its realities through "the times of the ages." Faith thus stands in the power of God. These four are all "Gentile heathen or nations" in distinction from "Israel and the church" who have been separated for God's special purpose.

2. The symbol of "the fourth beast," Dan. ii. and vii., is distinct from head to feet, from its attainment of power to its fiery doom; and it completes "the times of the Gentiles." It gives place only to the kingdom of God. Dan. ii. 40–45; vii. 14, 18, 27, at Christ's coming with his saints!

3. Beginning at any one of the ten times number four, Rome is the last, but in Dan. viii. the prophecy begins with Medo-Persia, and then is the next in Greece, which leaves none for the last but Rome, "the fourth" of Dan. ii., vii., etc.

Note. This must be Rome, because of its exceeding greatness and the "fourth" of all ancient prophecy! Then this is confirmed by the historic prophecy of the New Testament! Nay it is written out in the world's whole history of prophecy fulfilled. Luke ii. 1; John xi. 48–52; Rev. xii. to xix.

"As for God, his way is perf—." 2 Sam. xxii. 31. Please brother read the outline of this "fourth kingdom" in the word, its desolation of Judea and Jerusalem, its harlot church, its martyrdom of the saints, and its prolonged oppression of the Jews. Matt. xxiii. 37–39; Rom. xi. 25; Rev. xvii. and xviii.

Then, no adding to or taking from chap. viii. will be indulged. Let each prophecy occupy its own place. Let Rome be fourth and last, give place only to the kingdom to come, and then "the times of the Gentiles" are followed by "the times of the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings!" All right! Amen and amen Psa. lxxii. 17–20.

These facts leave no room for a "future antichrist." It only exposes the "antichrist" of Christ's day and yet is, 1 John ii.; 2 John vii. etc., to his doom. "The little horn speaks great words till that beast is slain, his body destroyed and given to the burning flame!" Dan. vii. 11; Rev. xviii. 8–24. All heaven and earth then raise their hallelujahs! Rev. xix. 1–6.

Selections.

THE CHURCHES IN THE ASIA.

Did it ever have any special force with you, that the Apocalypse of the Apostle John was written to the churches or assemblies in the Asia? Is it likely, then, that it has to do exclusively, or even largely, with the churches in Europe and their history past and to come? Asia is by far the greater continent and the most populous. The Greek of Rev. i. 4 is Joanne tais epta ekklesiais tais en tee Asia—"John, to the seven ecclesias, the ecclesias in the Asia."

It has long been our wish to know the origin and meaning of the word Asia. In Trapp's Commentary we find the most satisfactory etymology which we have seen, but nothing as to its derivation, as to time and place, and the etymology is doubtful: eshjah, "the fire of jah or the Lord." Can you give us a better one? The Bible Dictionaries and Commentaries of our consulting, pass over the word with no hint as to its import, although words, whose derivation can be traced, are often honored with prominent mention.

We like what Michaelis, the German Commentator, says upon the subject of Asia as the field for much of the Apocalyptic visions. "We can not expect that prophecies, addressed to seven communities in Asia Minor, should be fulfilled only in Europe, or in the Latin Church. Christianity flourished under the Eastern, as well as under the Western Emperors. It was propagated likewise in Arabia, in Persia, in the Great Tartary, from the Caspian Sea to the borders of China, and even in China itself." He says that the histories of these Asiatic churches, scattered from one extreme of Asia to the other, are in the Syriac and Arabic languages, and not having been translated, as a rule are sealed books to Commentators, who are inclined to ignore the revolutions of Asia altogether, and write of the little they do know as if it exhausted the subject.

It is our belief, that a large mass of the millions of Asia, called heathen by the European and American, are disciples of our Lord Jesus Christ, and that their ancestors have been so since the days of the Apostles. The religion of our Lord is travestied, in a large measure, among them, as it is in Europe and America; but so did the Savior foretell that it would be. It is not becoming for black sheep to style others so as a term of reproach. Not only do we find the degeneracies of the Christian faith over Asia, but also certain phases, forgotten or ignored in the West, are preserved in better keeping, and therefore should be studied and sifted as the creeds and traditions of the churches of the West must, if we approximate to the whole truth.

We would have missionaries go to Asia as the merchant steamers do, namely, to carry a cargo both ways. We should beg, borrow, or buy, if it need be, the truths about Christ conserved in Asia.

Another matter of which we are strongly persuaded is, that large sections of Asia are occupied by the twelve tribes of the dispersion, addressed by the Apostle James in his epistle. That you may see some of the grounds upon which such conclusions are built, we quote from "The Apocalypse Interpreted," a work in three volumes, published by Jas. Nisbet & Co., Berners Street, London, 1867. Its author, Rev. Jas. Kelley, in commenting upon the drying up of the Euphrates, says, "It should certainly suggest to us, that some of the tribes of Israel may be concerned. And when we remember that of those tribes, ten were carried away to countries beyond the Euphrates, 2 Kings xvii. 11: whilst the word of prophecy is full of references, not only to their restoration in common with other tribes, but to their employment of God, in some remarkable way, as the executive of his will in treading down the anti-Christian nations,—we should not be unprepared for their introduction into the scene before us, as crossing the Euphrates from the region of their long exile."

The following is from the Book of Esdras: "Those are the ten tribes which were carried away prisoners out of their own land, in the time of Hosea the King, whom Salmanasar the King of Assyria led away captive, and he carried them over the waters, and so came they into another land. But they took this counsel among themselves, that they would leave the multitude of the heathen, and go forth into a further country, where never mankind dwelt, that they might keep their statutes, which they never kept in their own land. And they entered into Euphrates, by the narrow passage of the river. For the Most High then showed signs for them, and held still the flood till they were passed over. For through that country there was a great way to go: namely of a year and a half; and the same region is called Arsareth. Then dwelt they there until the latter time; and now, when they shall begin to come, the Highest shall stay the springs of the stream again, that they may go through".

"It only remains," says Mr. Kelley, "to account for the title kings, attaching to the ten tribes, according to this interpretation." On this point, perhaps, we should call to mind the predicted rule of Israel over the nations. That we read of them, that they are to be a kingdom of priests, Ex. xix. 6, that the children of the restored Jerusalem are to be made "princes in all the earth," Psa. vii. 27.

In another place in Daniel, we read that tidings out of the East and out of the North (the very regions assignable to the ten tribes) shall trouble him i. e., Anti-Christ, Dan. xi. 44. Hosea i. 11 reads, "And will be led together sons of Judah and the sons of Israel, with on accord, and they will place to themselves one archon (ruler), and will pass up out of the earth because great the day of, the Jezreel." This looks to a united condition, when the twelve tribes will be as one. In Is. xi. 10, 12, it says, "a sign he will lift up among the nations and he will lead them together the lost ones of Israel, and the dispersed of Judah he will lead them out of the four wings of the earth," etc. Psa. cvii. is probably a rehearsal of the varied marvellous experience of these favored tribes, as they pursue their way to the land of their fathers.—J. Cromett, in Herald of Life.

SINCE we have been Editing THE RESTITUTION the request has been made, several times, that we write something with regard to the Sabbath. With this request we will now try to comply; and we commence this week by writing an article under the heading of "Paul's Ministry." In the article for this week, and in the one that we propose to write for our next paper, our object is to ascertain whether a positive institution, that was made imperatively binding on a nation, by being inserted among the commandments "Engraven in letters upon the tables of stone," is made an absolutely binding on the churches of God, who are called out from the Gentiles by the proclamation of the Gospel of his Son, from the fact that those commandments were thus "written with the finger of God." We have chosen to take the course we do, and to head our articles in the manner we do, for the very good reason that Paul was acting, as an apostle and teacher of the churches, by the authority of the same God who thus wrote his commands in the tables of stone for Israel. If Paul, as an "able minister of the New Testament," or "covenant," teaches,—as he certainly does as we hope conclusively to show, —that the old covenant "written and engraven in stones," "is done away in Christ," and superseded by the new covenant, then the law of the ten commandments does not make the Sabbath binding on any community, person, or nation excepting Israel with whom God made that covenant of commandments. We write for our brethren, and ask them to give our articles a candid careful reading. We shall try to keep closely to the point, as there is such a thing as "writing all around a subject and never touching it." We shall also evade treating those that keep the seventh day with any degree of contempt for the course they take. Indeed, our aim will be to give our own personal reasons for not keeping what we regard as only the Jewish Sabbath.

EDITORIAL BREVITIES.

"While with face unveiled we behold as in a mirror the brightness of our Lord's glory, are ourselves transformed into the same likeness; and the glory that shines upon us is reflected by us even as it proceeds from the Lord, the Spirit." 2 Cor. iii. 18.

From Heb. i. 3, we learn that the Son of God is "the brightness of God's glory and the express image of his person," or as by Macknight "an effulgence of his glory and an exact image of his substance." From 2 Cor. iv. 4, 6, we learn that Jesus Christ is the "image of God," and that the "light of the knowledge of the glory of God (is) in the face of Jesus Christ." Christ is the manifestation of the glory of God; and when we steadfastly behold this divine glory shining "in the face of Jesus Christ," we are transfigured into the same likeness ourselves. "From glory to glory"—apo doxēs eis doxan—means that it is from the divine glory shining upon us from the face of our Lord that we are transformed into glory, or into the same glorious likeness.

LAMECH.

And Lamech said unto his wives, Adah and Zillah, Hear my voice; ye wives of Lamech, hearken unto my speech; for I have slain a man to my wounding, and a young man to my hurt. If Cain shall be avenged seven-fold, truly Lamech seventy and seven-fold. Gen. iv. 23, 24.

It is supposed that this is the most ancient piece of poetry in the world. We will give two versions of this ancient song which will better give the meaning of its author.

Adah and Zillah hear my voice;
Ye wives of Lamech hearken to my speech;
For I have slain a young man because of my wounding;
A young man because of my hurt.
If Cain shall be avenged seven times,
Certainly Lamech seventy and seven.

Another reads:

Adah and Zillah hear my speech,
Ye wives of Lamech, mark my words:
I have killed a young man in return for a blow;
A young man in return for a stroke;
Cain they say, if killed was to be revenged seven times,
But Lamech (as this will shows) will be revenged seventy times seven.

We learn that Lamech revenged an insult or injury, done to him by a young man, by killing him.

PAUL'S MINISTRY.

"The glorious gospel of the blessed God, which was committed to my trust. And I thank Christ Jesus our Lord, who hath enabled me, for that he counted me faithful, putting me into the ministry." 1 Tim. i. 11, 12.

From the first verse of this chapter we learn that Paul was an "apostle of Jesus Christ by the commandment of God our Savior, and the Lord Jesus Christ, which is our hope." From the verses quoted above we learn also that he was put into the ministry of "the glorious gospel of the blessed God" by "Christ Jesus our Lord." In order to have a perfectly definite idea of Paul's ministry we will quote at length his own statement from 2 Cor. iii. 6-18, using the translation of Conybeare & Howson in their "Life and Epistles of St. Paul." vol. ii. pp. 101-103.

After stating his own insufficiency to originate anything from his own reasonings he says: "But through Christ have I this confidence before God; not thinking myself sufficient to gain wisdom by my own reasonings, as if it came from myself, but drawing my sufficiency from God. For he it is who has made me suffice for the ministration of a new covenant, a covenant not of letter, but of spirit; for the letter gives the doom of death, but the spirit gives the power of life. Yet if a glory was shed upon the ministration of the law of death, (a law written in letters, and graven upon stones), so that the children of Israel could not fix their eyes on the face of Moses, for the glory of his countenance, although its brightness was soon to fade; how far more glorious must the ministration of the Spirit be. For if the ministration of doom had glory, far more must the ministration of righteousness abound in glory. Yea, that which then was glorified with brightness is now turned into darkness by the surpassing glory wherewith it is compared. For if a glory shone upon that which was doomed to pass away, much more shall glory rest upon that which abides forever. Therefore, having this hope (in the abiding glory of the New Covenant), I speak and act without disguise; and not like Moses, who spread a veil over his face, that the children of Israel might not see the end of that fading brightness. But their minds were blinded; yea to this day, when they read in their synagogues the ancient covenant, the same veil rests thereon, nor can they see beyond it that the law is done away in Christ; but even now when Moses is read in their hearing, a veil lies upon their heart. But when they turn to the Lord Jesus, the veil is rent away. Now the Lord is the Spirit; and where the Spirit of the Lord abides, the bondage gives place to freedom; and we all, while with face unveiled we behold as in a mirror the brightness of our Lord's glory, are ourselves transformed into the same likeness; and the glory which shines upon us is reflected by us, even as it proceeds from the Lord, the Spirit."

In v. 14 it is not the veil that is done away in Christ, but the covenant or law, "graven in letters on stones," as will be seen by the above rendering, and which is the exact meaning of the original text. These translators remark in a note with regard to this rendering, "We take ep autois mexri sēmeron absolutely (with Meyer); literally, it being not unveiled (i. e., not revealed) to them that it (the ancient covenant) is done away in Christ. Katargoumenon is predicated, not of the veil, but of the old covenant. Compare katargoumenēs in the preceding verse, and the use of the same word in verses 7 and 11."

We will in the next place, quote Macknight's paraphrastic translation of this text, with his critical note in proof of his rendering of this 14th verse of this chapter. "Now as was typified by the veil on Moses' face, the minds of the Israelites were permitted to remain blinded: For, until this day, the same veil remaineth in the reading of the old covenant; it not being revealed to the Israelites that it is abrogated by Christ, to whom all its types and figures have been fulfilled."

His note is to this effect on his rendering: "The same veil remaineth in the reading of the old covenant, etc.—that is, The thing typified by the veil on Moses' face hath taken place from that time to this day. For when the Israelites read Moses' account of the old covenant of the law, a veil lieth on that covenant. Its types and figures, and prophecies, are as dark to them as ever; it not being discovered to them, that they are all fulfilled in Christ; and, consequently, that the old covenant itself is abolished by him. Further, as the apostle observes in verse 15, a veil lieth also on the heart of the Jews when they read Moses. Besides the natural obscurity of the old covenant, there is a second veil, formed by their own prejudices and lusts, which blinds them to such a degree, that they cannot discern the intimations which God, in the law itself, hath given of his intention to abrogate it by Christ." Wakefield gives the same sense in his translation: "Until this very day the same veil remaineth over the reading of that old covenant not discovered to be done away in Christ." What the Jews know about the old covenant was derived from hearing it read in the synagogues every Sabbath day, as there were no printed books in that age. See Acts xv. 21. Wakefield therefore gives the meaning correctly that those who listened to "the reading of that old covenant" did not learn that it—the old covenant—was done away in Christ.

To this same effect are the notes of Jamieson, Faussett & Brown, in their Critical, Practical and Explanatory Commentary of the Old and New Testaments. On v. 13 they say: "Paul here passes from the literal fact to the truth symbolized by it, the blindness of Jews and Judaizers to the ultimate end of the law; stating that Moses put on the veil that they might not look steadfastly at (Christ, Rom. x. 4) the end of that (law) which (like Moses' glory) is done away." Again, speaking on v. 14, they say: "The same veil remaineth untaken away (literally, not unveiled), so that they do not see THAT it (not the veil as English Version, but 'THE OLD TESTAMENT,' or covenant of legal ordinances) is done away (ch. 7, 11, 13) in Christ."

In Deuteronomy v. 1-22, Moses speaks of the covenant made with Israel in the limited meaning as only embracing the ten commandments written in two tables of stone, and it is this very "old covenant" thus "written and engraved in stones," as a limitation, which Paul declares is "done away in Christ."

This Old Covenant, that was done away in Christ was wholly superseded by the New Covenant of which the apostles were made the ministers. When one covenant is superseded by another all the positive institutions of the covenant that is done away are abrogated, and not binding under the new covenant unless positively re-enacted. The ordinances concerning sacrifices, annual festivals—such as the Passover—meats and drinks, holy days, New Moon and Sabbath days, of the abrogated covenant disappear with the covenant, with and of which they constitute an essential feature. Paul was made an apostle by the command of God, and by the appointment of our Lord Jesus Christ, and it is obvious enough to every unprejudiced reader, that he, as a minister of "the gospel of God,"—Rom. i. 1—does not make the observance of the seventh day any more binding upon those under the new covenant arrangement because it was "written in tables of stone." But not to be too lengthy, we will reserve the remaining part of our argument, on these same grounds, for our next paper; and see further as to the manner Paul treats the institutions written on the stone tables as to their being binding upon Christians.

Exegetical.

The Terror of the Lord. 2 Cor. v. 11.

It is of this text that the late Dr. James W. Alexander says: "Among perverted texts none suffer more than this: 'Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we persuade men.' Very pretty theories are spun out of it. But look at the Greek. Ton phobon tou Kuriou. This is the unvarying expression for the fear of the Lord, or true religion, and everywhere else is so translated; and why not here also, as well as in Acts ix. 31, where it is said, "the churches had rest and were edified, and walking in the fear of the Lord (the very same expression) and the comfort of the Holy Ghost, were multiplied." And he then refers to several other passages of the Bible where the expression or its equivalent has the same unvarying meaning.

And so Alford says; "There are few texts so perverted as this, owing to the rendering of our authorized version. It is frequently understood and preached upon as if it meant, knowing how terrible God is, we persuade others to fear him, a meaning as far as possible from the apostle's mind."

Alford understands the passage as a strong declaration of Paul's honest and plain dealing in the estimate of men, which he would have manifest to them as it is to God. The apostle's adversaries had virtually charged him with insincerity and double dealing, but he, as a faithful Christian man, inwardly conscious that the great principle of the fear of the Lord was guiding and leading him, would persuade them—of what? Some say of the truth of the gospel he preaches, so as to win them to it, which, though it might suit the rendering of the expression, can hardly be the right meaning, as the stress is laid on the fact that it is men he would persuade. Chrysostom and others say, persuade them of his entire sincerity and integrity, as the language of the entire context evidently refers to himself. And Alford, and most of the best commentators, agree with this interpretation. The apostle would say, "To God we are manifest, and have no need to persuade or convince him of our integrity, for he knows all things; and I trust, also, that we are made manifest to your consciences. As a sincere terror of God, I appeal not merely to him, but to men, that my conduct and all my aims are marked by sincerity and plain dealing. Knowing myself, experimentally, the fear of the Lord—speaking as a sincere and earnest Christian—I would have you Corinthians feel that it is the love of Christ that constrains me to plead with you; not that I would urge you by the motive of terror and wrath, but that as one truly fearing and loving God, I would so persuade you of the truth I am preaching as to win you to Christ as the only Savior." The whole current of thought throughout the chapter, and the entire context, seem to point to this meaning. Certainly the expression, "terror of the Lord," is an unfortunate and misleading translation. —Tyron Edwards, D. D., in N. Y. Observer.

Passover Wine.

Whether the Jews used fermented wine in the Passover services has been a question hotly disputed. The probabilities on the ground of the rigid exclusion of leaven from the Passover are altogether against the use of fermented wine. We give the following interesting testimony from an exchange:—

The editor of the London Methodist Times lately witnessed the celebration of the Jewish Passover in that city, and at the close of the services said to the rabbi: "May I ask with what kind of wine you have celebrated the Passover this evening? The answer promptly given was: 'With a non-intoxicating wine. Jews never use fermented wine in their synagogue services, and must not use it on the Passover, either for synagogue or home purposes. Fermented liquor of any kind comes under the category of 'leaven,' which is prescribed in so many well-known places in the Old Testament. The wine which is used by the Jews during the week of Passover is supplied to the community by the chief rabbi's board, and by those only. Each bottle is sealed in the presence of a representative of the ecclesiastical authorities. The bottle standing yonder on the sideboard, from which the wine used tonight was taken, was thus sealed. I may also mention that poor Jews who cannot afford to buy this wine make an unfermented wine of their own, which is nothing else but an infusion of Valencia or Muscatel raisins. I have recently read the passage in Matthew, in which the Paschal Supper is described. There can be no doubt whatever that the wine used upon that occasion was unfermented. Jesus, as an observant Jew, would not only not have drunk fermented wine on the Passover, but would not have celebrated the Passover in any house from which everything fermented had not been removed. I may mention that the wine I use in the service at the synagogue is an infusion of raisins. You will allow me, perhaps, to express my surprise that Christians, who profess to be followers of Jesus of Nazareth, can take what he could not possibly have taken as a Jew—intoxicating wine—at so sacred a service as the sacrament of the Lord's Supper."

A Catholic paper, the Western Watchman, says that "Protestantism is a weed that grows in the dark and decays in the sun. In cellars of isolation and under the umbrageous shade of backwoods timber, it thrives best." Such falsehood is more shocking than surprising, when we consider the source from whence it comes. Protestantism is based on an open Bible, in the hands of the masses in their own language; its doctrines are preached with open doors, and everybody is invited to come and hear and investigate; its aim through its public schools, its colleges, its seminaries and its churches has always been to enlighten the masses. Will Catholicism put the open Bible in the hands of its members, open the doors of its convents and nunneries, translate its ritual into plain English, take away the veil from before the confessional, and expose the practices of its priesthood to the same light as that in which the life of other men is seen? It dare not do it. The 'weeds' which grow in 'cellars of isolation' would melt away before the sunlight, thus set in on them, as the dew of a summer morning. Set in the light, Mr. 'Watchman.'—Sabbath Recorder.

Silent Forces.

Workmen in stone quarries sometimes find a very hard kind of rock. They pick little grooves for the iron wedges, and then, with great sledge-hammers, drive and drive the wedges into the flinty rock. And yet, once in a while, they fail to divide the solid mass. The iron wedges and the sledges prove useless, and the workmen wonder at the stubborn rock.

But there is yet another way. The iron wedges are removed from the narrow grooves. Then little wooden wedges, of a very hard fiber, are selected. Now you begin to shake your heads and think, "Well, if iron wedges will not do how is it possible for wooden wedges to be used successfully?" Just wait. The sharp well-made wooden wedges are first put into water. They are then inserted in the grooves tightly while wet, and water is kept in the grooves, and no sledge is needed to drive them. They would break under the severe blows of the ponderous hammer. But the workmen just let the wet wedges alone, and they will do what the driven iron failed to do. The damp wood swells; the particles must have room to enlarge, and the granite hearts of rocks cannot withstand this silent influence. In a little while the solid rock parts from top to bottom, and the workmen's will is accomplished.

It is so, often in other things. What noise and visible effort failed to do, some quiet power, when applied, will surely achieve. Teachers may remember this fact in mechanics, and manage some very stubborn natures by the application of the silent forces. The iron and the sledge-hammers often fail. But tears, prayers, and a patient example never fail.—Alexander Clark.

The Uses of Adversity.

That which is most precious in character, and which is of most service to others as an outcome of character, is never made manifest except under pressure. The Arabs have a proverb: "Nothing will get oil out of an olive but crushing it." And this is only another phrasing of the thought of Bacon: "Virtue is like precious odors, most fragrant when they are incensed (burned) or crushed." Only when the alabaster vase of perfumed oil was crushed, by Mary of Bethany, did that possession of hers rightly honor her Master; and only then did its fragrance fill the house, and begin its filling of the air of all the world beyond. It is not pleasant, but it is good, to have one's character brought under that crushing pressure of adversity, or of other trial, which shall force out its best influences—as a means of gain to one's self and to one's fellows. As wise Seneca said: "The good things which belong to prosperity are to be wished for; but the good things which belong to adversity are to be admired." Chastisement from God is a sure evidence of the love of God; but, as the first, God's loving chastisement seemeth not to be joyous but grevious.

Veracity.

The habit of veracity cannot be overestimated in importance if we really desire to enjoy the fulness of Christian experience. We do not refer to wilful and secret prevarication—much less to open falsehood. Such are conceded to be despicable, and are positively destructive to all manly character. We refer rather to that secret withholding of the truth by which one party may mislead another, in matters trivial or important. Genuine honesty in our intercourse should not arise from mere motives of policy, but from a lively sense of what eternal rectitude is in itself, and also from just views of what that rectitude requires of all responsible intelligence.

In Dawson's newest work ("Egypt and Syria; their Physical Features in Relation to Bible History") special attention is paid to the two chief neighbors of Israel in relation to the physical character of the country and the problem concerning their earliest settlements. Contrary to the assertions of many Egyptologists, who claim that Egypt was settled as early as five or six thousand years before Christ, he maintains that the character of the Nile valley points to a settlement of only about three thousand years before Christ, and that the immigration came from the southwest. He claims that the first builders of Memphis were the immediate successors of the generation that survived the flood, and may in part have been their contemporaries. The mysterious Hyksos, who seemed to have ruled over Egypt in the days of Jacob and Joseph, are considered by Dawson to have been Asiatic immigrants of a Turanian or Mongolian type. Their pictures on old Egyptian monuments show a resemblance in face and attitude to the Red Men of North America. He interprets the name Hyksos as Og-(Huk)-Susim, which is interpreted "King of Husim." Ct. Gen. xxi. 5.—Old Testament Student.

"I Shall Not Hold Out."

This is one of the most common responses which the heart makes to the claims of Christ.

"I should like to be a Christian, but I should be ashamed to begin and fail."

Ah, faint heart, where are your spiritual ears? Have you not heard God's voice saying to you, "My grace is sufficient?" You have pictured yourself walking along the heavenly way; but you shall not be alone, for the Lord will go before you. And the God of Israel shall be your rear-ward; and if you trust him you shall not be ashamed.

"Oh, yes," you say, "but think of the difficulties."

Think rather of the promises: "The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms. I will not leave thee nor forsake thee. Being confident of this very thing, that he that hath begun a good work in you will perform it unto the day of Jesus Christ." Does not your heart smite you for saying in the face of such promises as these, "I fear I shall not hold out?" Throw to the winds your fears, and put a cheerful courage on.

Do not waste these golden moments in dallying between "I would like to" and "I fear to;" but trust in God and go forward, and the difficulties which seem to stand as high as mountains before you shall be found to be like the Egyptian pyramid, which at a distance seems insurmountable, but which on a nearer approach proves to be provided with steps which reach to the very top.

Hints for the Prayer Meeting.

The lack of interest in conference and prayer meetings in our churches has led a writer in the Christian Leader to furnish the following suggestions regarding the same: "They only need to be conducted in the height of simplicity. There should be brevity all around, and all along the line; brief Scripture, brief praying, brief singing, brief remarks. A few words at a time, as full of feeling as possible, words that will breathe and burn; no discussion, no logical discourse is called for, we can have them in all other meetings. We should strive to make our conference meetings, wherever we hold them, just so many Mounts of Transfiguration, where heaven shall be brought all the nearer to earth, where all present shall feel that they have been made to sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus."

Publisher's Notes.

As there are five Wednesdays in March, and we issue but four papers each month, our next issue will bear date April 6, 1887.

Bro. H. R. Carter's address is now Bitter Creek, Kansas, Care of I. M. Vickery. Bro. Carter has samples of THE RESTITUTION, and is authorized to receive subscriptions for it.

In making inquiries that are for your own use, and are no special concern of ours, please enclose a card or stamp to pay the postage on the answer. We are willing to answer all inquiries made by our friends, but think in simple justice you should pay the money expense.

We have this week sent letters to each one of our subscribers whose time has expired. This is done for the purpose of coming to a full understanding with our patrons. Last year we were obliged to cease sending our paper to quite a number whose individual accounts were small, but in the aggregate amounted to several hundred dollars. We do not wish to repeat this, and so ask each one whose time is out, to correspond at once with us, and if you cannot renew now, state when you can, and then when the promised time comes do not wait to be urged again. We are willing to wait the convenience of our friends so long as we are assured of their good faith. We expect to hear promptly from each and every one who receives a letter as above stated. Any one who cannot pay for the paper will be supplied free, by asking for it.

We are enabled to announce to our readers that Mr. F. M. Atwood, of Chicago, Ill., has arranged so that we can furnish Brother J. H. Pettingell's "Unspeakable Gift" at half price. See advertisement elsewhere.

Read our book list—The Emphatic Diaglots reduced from $4.00 to $2.50. Cruden's Complete Concordance to the Bible, for $1.50. Smith's Bible Dictionary only $1.50. Views and Returns in Eschatology—the last work of J. H. Pettingell—for $1.00. Do not fail to secure this book, it is good, and worth double the price asked for it. The Eastern Question, Bro. J. P. Weethee's new book. Just out—price $3.50, or with The Coming Age, $4.00 for the two. Tracts for distribution by the pound for 60 cents.

Miscellaneous.

Sir Charles Wilson declares that in 1864, when he first went out to survey Palestine, the great plain of Esdraelon was periodically raided by Bedouin from the east of Jordan, so that a man was said rarely to reap what he had sown on that plain. Now he asserts it is all changed. The whole "plain is well cultivated, and in harvest time is a waving mass of grain." The country is more settled, and there is a great increase in planting and extension of vineyards and olive groves. The Latin monks of Mount Carmel have done all they could to hinder the work, but the energy and patience of the Wurtembergers have succeeded in making the colony prosperous.

In Breslau one missionary has during the year baptized 127 Jews.

Delitzsch's Hebrew translation of the New Testament continues to be a wonderful missionary agency. It has now found its way to the Jews of Siberia, and has seemingly entered there also on its mission conquering and to conquer, as it has done in the Eastern provinces of European Russia, where no less than 80,000 copies of the work have been scattered among the Jewish people. The Jews of Siberia are reading the translation with avidity, and a movement has been inaugurated among them that much resembles that in Kischneff, in Bessarabia. These Jews are but little acquainted with the Talmud, and are for this reason, thought to be more open to gospel influences. The Testaments are sold and are distributed from the city of Tomsk.

SURNAMES.

It is a common error to suppose that surname is a corruption of sire-name, and only another way of saying father's name. The word either means over-name—a name given over and above the Christian name—or had its origin in the fact that at first the family name was written over (sur) the other name, as

"de Cobbeham
John."

Names, certainly, go back to Adam, but the origin of the surnames is nothing like so remote. They cannot be traced much farther back than the latter part of the tenth century. They were first employed in France, and particularly in Normandy, and at the Conquest were brought into England. According to Mr. Lower, the practice of making the second name customary and transmitting it to descendants came gradually into common use during the eleventh and three following centuries. It was not, however, established on anything like its present footing till the time of the Reformation. The introduction of parish registers may have materially contributed to encourage the practice. Till the twelfth century surnames were little used in Scotland, and for a long time they were very variable. The fashion was set in Scotland, and, indeed, everywhere else, by the noble families, the common people being slow to follow it.—Cassell's.

RAMSES II.

Many tourists when at Cairo have visited the site of Memphis, a few miles distant, near Sakkara, and have seen the prostrate statue of Ramses II., lying on its face in a ditch. It is a monolith of fine limestone, about thirty-eight feet long. This statue is soon to be partially raised and inspected, and if the authorities approve, will be restored to some place of honor. Says a writer in the Academy: "It was erected by the king as a thank-offering for escape from a treacherous death by burning at Pelusium. In Strabo's time it stood alone in the anterior court of the great temple of Ptah, at Memphis, the court at that time being used for bull-fights. The head wears the 'pshent,' with the Uræus snake. An artificial beard is attached to the chin. On the breast is a pouch, prototype of those worn by Jewish priests. In the centre is the king's name, 'God of the Sun, mighty in truth, approved by the Sun.'

"The interest of the fallen Rameses, now so soon to be raised to his feet, is this—that his features, which have never been fairly seen full face, will now be visible, and we shall be able to compare them with the features of the mummy unwrapped and visible in the Bulak Museum. The face, as seen partially, is strongly Semitic."

THE SORROWING JEW.

He is mourning alone, no kind friend is near,
His woe-stricken spirit to heal and to cheer;
There seldom descends blessed sympathy's dew,
To refresh the heart of the sorrowing Jew.

He thinks of the land where his forefathers lie,
Beneath the warm smiles of his own eastern sky;
And he wishes that he was laid by them too,
For earth has no home for the sorrowing Jew.

He thinks of the holy and beautiful Face,
Where Jehovah once stoop'd to commune with man;
He thinks of the glory which Saleem once knew,
He thinks of himself, a poor sorrowing Jew.

Ah! hush'd be the sorrow, unheard be the sigh,
And wipe the warm tear trickling down from the eye;
There are those still who mock unspeakable woes,
There are those still who kill the sorrowing Jew.

Yet woe to the race, though a king on his throne,
Who injures the people God still calls his own;
For he, the Almighty, all holy and true,
Hath sworn to avenge the poor sorrowing Jew.

And, think ye with fear, on the terrible woes
Which God hath pronounc'd against Israel's foes;
And oh! do not forget, that Jesus for you,
Was all his life through, a poor sorrowful Jew.

ETERNAL LIFE.

"In hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began."—Titus i. 2.

Eternal life is, through the grace of God, the proper hope and common inheritance of all the redeemed family; whether called of God under the Adamic, Patriarchal, Mosaic, or Christian dispensations. Indeed the phrase eternal life is but another mode of expressing the great and inestimable blessing of salvation.

1. Salvation is deliverance from death; the Law's penalty: "the wages of sin is death,"—death in its literal and primary sense; and since "it is appointed unto men once to die," Heb. ix. 27, and since also salvation is deliverance from death; it follows as a necessary consequence that there must be a resurrection from the dead for God's believing people, a restoration of life, a quickening, or making alive again. The Apostle Paul reasons thus in 1 Cor. xv. 16 to 18, "For if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised. And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." The Lord Jesus Christ teaches the same divine truth, John vi. 39, "And this is the Father's will which hath sent Me, that of all which he hath given Me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day." Satan is represented as having the power of death; but Christ who is stronger than he, has entered into the strong man's domain and despoiled him of his goods; "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same; that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the devil; and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage"—Heb. ii. 14, 15. Christ now holds the keys of hell (Hades) and death, and since he has promised to his sheep eternal life, and that no man (none) is able (not even Satan) to pluck them out of his hand, he can, whensoever he shall please, unlock the portals of the tomb and deliver his people therefrom. "For as the Father raiseth up the dead, and quickeneth them; even so the Son quickeneth (maketh alive) whom he will," John v. 21.

2. The Son of God in his teaching very frequently sets forth the great fact, that his mission to this world was for the purpose of giving life to men. "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly," John x. 10. The present life is short and precarious, resurrection life, in the believer's case, is everlasting, more abundant. "Verily I say unto you, There is no man, that hath left house, or parents, or brethren, or wife, or children, for the kingdom of God's sake, who shall not receive manifold in this present time, and in the world (or age) to come life everlasting," Luke xviii. 29, 30. On another occasion the Savior rebuked his disciples for suggesting that he should call down fire from heaven and consume his enemies as Elias did; but our Lord replied, "The Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives but to save them," Luke ix. 56. He came to save their lives? "For whosoever would save his life shall lose it: and whosoever shall lose his life for My sake shall find it: For what shall a man be profited if he shall gain the whole world, and forfeit his life? or what shall a man give in exchange for his life?" Matt. xvi. 25 to 27 (Revised Version). A man may lose his life by martyrdom and yet find it: When? and how? By resurrection to the life eternal. "I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in Me, though he was dead, yet shall he live," John xi. 25. "He that loveth his life shall lose it; and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it (that is after it has been restored to him in resurrection) unto life eternal," John xii. 25.

3. The Peshito, or Syriac Version of the New Testament, distinguishes in a very marked manner between deliverance from some temporal calamity and deliverance from the consequences of sin, invariably using two different Syriac words to express these different ideas. The Greek language unfortunately has but one word to express both these experiences: hence considerable confusion to the English reader. Take for instance the following illustration, Matt. viii. 25, "And the disciples came to him, and awoke him, saying, Lord, (soson, Greek) save us: we perish." In the Syriac version it is (patsyn) "deliver us: we are perishing." Here the Greek (soson) is used to express a temporal deliverance: in the next quotation the same Greek word has to do duty for a spiritual deliverance, Matt. xviii. 11. "For the Son of man is come to (sosai) save that which is lost" The Syriac reading is "For the Son of man hath come to give life (Khya) to that which was lost." The Syriac Version is therefore much more definite in its orthography and undoubtedly gives great support to our previous remarks, that salvation from sin and sin's consequences, necessarily involves deliverance from death, or in other words the restorationment of life: we need not only Christ a Savior (Soter) but Christ a Life-Giver (Khya, Syriac).

4. The Old Testament frequently employs the term "life" to denote the blessings of salvation, and, by comparing the context and the surrounding circumstances, it will be obvious that in many cases something more than a prolonged earthly existence is intended; in many places the words of promise can only be understood of the life eternal. "For his anger endureth but a moment: in his favor is life; weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning," Psalm xxx. 5. "Blessed is the man that heareth me, watching daily at my gates, waiting at the posts of my doors; for whoso findeth me findeth life, and shall obtain favor of the Lord," Prov. viii. 34, 35. "For I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth saith the Lord God: wherefore turn yourselves and live ye," Ezekiel xviii. 32. "He asked life of Thee and Thou gavest it him, even length of days for ever and ever," Psalm xxi. 4.

5. The argument of our Lord with the Sadducees to establish the doctrine of the resurrection indicates very plainly that the Patriarchs looked forward to a future life of blessedness and immortality.

When Jehovah gave promise to Abram that he himself and his seed should inherit the land of Canaan for ever, God at the same time (after the ratification of the covenant) distinctly informed him (Abram) that he should die, see Genesis xv. 7 to 16. thus shutting up the Patriarch to the only possible solution of the problem, viz., that he should enter upon the possession of the inheritance at a period subsequent to his resurrection! a doctrine with which the Hebrews were not unacquainted. "Women received their dead raised to life again: and others were tortured not accepting deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection," Hebrews xi. 35 This was the point of our Lord's argument with the Sadducees, "Now that the dead are raised, even Moses showed at the bush, when he called the Lord the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, 'For he is not a God of the dead, but of the living; for all live unto him,'" Luke xx. 37, 38. These titles denote the covenant relationship in which Jehovah stood to the Patriarchs, and his covenant must be fulfilled.

6. Again, the promise of an everlasting inheritance and of everlasting life are one and the same. An inheritance can only be possessed for ever provided that the possessor is endowed with an immortal life: the two things are identical: the one includes the other. No doubt this was the basis upon which the Patriarchs and their descendants rested their hopes of a future life and a resurrection from the dead.

The result of our investigations is this: God has in Christ graciously promised eternal life, from before the foundation of the world; and this inestimable boon has been revealed to his believing people, not at first in all its fulness, but gradually as the ages rolled on; till at last that which was obscure at the beginning has by degrees assumed form and definiteness until he came who was, in his own person, the Light and the Life of the world—then this glorious truth burst forth in all its brightness and meridian splendor; clearly discovering to man that he possesses no life, no element of immortality in himself, but that "he that hath the Son hath life: and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life," 1 John v. 12. "For the life was manifested, and we have seen it and bear witness, and shew unto you that eternal life which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us," 1 John i. 2.—C. Underhill, J. P., in Bible Standard.

"The Bread of God which Cometh down from Heaven and Giveth Life unto the World."

The speaker prefaced his address by stating that, (1). The Association contended that the subject of man's destiny was dealt with in Scripture in the plainest and most unequivocal language. 2. That in the government of all countries, and in the department of jurisprudence, laws and penalties were plainly and severely put: thus in God's government and jurisprudence, as revealed in Holy Writ, we were warranted in expecting equal plainness. 3. Dr. Hooker's rule was fully endorsed and acted upon by the Association, viz, that the literal interpretation of the Scriptures was to be accepted, unless it involved an impossibility or an absurdity.

He stated that the chapter on which his remarks were based contained many figurative terms, as eating and drinking, setting forth actual literal blessings obtained through faith.

The subject of my address will be found in the following passage of Holy Scripture: John vi. 51.

"I am the living bread which came down from heaven; if any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever: and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world."

The doctrine of life only in Christ is not a new doctrine, enunciated for the first time by Jesus and his Apostles, but it is as old as the Fall of Man itself. The difference between previous ages and the present being this: that now he, who from the beginning was the Author and Giver of life, himself appears in the world, manifested in all the glory of the only begotten of the Father full of grace and truth. "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the Word of Life: For the Life was manifested, and we have seen it, and bear witness and show unto you that eternal life, which was with the Father and was manifested unto us," 1 John i. 1, 2. The first promise, made to man (through indirectly) contained within itself the germ of this truth: "I will put enmity between thee (the serpent) and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed: it shall bruise thy head and thou shalt bruise his heel," Gen. iii. 15. The subsequent act of God in driving the disobedient pair from the Garden of Eden,—"lest he put forth his hand and take also of the tree of life and eat and live for ever," Gen. iii. 22, shows clearly that it is the determinate purpose of God, that no sinner shall become immortal or find an abiding place in his universe; neither shall sin ever possess the attribute of everlastingness. "The world passeth away and the lust thereof, but he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever," 1 John ii. 17.

From the earliest days this hope of eternal life, or immortality (for we use these terms synonymously) preceded by a hearty and complete restoration to the favor of God has shed its cheering light upon the fallen but repentant sons of men. Abraham believed God and it was counted unto him for righteousness, and the promise that he should inherit the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession was interpreted by him to shadow forth a resurrection from the dead. (See the argument of our Lord with the Sadducees concerning this great doctrine.) When Abraham offered up his son Isaac he believed that "God was able to raise him up from the dead: from whence also he received him in a figure," Heb. xi. 19.

The writer of the Book of Job, in answer to the query, "If a man die shall he live again?" gives evidence of his faith by replying, "All the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come;" "So man lieth down and ariseth not, till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep," Job xiv. 12-14. And yet again, "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth: and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God," Job xix. 25, 26. And not to be wearisome, we will only mention those glorious martyrs and exemplars of the last dispensation who willingly yielded up their lives, not accepting deliverance, sustained and comforted by the invigorating hope, "that they would obtain a better resurrection," Heb. xi. 35. "For his anger endureth but a moment, in his favor is life: weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning," Ps. xxx. 5. "Ho! every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money; come ye, buy, and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without price. Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread? and your labor for that which satisfieth not? hearken diligently unto Me, and eat ye that which is good, and let your soul delight itself in fatness. Incline your ear, and come unto Me: hear, and your soul shall live; and I will make an everlasting covenant with you, even the sure mercies of David," Isa. lv. 1-3.

Now the Jews in the days of Christ had sunk into the most degraded condition of formality and superstition, and they entertained the most carnal and grovelling notions of the Messianic kingdom; hence our Lord found it necessary to reiterate again and again the indispensable fact that without some spiritual qualification, such as a new heart and a right spirit, it was impossible that they could participate in the glories of the kingdom of heaven.

He rebukes Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews, for not understanding the necessity of being born again (an Old Testament doctrine) before he could possibly enter the kingdom of God. He discourses to the Samaritan woman at the well of Jacob, upon the living water which he alone could give, and which, to those who partake of it, would become a well of water ever springing up into everlasting life: (significant of the indwelling of the Holy Spirit;) and now, to the thousands which followed him across the sea of Galilee, after feeding upon the barley loaves and fishes, he dwells with solemn earnestness upon the virtues of the true manna, "the bread which cometh down from heaven and which giveth life to the world." "Moses gave us not that bread from heaven but My Father giveth you the true bread from heaven." John vi. 32. These words are intended to correct the notion of the Jews that there was any especial or saving virtue in the manna partaken of in the wilderness. "Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness and are dead (R. V. they died;) this is the bread which cometh down from heaven that a man may eat thereof and not die. I am the living bread which came down from heaven: if any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever: and the bread that I will give is My flesh, which I will give for the life of the world," John vi. 49-51. Now these verses have been very much misunderstood by many expositors: some have endeavored to deduce from this passage, the proposition that those who believe in Christ shall escape natural death; that as the Israelites who ate the manna died (as they understand it) a natural death; so believers who partake of the true Manna, will not die a natural death; death in their case being only apparent, not real:—not the extinction of life. This interpretation however, whilst correct as an antithesis, is wrong as to doctrine,—and fails to give the true contrast: it labors under a mistaken apprehension of the nature of the death which the Israelites died. The terms death or die are very frequently used in the Scriptures to express both the first and second deaths; and it requires a reference to the context, as well as to the sense of the passage generally, to determine in any given case, in which sense the terms are to be understood; for instance, this passage in Ezekiel, "Cast away from you all your transgressions, whereby ye transgressed; and make you a new heart and a new spirit; for why will ye die, O house of Israel? For I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, saith the Lord God: wherefore turn yourselves, and live ye," Ezek. xviii. 31, 32. "The death of him that dieth" in this passage must obviously be a punitive, a judicial death, a death on account of their transgressions; which is characteristic of the second death, but not of the first; a death which might be escaped from by repentance and faith, "wherefore turn yourselves and live ye." So also this passage in Romans viii. 13, "For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die; but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live." "Ye shall die" in this passage must, for a similar reason, be interpreted of the second death; whether a man lives after the flesh or after the spirit, in either case, he cannot avoid natural death: "It is appointed unto men once to die," Heb. ix. 27, consequently the death threatened in this passage, is the second death; and the life promised is the eternal life. The question therefore to be decided in this passage of John vi. is this—What is the meaning of the term death, or they died (R V.) in this particular case? Did the Israelites die a natural death? Was there anything special in their case with which our Lord pointedly referred? We think there was! Their death was not an ordinary death! They were overthrown in the wilderness because of their transgressions. It should be borne in mind that natural death is not ordinarily punitive or judicial: the mortality of the race is due exclusively to the sin of Adam: "Therefore, as through one man sin entered into the world, and death through sin, and so death passed unto all men for that all have sinned," Rom. v. 12. R Ver. The second death therefore stands distinguished from the first inasmuch as it is a direct infliction from the hands of God, of that just punishment which is due to the individual transgressor because of his own sins. Nevertheless there are a few cases recorded in Scripture in which the first death partakes of a judicial character, for instance: The destruction of the Antediluvians was a direct infliction of Divine vengeance for personal transgressions: "God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth..... and the Lord said I will destroy man whom I have created from the face of the earth," Gen. vi. 5-7. So likewise it cannot be said of the Sodomites that they died a natural death: "The Lord said, Because the cry of Sodom and Gomorrah is great and because their sin is very grievous," see Gen. xviii. 20, 21; "Then the Lord rained upon Sodom and upon Gomorrah, brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven: and he overthrew those cities," Gen. xix. 24, 25. Thus (quoting the words of the Apostle Jude) "they suffered the vengeance of eternal fire." Now the Israelites who partook of the manna were cut off because of their transgressions: "With many of them God was not well pleased for they were overthrown in the wilderness." "With whom was he grieved forty years? was it not with them that had sinned whose carcasses fell in the wilderness? and to whom sware he that they should not enter into his rest but to them that believed not?" Heb. iii. 17, 18. In fact the wickedness of these Israelites was proverbial: and their fearful overthrow was a warning and example to subsequent generations upon whom the ends of the world are come (see 1 Cor. x. 11. The death of these Israelites being therefore a judicial death, the antitheals of the passage is as follows, Your fathers did eat the manna and are dead, (they died R. V.) they died as rebels against God: the manna of the wilderness possessed no virtue to heal their transgressions, or to procure them life, eternal life (though it was a type of the true manna); they died under an infliction of the Divine wrath; but not so with those who eat of the bread which Christ gives; the eating of this bread (or which is the same thing, believing in him) secures for those who eat this bread forgiveness of sin, acceptance with God, yea eternal life: and of such it may be truly said they shall never die; shall never come into condemnation, or judgment; shall never suffer that death which is the wages of sin. The Israelites died a judicial death: those who believe in Christ shall never die a judicial death: this is the antithesis drawn by our Lord, and in every way consistent with the facts of the case and with his general teaching: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth My word, and believeth on him that sent Me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation: but is passed from death unto life," John v. 24. To come into condemnation, is to be adjudged to suffer the second death; and to pass from death unto life, is to cease walking in the broad road which leads to destruction and to pass over into the narrow way which leads to life; such an one has passed from death unto life. "He that believeth on him is not condemned, but he that believeth not is condemned already," John iii. 18.

But further, that our Lord did not intend to teach the setting aside of natural death (or simple dissolution) in the case of the believer, is evident from the persistency with which he insists upon the necessity of a resurrection from the dead. Four times in this chapter, verses 39, 40, 44, 54, does Christ emphatically declare, "and I will raise him up at the last day." Now a resurrection from the dead presupposes a state of death; a living person cannot be raised from the dead; and it would appear that Jesus intended specially to guard his disciples against supposing that natural death, or simple dissolution was to be set aside by thus inseparably connecting eternal life with resurrection. "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in Me though he were dead, yet shall he live," John xi. 25. Natural death or dissolution, is not punishment, and in the believer's case even the instinctive dread of death is taken away; the sting of death is sin, but sin is put away by the sacrifice of Christ, the paschal lamb, upon which the believer now feeds. The proper description of natural dissolution is therefore 'sleep,' 'falling asleep in Jesus.' "Our brother Lazarus sleepeth, but I go, that I may awake him of sleep," John xi. 11. "As for me, I will behold Thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied when I awake with Thy likeness," Psalm xvii. 15.

This passage in John, which we are now considering, supplies one proof text amongst many that immortality is not actually possessed until the day of resurrection: as this is a matter of considerable importance, we propose to conclude our exposition with a brief selection of Scripture passages, all corroborative of this fact.

1. Eternal life, being a matter of hope, or expectancy, it is necessarily future.

"In hope of eternal life which God that cannot lie promised before the world began," Titus i. 2; "hope that is seen is not hope; for what a man seeth why doth he yet hope for? But if we hope for that we see not then do we with patience wait for it," Rom. viii. 24.

2. Faith in Christ constitutes the title or heirship to eternal life.

"Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us. That being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life," Titus iii. 5-7. "Give honor unto the wife, as unto the weaker vessel, and as being heirs together of the grace of life," 1 Peter iii. 7. Heirship and possession are incompatible one with an other.

3. Holiness of life and perseverance to the end, are essential to the obtaining of immortality.

"Follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord," Hebrews xii. 14. "For I say unto you, that except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven," Matt. v. 20; "For we are made partakers of Christ, if we hold the beginning of our confidence steadfast unto the end," Heb. iii. 14; "To them who by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory and honor and immortality, eternal life," Rom. ii. 7: "And every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things: now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown: but we an incorruptible..... I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection: lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway," 1 Cor. ix. 25-27.

4. The following three passages show incontestably that immortality is conferred at resurrection, and consequently not before.

"There is no man that hath left house, or parents, or brethren, or wife, or children, for the kingdom of God's sake, who shall not receive manifold more in this present time, and in the world to come life everlasting," Luke xviii. 29, 30. "But they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry, nor are given away in marriage: neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels: and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection," Luke xx. 35, 36. "In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory: O death, where is thy sting? O grave (hades) where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin: and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be to God which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ," 1 Cor. xv. 52 to 57.—Charles Underhill, at Edinburgh Conference, 1886, in Bible Standard.

Hate Not.

Hate not. It is not worth your while. Your life is not long enough to make it pay to cherish ill-will or hard thoughts. What if this man has cheated you or that man has played you false? What if your friend has forsaken you in time of need, or that one, having won your entire confidence, your warmest love, has concluded that he prefers to consider and treat you as a stranger. Let it all pass. What difference will it make to you in a few years, when you go to the undiscovered country? A few more smiles, a few more pleasures, much pain, a little longer hurrying and worrying through the world, some hasty greetings, abrupt farewells, and our play will be "played out," the injured will be laid away, and, ere long, forgotten. Is it worthy to hate each other?

Tears that Make Rainbows.

Blessed also are they that mourn, for he who never mourns never mends. Compunction of a godly sort, dissatisfaction with all the past attainments and honest grief at falling short of Christ's high standard of holiness, all tend to growth in grace. There are too many dry-eyed Christians in this world. Gloomy, God-distrusting unbelief we have no apologies for. But there ought to be more tears of penitence over neglects of duty and woundings of Christ, more tears of sympathy with the wronged and suffering, and then we would have more gracious bursts of sunshine from Christ's countenance. Rainbows are never painted except upon raindrops. They that sow in the tears of contrition, reap in the joys of pardon and peace. Such tears water the roots of grace. Blessed are they that mourn and mend. The ladder to the higher Christian life starts from the dust of self-abasement; but for every round we need a fresh grasp on Jesus and a new lift by his loving hand.—Cuyler.

DIED.

ADAMS.—At her home in Stark County, Indiana, on March 6, 1887, Elizabeth Adams, aged 53 years, 3 months and 25 days.

She left a husband, seven children, two brothers and a sister to mourn their loss, also several grand-children, who are old enough to miss the affectionate and kindly greeting of their grandma. All the children except two were present to witness her death, and all were at the funeral. Those present were called to her bedside, whom with her rapidly failing strength she exhorted to make the necessary preparation to meet her in the bright morning of the resurrection. A short time before her death she sang a hymn feelingly and fervently. The sweet strains of this, her last song, will linger and echo in the memories of the surviving members of the family down to the latest hour of life.

Sister Adams was born Nov. 9, 1833, in Franklin Co, Pa., and on March 13, 1851, in the same county, was united in marriage to Isaac O. Adams. Her maiden name was Elizabeth Weight. In the spring of 1883 she embraced and confessed the truth of the gospel, was baptized, after which she united with the church at Eagle Creek near her home of which her husband and some of her children are also members. She was loved and esteemed by the whole circle of her friends and acquaintances in and out of the church as a patient, careful and faithful Christian, affectionate wife and mother and good citizen. She rests in hope of the better resurrection. By her request the writer was summoned to preach the funeral discourse, and on Tuesday, March 8th, we laid her to rest in the grave. JOHN L. WINCK.

Dear Restitution:

I held a public discussion, Feb. 10th and 11th, at Prattsville (Lone Star P. O.), Vinton Co., O., with Rev. M. C. Winget (Prot. Methodist). Question: Resolved, That the Holy Scriptures teach a conscious state of existence between death and the resurrection, Winget affirming. The discussion was to last the third day and evening, but Winget having the affirmative, drew the discussion to a close the third session. So I preached Saturday morning and evening and Sunday morning and evening to very attentive audiences. Left an appointment for March 5th and 6th. Had a good meeting and just returned today with three trial subscribers for THE RESTITUTION. The people say, come back and preach for us, we can read what you preach in the Bible, that is just the way it reads, etc. I received one dollar and seventy-five cents for my labor for which I am thankful. Truth does not command the price that error does, but let us rejoice in believing he that gives to the poor lends to the Lord and will receive his own with usury when Jesus comes. F. J. DAVIS.

The brethren of the Grady School House will meet at Brother Job Harrongbs, eight miles southeast of Chanute, Neosho Co., Kan., on the evening of April 7th, to keep the Passover. Brother John Foore is expected to be with us. All brethren of the one faith that can attend we will be very glad to have meet with us. Yours in hope of eternal life when Jesus comes. D. JOHNSON.

HOPE BEYOND THE GRAVE.

'Tis night, and the landscape is lovely no more;
I mourn; but, ye woodlands, I mourn not for you.
For morn is approaching your charms to restore,
Perfumed with fresh fragrance, and glittering with dew.
Nor yet for the ravage of winter I mourn;
Kind nature the embryo blossom will save.
But when shall spring visit the mouldering urn!
O! when shall day dawn on the night of the grave!

'Twas thus, by the glare of false science betrayed,
That leads to bewilder and dazzle to blind,
My fronghts went to roam from shade onward to shade,
Destruction before me, and sorrow behind.
"Oh, pity, great Father of Light," then I cried,
"Thy creature, who fain would not wander from thee!
Lo! humbled in dust, I relinquish my pride;
From doubt and from darkness thou only canst free."

And darkness and doubt are now flying away;
No longer I roam in conjecture forlorn;
So breaks on the traveller, faint and astray,
The bright and the orderly effulgence of morn.
See Truth, Love, and Mercy, in triumph descending;
And Nature all glowing in Eden's first bloom!
On the cold cheek of Death smiles and roses are blending.
And Beauty immortal awakes from the tomb!

Paternity, Genealogy, Nature and Character of Jesus, in the Light of the Covenants; being two Lectures, with some Additions, Delivered at Wyoming, Delaware, by Dr. L. C. Thomas.—No. 5.

"What think ye of Christ? Whose Son is he?" Matt. xxii. 42.

Paul in his epistle to the Romans, chap. i. 1–4, gives additional explanations, in perfect harmony with, and illustrative of the angel's words to Joseph and Mary concerning this great personage. He says, he (Paul) was "separated unto the gospel of God concerning his Son Jesus Christ our Lord, which (Son) was made of the seed of David according to the flesh; and declared to be the Son of God with power,—("the power of an endless life," Heb. vii. 16, a life-giving Spirit) according to the Spirit of holiness—by the resurrection from the dead." That is, he was in body of David's flesh—David's descendant. But by his resurrection with a spirit body, he was thus declared or shown to be the Son of God with or in Power, a Son of Power, alive for evermore," according to the Holy Spirit or Power by which he was begotten, and now born from the dead—a Powerful One according to his name, Jesus—"I shall be the Powerful" (See Diaglott, notes on Matt. i. 21, 25) all power being then given him.

Again, Paul in speaking of Jesus, says, "GOD was manifested in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, (or declared to be God in the Spirit) seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory." 1 Tim. iii. 16. Can such language apply to a mere man?

Again, "Wherefore God hath highly exalted him and given him that name which is above every name: that at the name of JESUS (Jehovah or Savior) every knee should bow, of things (those—Dis.) in heaven and those in earth, and those under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is LORD, to the glory of God the Father." Phil. ii. 9–11. The Father also called his Son God—a more excellent name than the angels. He himself called him by his own name, as recorded in Psa. xlv. 6, 7, and Heb. i. 8. "Unto the Son he saith, Thy throne, O GOD, is forever and ever." At the conception of his Son, he commanded that as soon as he was born of the virgin Mary, he should be called by his own name, because he was "his own Son;" Rom. viii. 32; and yet, because Jesus claimed to be God's own Son, born to be King, thus, as Paul said, witnessing a good confession before Pontius Pilate; he was crucified. Matt. xxvi. 63; xxvii. 11. The Jews called such claim and confession blasphemy, and said, "he ought to die because he made himself the Son of God." John xix. 7. They were ignorant of the fact, that God, his Father, had by his own Power effected his begottal, and thus made him his own Son, and given him his own name: and therefore that Jesus did not blaspheme when he claimed to be God's only begotten Son, and said, "for this cause I came into the world, that I should bear witness to the truth." John iii. 16; xviii. 37. The Father also said as recorded in the second Psalm "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee." And again: I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son. (This is a quotation by Paul from God's covenant with David. 1 Chron. xvii. 13.) And when he bringeth again his first born into the world, (first-born in flesh, and first-born in Spirit from the dead) he saith, And let all the angels of God worship him. Let the reader and everybody bear in mind the significance and importance of this great name, placed upon our Savior by his Father's directions—directions given at his conception before he was born. He was called Son of God, because of his begottal by God's power—the Father-Spirit. He was called Jesus because that was the name of his Father—Savior—and because he was to save his people from their sins, which he began to do when he said to "the sick of the palsy, Son be of good cheer, thy sins be forgiven thee." He was called Immanuel, because he was to be GOD with us; and in fulfilment of God's word by the mouth of his prophet, spoken over seven hundred years before, viz., "Behold a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel." Thus we see the importance and significance of the names of our Savior. Not that Jesus, or any other name or names, properly or fully signify or represent the one Name, the Character and Attributes of the great Creator—"the one God, the Father out of whom are all things"—the one Name above every name; for it is not possible. But the name alone, of our Savior, not only indicates his origin, but, to my mind is positive proof of his Spirit begottal, his character, his power, and his mission as mediator between God and man. It would be preposterous to suppose that those names and all that is said in the Scriptures, could possibly be applied to a mere man, either in fact or prospectively. The Savior himself, while here in the days of his flesh, as I have shown, distinctly and repeatedly claimed that he came down from above, that he was before Abraham, and that he was, at the time of speaking, THEN God's own real and only begotten Son. John iii. 16; and was so understood by the Jews, and was crucified because of such claim, as a blasphemer. Think you the claim of Jesus was false?

It is supposed and said by some, that this prophetical passage—"Thou art my Son, this day, or today have I begotten thee," Psa. ii. 7; Heb. v. 5, cannot be properly applied to the begottal and birth of Jesus, but only to his resurrection. This is however a mistake. Robert Young, LL.D., author of a "New and Literal Translation of the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures," "Analytical Concordance," etc., shows that the original words rendered "begotten," and "first-begotten," in the above quotations, include both the begottal and birth of Jesus, and also the bringing him forth or raising him up again" at his resurrection. Dr Young's rendering is as follows: "My Son thou art, I today have begotten thee, i. e., brought thee forth as my anointed King." The bringing him forth, including his inception by Spirit-begottal, birth and resurrection; similar to "raise up," as in Deut. xviii. 18; Acts ii. 30; iii. 22, 23, 33. And the above quotations being from the Hebrew in the second Psalm, the words "today, or this day," are a Hebraism, frequently used to mean an indefinite period of present time much longer than a day of twenty-four hours, as "today if ye will hear my voice," and "while it is called today," etc. Heb. iii. 13–15; xiii. 8. We ourselves also, frequently use the term in the same way; as "the nations of this day;" the churches of today, the people of today; meaning the people of these times, this age, or even this century, perhaps.

Again; Matthew, Mark, Luke and John all agree in calling Jesus "THE LORD" before his baptism, in the following words, viz: "Prepare ye the way of the Lord:" all quoting from Isa. xl. 3, where the prophet foretells John the Baptist's work, and voice in the wilderness preceding the manifestation of Jesus at his baptism, where the prophet calls Jesus God, in these words, viz: "Make straight in the desert a highway for OUR GOD." Matt. iii. 3; Mark i. 1–3; Luke iii. 4. Are they all speaking of a mere man? Did Isaiah mean a mere man, when he thus prophetically speaks of Jesus, calling him our God? Was John the Baptist sent to prepare the way before a mere man untruthfully called the Lord? Were the four evangelists all mistaken?

EGYPTIAN EXPLORATION.

In America there has not yet arisen a society which engages in the exploration of the land of the Pharaohs. For such work we depend upon the laborers of the English "Fund." This association has not yet been long enough in existence to celebrate its twenty-first birth date, as has the Palestine Exploration Fund, but in the half-decade since it was organized it has produced wonderful results. The permanent records of the work are embodied in the Fund's "Memoirs," of which the third has lately reached this country.

Dr. Wm. D. Whitlow, of Boston, thus epitomizes what has been accomplished: "Of the nine discovered but four can be mentioned here: Pithom, the treasure (store) city of Exodus I. 11, throwing invaluable light on the period of the Sojourn and the Exodus route; Goshen, the chief town of 'the land of Goshen,' of primary importance in locating that region; Tahpanhes, Jeremiah xliii. 8, where the fugitive princesses of Judah, and Jeremiah, dwelt—sacked by Nebuchadnezzar—disclosing the only Egyptian building specifically named in the Old Testament, its arrangements explaining a special description by Jeremiah; Naukratis, the brilliant Greek emporium before the rise of Alexandria (see the Church Review, March, 1887, Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston), of deep interest to all Hellenists, students in ancient arts, and readers of Ebers' 'An Egyptian Princess.' The site of Zoan, the Tanis of the Greeks (illustrated in Harper's Magazine, Oct., 1886), once the great northern capital of the Pharaohs—where Moses interviewed Miriam—a city hardly inferior in grandeur to Thebes, and where the greatest of all colossi (that of Rameses II.) stood—has already yielded many valuable treasures for historical and geographical data, and of the arts and sciences of the ancient Egyptian schools."

Dr. Winslow, Treasurer of the Fund for America and a Vice-President, has the success of the cause at heart and stands ready and willing to give information to those who feel the natural interest of Bible students, in the land where Israel remained so long.

This subject of the excavation and exploration of sites in the Delta region of the Nile is not one that is of interest only to scholars. In our Bible there is such a close connection between the historical and the doctrinal matter, that when the former is subjected to sceptical attack the latter suffers in its proportion. Discredit thrown upon the history of the Bible is in the same degree discredit thrown upon its doctrinal teaching. It is well known, that a certain school of rationalistic thought in Germany and elsewhere would attempt to overturn the story of the Bondage of Israel in Egypt, and of the Exodus. But with the loss of this part of the history, should such attack not be successfully warded off, comes further curtailment of the story of God's dealings with his chosen people.

With such problems staring them in the face and demanding answers and sufficient solutions, is it surprising that scholars ask for help? A recent writer has said that the pen of the apologetical writer is giving place to the spade of the excavator. This is true. The old ground has been fought over and over again. The facts have been marshalled in array to support one theory, then disbanded and rearranged under new leadership for the support of a second view, opposed, perhaps, in all points to that which preceded it. Take for instance, the point which is settled by the "First memoir" of the "Fund." Pithom, where was it? who built it? what sort of a place was it? did the author of the account in Exodus know what he was talking about? Examine the literature of the subject and surprise will be marked in every feature. Theory followed theory, and reasoning followed argument, till the question was in a maze and the inquirer after light and fact was buried in darkness and overwhelmed by contradictory conjectures. In the course of a very few weeks, and at a trifling expense, just four years ago, a series of trenches, which uncovered a buried city on the eastern side of the Delta, just off the line of the Suez Canal, once for all settled all these questions. Pithom was there, it was there, and there the Israelites worked and labored. There was the second station on the Exodus route, and the author of Exodus did know what he was talking about, for the walls of the city were built of brick, which were of three sorts, with straw, with stubble, and without either. Moreover the courses of brick were bound with mortar. This is not a usual thing when the building material used was mud brick. These could be easily joined by moistening their surface with water, but just as the writer of Exodus said, they were joined with mortar. The importance of these facts is great. The coincidence between the written history and the archæological facts so long buried and now just revealed, is most significant. Thus was answered one of the burning questions of the time.

Thus the way has been pointed out. One success has led to another, and one acquisition of knowledge has only made keener the appetite for more. Scholars are not generally men of means. Men of means have other things to occupy their thoughts. But when both are working toward one end, why cannot the money of the one and the works of the other join hands in this "Holy War?"—N. Y. Observer.

The Central Land.

It is worthy of note that the land of Israel, so long neglected and desolate, occupies a position in the very centre of the ancient world. Palestine, though an insignificant territory, had Egypt on the south, Babylon on the east, Nineveh further north, and Rome at the west; so that by drawing a circle extending twelve degrees in each direction, we take in all the great capitals of the ancient world. A little to the north-west on the coast of the Mediterranean, lay Tyre, the Liverpool of the world; while on the north-east was Tadmor or Palmyra, marking the route of the caravans which brought from afar the treasures of the East.

Had Israel been obedient to the commands of God, had they listened to his commandments and observed his precepts, that land thus centrally located, might have been the light and joy and glory of the world. But Israel rebelled against God; and, fallen from their high estate, were scattered amongst all nations, while the land flowing with milk and honey was brought to desolation.

Today the traveller journeying through Palestine looks on with surprise. It is not a great land,—the territory is small. It is not fertile like the valley of the Nile or the Euphrates; it lacks the grandeur of many a mountain range, the beauty of many a land of verdure and delight; yet out of that land have gone forth influences mightier than any which the world has ever known. From that land have flowed the streams of civilization and enlightenment; law and gospel, morality, and religion have gone forth thence to save and bless the world. The enlightened and humane principles that have pervaded the advanced civilization of mankind, and the hopes of life and immortality which bless and cheer the race are traced back to those hills and valleys now so desolate and abjected.

In these facts we see the evidence of the Divine origin and authority of these great principles. There is no other way of accounting for the things that have come forth from this land. There is no other way to explain the prolonged existence of the Jewish nation, the diffusion of the principles of the Mosaic law, or the spread of the gospel of the Son of God, unless it be the fact that a divine wisdom superintended, and a divine power wrought out these grand results.

It is not the land, the climate, the scenery, the mountains, or the valleys that have made the Jewish nation what it is; but it is the Law of the Lord which is perfect, converting the soul: the testimonies of the Lord which are sure, making wise the simple.—The Christian.

From a letter sent by an educated German gentleman, of Haifa, who for many years has been a resident in Palestine, and dated the 7th of November, 1886, we learn some interesting facts about the grapes of the Holy Land. The cultivation of the vine is still extensively carried on in Palestine, especially by the German colonists from South Germany, the so-called Temple Society, who have come to the Holy Land to live, and have done much for the improvement of agriculture, manufactures, etc. During the past summer, the weather was not favorable for grapes; June was very hot, and the Sirocco did much damage, literally roasting the grapes that were not well protected by leaves. In the Phœnician hills the vine did better, and five hundred pounds of the best of grapes sold for from $3.90 to $4.50. The writer of the letter mentions the remarkable fact that, at Acco, a single bunch of grapes was brought to market which weighed fully twelve pounds. He asks whether this does not forcibly remind us of the narrative of Joshua and Caleb. In view of the fact that such small prices can be had for grapes and wine, the colonists are beginning to export wine to Egypt.—Old Testament Student.

EXPLANATION OF LABEL MARKS.

Some having complained that they do not know what the marks on labels mean, we will just say, "Joy" means January, and when it is followed by a figure "6" and reads "Joy6" it means your subscription expired the first day of January, 1886. "Feb" February, "Mar" March, "Apr" April, and "May" are well understood, but "Jno" meaning June seems to confuse some, and to be taken to mean January. "Jun" means June. "Jul" is July, "Aug" August, "Sep" September, "Oct" October, "Nov" November, and "Dec" December. The figure following the month stands for the year, "1" means 1881, "2" means 1882, etc. A postal card of inquiry will bring you any information you wish.

THE COMING AGE,
1886

Nature and Proximity.
—BY J. P. WESTNER.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

The Coming Age is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the deeds of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that this up-rise hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 300 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $2.00. Send to this office for this work.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXVI. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, APRIL 6, 1887. NO. 13.

THE RESTITUTION

Terms—TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

Payable in advance. Three and Six Months in proportion.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION addresses the actual "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortalized saints as joint-heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the gospel, repentance, and remission as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for a glorious salvation.

Another Little Round Pebble of Error on a Water-shed of Adam's Time.

The last clause of the fifteenth verse of the third chapter of Genesis reads as follows in the original Greek: αυτος σου τηρησει κεφαλην και συ τηρησεις αυτου πτερναν, which, translated, reads, "He will watch thy head and thou wilt watch his heel."

This passage readers will recognize as a part of the curse pronounced upon the serpent and the various renderings of the versions best known, like C. V., R. V., and D. V. are too familiar to need quotation or comment except in the way of comparison. There is no variation of the text in this passage as there is in many others so far as the Greek is concerned, and the variation of the Hebrew is too evidently one of the many malicious tinkerings of the text through the vocalization or "the vowel-points" which were no part of the inspired record. No Greek scholar would for a moment contend that τηρεω which is the word used here in the future active, can mean "bruise" or "pierce" or "crush" or "wound," or can mean anything but "watch" or some derivitive idea kindred to it. That the reader may see how easily the whole meaning of a word may be changed by changing its vocalization, let me illustrate by this very word. We will then change the vowel in the first syllable from ē to a. And now we have ταρω, meaning "to pierce." Again ταρω, meaning "to bruise." Again τραω, future active of τιτρωσκω, meaning "to wound." Now as these different interpretations of this one word appear in the various versions, it is but natural to conclude, from what we already know of the main fact of "the great vocalization fraud" that these widely and absurdly different renderings are the direct result of vacillating experiments to improve upon "the word once for all delivered to the saints."

Again, any other rendering than the true one of "watching" and that too the esoteric watching, exalts man and not God in the promised ultimate victory over Satan, destroys the harmony of God's inspired teaching and revealed purpose and becomes a mesh in the net of Satanic apostate lies set to ensnare us. Take your concordance and run the word "watch" and its synonyms through the word of God and note the urgency and frequency of the exhortation. Note the specific instruction of our Lord Jesus Christ in the Sermon on the Mount, not as interpreted in the versions, but as it really reads, "Sit not thyself against the wicked one." Think of the absurdity of the Common Version of this passage, "Resist not evil," and then compare it with the teaching, "Resist the devil and he will flee from you." The exhortation is not to resist the devil in your own strength. "Sit not yourself against," etc. Do as Christ did himself. Answer with a "thus saith the Lord," or "It hath been written." Or do as Jude says the archangel Michael did when contending with the devil about the body of Moses; say "The Lord rebuke thee," instead of "bringing a railing accusation" even. Here, by the way, is food for meditation, What did the devil want with Moses' body? Did he get it and if so what did he do with it? How did Michael come out of this controversy, with the Lord on his side when tempted and tried? We know that Moses "gets there" whether in the body or out of the body, through what is told us of "the vision of the transfiguration on the Mount."

There is a very profound philosophy in the first promise of this word "watch," simple like all great first principles, but to me vital in its import, and the devil knows it. The whole philosophy of the "walk by faith" and "not by sight" turns upon it, and it is high time the professing Christian world was undeceived and aroused from its credulity and mistaken sense of security. Of one thing be sure, that flesh and blood never has and never will in its own strength prevail in any contest with "the spirits of the powers of the air," but "with God in us to will and to do" we always have been and now and always will be invincible whether the fight is with ourself (our own flesh), the world (this order of things), or the devil (the lying accuser)

Even the Christ did not prevail in his own strength. He stood firm and resisted to the death. He fell in the shock of the "forlorn hope," but God "raised him up" and "exalted him to the right hand of the majesty on high," a victor and invincible, and clothed with all the "official power" "in the heavens and on the earth," (that is the power to sway this cosmos or order of things, man's realm according to his sovereign will which is the will of righteousness. "The sceptre of thy kingdom is a sceptre of righteousness"). But remember that this word "official power" implies power within and only within its own sphere; and note the relation to this thought and the significance of this passage, "The Lord said unto my Lord, sit thou at my right hand until I shall have made thine enemies a footstool for thy feet." This sitting at the right hand is after the exaltation and the conferrence of the official power. Therefore God himself is still reigning through the Christ as his vice-gerent.

"Watch, again I say unto you watch." Watch yourself and watch the devil and his emissaries. And right here let me call your attention to another σκανδαλον (stumbling-block) over which so many of us no doubt have stumbled. We read in the C. V. and other versions of man keeping, fully keeping, God's law and then boasting of it—David for instance, when even Christ "was numbered among the transgressors," though he actually did keep it in the true sense. Have you ever been able to solve this difficulty and reconcile this too apparent contradiction? There are just two words, no more, in the Scriptures, which have been rendered "keep." The one I have been commenting upon is one of them, namely, τηρεω, "to watch," or derivitively "to watch to keep." This is the esoteric watch or watching to keep something of value belonging to or entrusted to us. The other is φυλασσω, to watch or to be on one's guard, as a sentinel at a post of duty, or by using outward restraints like a prison. This is the exoteric watch, and the soliloquy in the Psalm addressed to Idithun, one of the keepers of the gates to the temple, is particularly intended to illustrate this double watch that every child of God has to keep. There is a vast difference in the boast, "I have kept thy law," and "I have watched to keep thy law." One would be a lying boast, and the other would be "glorying in the Lord." Many a sentinel has done his full duty and died at his post, but failed to keep that which was entrusted to him. Paul could truthfully say and "glory in the Lord" while saying it, "I have fought the good fight, I have watched to keep the faith, etc. But did he not "have a thorn in the flesh;" and did he not have to say in his consciousness of failure, "not I but the sin that dwelleth in me." Sin "got there" somehow though he did his best to keep it out; and death, the penalty for sin, got him as it gets us all. But he "pitched his tent in hope" and he had eternal life, and, in the words of "the Teacher," "he will not have died forever." "The Teacher" does not say that "whosoever believeth on me shall never die," but "whosoever believeth in me shall not have died forever" that is died a death from which there is no resurrection, that is, "the second death." If he lives till the time of "the rapture of the saints" he may never die the first death, but be translated as was Enoch and Elijah (Hellas). But this is not the truth Christ is teaching in this passage, and the perversion of the passage to prove natural immortality is one of the pivots of this statement.

The devil is a liar and was "from the outset" of his career of rebellion and iniquity, and that is the reason he needs watching on our part. A liar's head is what you always want to watch, for he is invariably a coward. It is the "wiles of the devil" that we are warned against, not his fair stand-up fighting qualities. His place is at man's heel, where God's curse relegated him to; and that is the reason the Christ used the language to him that he did in saying, "Get thou behind me Satan;" and again to Peter when he failed "to watch" as he had been expressly warned to do; and Satan got him and "sifted him like the wheat." And, moreover, this is what makes us so tenacious of error when error has once got hold of us and deceived us. This is the spiritual "begetting from below" of which the Scriptures have so much to say in contrast with "the begetting from above." The Christ says to the Pharisees, "Ye are of your father, the devil" and not the seed of Habraam as ye vainly suppose. There are two spiritual "seeds" in this teaching and two kinds of "begetting," one a begetting with the truth as an instrumentality, the other with a lie as an instrumentality. And there is such a thing as "being given over to believe the lie instead of the truth."

"Watch, again I say unto you, watch," and watch wisely. Watch the devil's head, not his "cloven hoof," nor his tail. Look out for the poison fang of error and apostate teaching.

GRATEFUL HONOR

In Matt. xxvi. 6;—also in Mark xiv. 3—and Jno. xii. 3—with the variations common to "these inspired biographers" we have a very brief history of a feast in the little village of Bethany at the house of Simon, the leper. The object in view was to do honor to Jesus the one royal guest of the occasion, and to testify the gratitude and love borne toward him by his many friends in the village, especially Martha and Mary and their brother, to whose humble home prior to this time he had often been a most welcome visitor. What a guest to grace a feast! Like John the Baptist, more than a prophet. Though only a king in prospect, but great David's Greater Son, and pre-eminently the Son of the Highest, greater by birth, by descent, by relationship, by moral worth, in wisdom, in power, in his mission and destiny, than the Cæsars, or Philip's great son the conqueror of the world. The presence of such a guest would banish every thought of conviviality, greed and gluttony, and lift the festivities above the plane of the grossly sensual or the indulgence of the appetite for appetite's sake, and make them call into harmless and holy exercise, all the higher powers of man's mental and moral nature; it would be an occasion for the expression of gratitude to him who gives bread to the eater, and seed to the sower. Here I ask: Would his nature, kindness, sympathy, benevolence and mercy, considered in connection with his wonderful mission to the world to bless and save, and in the light of the fact of his ability to forecast the ruin and desolation which has been wrought through all the centuries by the demon of the Still, permit, in others, and sanction by his own example backed by the whole force of his moral greatness the use of intoxicating or alcoholic wine at this feast or any other at which he was an honored guest? Grant that in prophetic cast he could and did see enacted in most appalling reality all that has become actual history in these eighteen hundred years; the murders, the blood, the tears, the shame and the crime, the poverty, the blasted and blighted hopes of childhood, the crushed and bleeding hearts of womanhood, the hopeless idiocy of millions more, grant this I say, then tell me that Jesus drank intoxicating wine at this feast, and at the marriage feast of Cana turned harmless, thirst-quenching water into the same kind of maddening beverage which has burned out the stomachs and fired the brains of unnumbered millions. Will any man say he did? Will you, pious and scholarly Lyman Abbott? Has your labor of searching through the Greek and Hebrew of our blessed Bible been rewarded with the discovery that Divine Inspiration and the Inspired Godman lend their mighty sanction to (I will not say drunkenness) the drinking of intoxicants from which comes such terrible ruin? And further, that as a result of this discovery, your great moral influence, and that of every good man and woman, moralist and minister who can be persuaded or argued into the belief of your conclusion, will, henceforth, be brought to bear in favor of drinking alcoholic stimulants. And as a consequence the number of drunkards would be swelled to an appalling aggregate. If the theory of this learned man is right, teetotalism is totally wrong, and prohibition ought to be prohibited, and all temperance workers made to desist under threat of pains and penalties, and on the contrary be morally obliged to lend their influence and throw all their efforts on the other side, advising people to drink (avoiding excess) to take a little wine for their stomach's sake, and their often infirmities. All this would help to make more drunkards, as all history and past experiences teach us. All temperate drinkers purpose in their minds never to become drunkards, but a large percentage of them fill drunkard's graves nevertheless. There is more than the bare possibility that Mr. Abbott is wrong in the light of the moral argument.

SPECIAL HONOR AND GRATITUDE.

In connection with this feast at Bethany is an incident little in itself, and briefly sketched, but so important that it found a place in the history of the wonderful works and sayings of the Master, who refers to it as a memorial of the humble actor to be told in the whole world wherever this gospel should be preached. A memorial, not of ingratitude, dishonor, shame, infamy and crime, but the very opposite of these. The record runs thus: "Mary took a pound of ointment of spikenard, very costly, and anointed the feet of Jesus and wiped his feet with her hair: and the house was filled with the odor of the ointment. The intense love which glowed with such favor on this occasion, found expression in the act of anointing the feet of the prospective King. Among the ancients it was the usual custom to wash the feet of the guests before an entertainment, and with this the anointing of the feet was frequently connected. How wrought up must have been her feelings of love and gratitude, of respect and reverence toward the heavenly guest, who had, but a short time before, delivered from the cold embrace of death, her own loved and loving brother, who now reclined alive and cheerful with the other guests! The cost of that pound of ointment was not taken into account by the devoted and pious Mary. What was three hundred pence:—poor as she no doubt was—at that supreme moment when her adoring heart was wrought into a rhapsody of mingled love, gratitude, and veneration to the Great Teacher. All selfishness is sunk out of sight by the one overpowering thought of rendering honor to him whose worth in after-times should call forth from the hallowed lips of the living creatures, the four and twenty elders, the myriads of angels and every creature above, on the earth and under the earth, that wonderful and universal burst of praise which John the Revelator heard in ecstatic vision: blessing, and honor, and glory, and power be unto him that sitteth upon the throne and unto the Lamb for ever and ever. Rev. v. 13.

Many no doubt thought that the giving of the supper as an expression of esteem and gratitude toward the Master, in which all shared alike was sufficient. Mary thought differently. The deeper and more intense feelings of her own heart must find expression in this special act, involving a cost of more than three hundred pence, which others from economic consideration and a pretended regard for the poor looked upon as sinful waste.

Strangers and guests at many a feast had been anointed in the olden times. Prophets, priests and kings; and vessels and things had thus been consecrated to holy offices and uses through all the law dispensation. Here is a greater guest than any who by their presence graced the feasts of their times; a greater prophet than the greatest who had spoken in the name of the Lord; destined to be a priest, higher and holier than the high-priest of tabernacle and temple service; and a prospective King far above any of his predecessors in the list of David, or any of the world's kings who had swayed the sceptre of universal empire.

Worthy! worthy! thou Christ the Lord. Could any thing be fitter and more appropriate than this act of anointing, though performed by a woman, and without any imposing ceremonial! It was the symbolic homage of her heart prompted by simple faith in his greatness and goodness.

FALSE JUDGMENT.

Mark says, "Some had indignation" in view of the waste, and how far the money value of the ointment would have gone in relieving the wants of the poor. Judas specially was indignant—not that he cared for the poor, but because he was a thief and had the bag and bore what was put therein.

Jesus, looking beyond the outward act to the motive of the woman's heart said, let her alone; against the day of my burying hath she kept this. "For the poor ye always have with you, but me ye have not always. He commended the woman and rebuked the objector. Every day, and beyond the brief period of the Lord's sojourn among them, opportunities for the exercise of charity would meet them at every turn. The poor would be ever present as the law had declared, Deut. xv. 11, and for whose relief had laid every full-handed Israelites under tribute to their wants. Giving to the poor is lending to the Lord if done from love to God and our neighbor; but this is not the whole of Christian obligation. Beyond this, there is a wide field of service where every variety and degree of talent in the body of Christ may find opportunity and scope for exercise. Will write on this point at some future time.

EXPOSITION OF 1 Cor. xv. 24-28.

"Then cometh the end, when he shall deliver up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have abolished all rule and all authority and power. For he must reign, till he hath put all his enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be abolished is death. For, he put all things in subjection under his feet. But when he saith: All things are put in subjection, it is evident that he is excepted who did subject all things unto him. And when all things have been subjected unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subjected to him that did subject all things unto him, that God may be all in all."

By covenant and by promise and by prophecy the Son of Man has a right to the kingdom; he has a divine right to the rulership of this world. God the Father does not give up his own right; he does not cease to exercise his own Sovereign rule; but he exalts his Son, and gives him the kingdom for a period. The length of that time is specified. The Son "must reign, till he hath put all his enemies under his feet." The word till limits this reign; and the limit, according to Rev. xx. 4, is "a thousand years." During his reign all his enemies shall be subdued. This is fit and necessary for the completion of the Divine purpose. This work of subjection he must continue till the very last enemy, which is death, shall be abolished. In Psa. cx. 1, we read, "The Lord saith unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool." And these words of David are quoted by Christ and applied to himself. Matt. xxii. 44. The kingdom reaches till the resurrection of the wicked dead, for it is not till then that the reign of death is ended. The Divine decree accomplished, the promise of the kingdom for a thousand years fulfilled, all earthly rule and authority abolished, all enemies put down, the Son surrenders the kingdom to God, even the Father, his special reign over the nations being then consummated.

But what is the meaning of the phrase at the commencement of this passage, "Then cometh the end?" Much serious error has been promulgated by misunderstanding the sense in which the word then is used. It has been taught, and is still taught, that then will be the end of all human things and all human history. The passage contains nothing to favor such a view, as we shall show. The end of human things comes with the delivering up of the kingdom, but this delivering up is not at the period to which the word then seems, on the surface, to refer. In verse 23, we are taught that the resurrection of them that are Christ's takes place at his coming. Shortly after, the Millennial reign is ushered in, and he reigns till he has put all his enemies under his feet, the last of whom is death. But death is not abolished till the end of this reign. Therefore, the kingdom is not delivered up at his coming; that is, as soon as he comes, or at an early stage of his coming. While the word then is often used to mean, at that time, it is not so used in this place. Of this there is positive evidence in the verse preceding. "Christ the firstfruits; then they that are Christ's at his coming." Now we have more than 1800 years between the resurrection of Christ—the firstfruits—and they who are his, who shall be raised at his coming. Yet from these two events being both mentioned in one sentence, and the latter being introduced by the word then, it would seem to a superficial reader that one event immediately followed the other. But this word then, as here used, plainly refers to the thing that is next in order in the series of these great events. So the word then in the next verse—the verse in question—evidently refers, not to time, but to order, succession, or rank. The first great event named here (ver. 23) is Christ's resurrection. He is the firstfruits. This event is long since past. The next great event in this order is Christ's coming, which includes the resurrection of them that are his, his reigning, the restoration, the subduing of all his enemies, and the final judgment, which will cover a period of, at least, a thousand years. The next wonderful event in this order, or succession, is the delivering up of the kingdom to God, even the Father. This surrender, it is important to bear in mind, is not at his coming, when they who sleep in him are raised from the dead, but at the termination of his reign as the Messiah. This will be for the glory of the Father, that God may be all in all. It is as the Son of man, the Anointed, that he will restore it to the Father who gave it to him; but in his divine nature, in his capacity as the Divine Son, he, with the Father, shall reign for ever and ever.

This subjection of the Son should not be misunderstood. As the Divine Son, he was before Abraham; he had glory with the Father before the world was; he was the Prince, or Author of life; but at his incarnation a body was prepared for him, and he took upon himself the nature of man in order to redeem and restore fallen humanity. And when he comes again, he will come as the Son of man; he will come in his glorified human nature; in that nature he will take the kingdom and reign on David's throne. It is, then, in his human nature, though now exalted and glorified,—it is as the Christ, and in his offices which he has exercised, and will yet exercise, as the Christ, that he will "be subjected to him that did subject all things unto him, that God may be all in all." The extermination of all evil is implied in God being all in all. No will, human or angelic, can oppose God's will when he is all in all.

It will be observed that the phrase in verse 27, "He put all things in subjection under his feet," is in the past tense. The Father has done this "by promise, purpose, or decree." And it is as the Son of man, as the Christ, as the rightful Heir to the throne of David, that God has put all things in subjection under his feet. And this promise will shortly be fulfilled, and a new state of things will exist under the whole heaven. There will be a fifth kingdom, universal and most blessed, because of divine conception and divine ordering.

But when this decree was formed and this promise was given concerning the Christ, it is clear that the Father is excepted who made this promise. God the Father is not included in the "all things." The Son's supremacy is over all created beings both in heaven and in earth; but it is inferior to that of the Father. It is here plainly taught that the Son received his supremacy from the Father; and therefore, it follows that the Father's supremacy exceeds that of the Son. Paul here anticipates an objection that some might make, and answer it.

To the Brethren in Indiana.

Would it not be better for our next Quarterly Conference, to be held at Antioch in June, to meet on Thursday instead of Friday? It was the practice years ago to commence our conference meetings on Thursday; why it was changed to Friday I do not know.

Some of the questions that will be presented to the next conference for consideration are the following: How shall we bring about a more perfect union of all the churches? How shall we secure a representation of each church in the conference? How shall we organize the scattered brethren into churches? How shall we secure the services of enough proclaimers of the gospel to enable us to evangelize the entire State? Cannot steps be taken to secure the holding of a national conference for mutual consultation as to the best means of promulgating the gospel? At such a conference papers from eminent Bible students, upon such topics as the second advent of our Lord and Master, the signs of the times, and kindred subjects could be read. In my judgment much good would result from such a conference.

I will offer a few suggestions in answer to the foregoing inquiries. What is most needed is active, enthusiastic workers. The question is often asked, What are we going to do for preachers when these now in the work are laid to rest? The answer to this question will do much to solve the problem. We must get away from the old notion that religious services can only be conducted by an ordained minister. It is all right to consecrate suitable persons to the work of the ministry by ordaining them, which simply means they be set apart to that work. But it does not follow that others may not publicly expound or teach the gospel. To preach the gospel simply means to publish or teach the good news of the kingdom. At least one third of the entire membership of our church are, or may become, competent to do this. Suppose you was requested to look up the passages relating to baptism, arrange them in order and read them, with such comments as you might choose to make, at a public meeting to be held in a country school house for that purpose. How many of the readers of THE RESTITUTION could comply with such a request? I think a majority. And in doing so would they not be preaching the gospel relating to baptism much more correctly and effectually than is usually done by the preachers of the present day?

If I might be permitted to make a suggestion with reference to the best mode of preparing to teach the gospel, I would say, First, get a good, reference Bible; then get a ruling pen, a rule and some red ink. Now suppose you want to prepare on the subject of the second coming of Christ. Take your Bible and find a passage of Scripture referring to it. Draw red lines under each line that relates to that subject, and on the margin opposite the passage thus marked put a figure one in red ink. Take a slip of paper and mark the book, chapter and verse, that you underscored. Then from the reference in the margin get another passage and treat it in the same manner. On one of the fly leaves of your Bible write the figure 1, and opposite it the words, "The Second Coming of Christ." This will indicate that all passages with the figure 1 in red ink opposite them relate to the second advent of our Savior. Any other subject may be treated in the same way, using the figure 2 for the second, 3 for the third, and so on. When you desire to give a reading upon any subject, take your memorandum of book, chapter and verse, and carefully study all the passages relating to the particular subject and arrange them in the order in which you think they should be read, making another reference memorandum to be used when you come to give the reading. By reading the passages over several times and carefully studying them many things will be suggested to you, and in this way you will get an abundance of material for comment to be used by you in giving the reading. The red inking of the passages will so illuminate them that you will be able to find them in much less time and the eye will at once fall upon the desired passage.

AFFAIRS in Southeastern Europe and Southern Asia are in a very unsettled condition. While the desire of most of the Great Powers may seem for peace, the continual preparation is for war.

It is because we fully believe that the gospel of Christ is the power of God unto salvation, to every one that believeth, whether Jew or Greek; and because we believe that Jesus Christ has become the author of Eternal salvation unto all that obey him; and because we believe we are living under the new covenant arrangements by which the Old Israelitish covenant, with all its institutions, has been superceded and set aside; and, finally, because we believe that this new covenant has its own positive institutions for our observation; that we are writing the series of articles we are now placing before the readers of THE RESTITUTION. The law cannot justify nor save, although it is holy, just, and good. God only saves us now through Christ, and his gospel. Let us not, therefore, turn away from the new covenant to the old. To observe the divinely imposed sign of a covenant and not observe the covenant itself is absurd in the highest degree. God made the Sabbath the sign of his covenant with Israel only.

We read this morning April 5th, an item of news that may be of some interest to our readers. There is now only one person left on the roll of Revolutionary pensioners. This person is Mrs. Abigail S. Tilton who resides at North Woodbridge, N. H. She was formerly the wife of Benjamin Stevens, who participated in the battle of Bennington, as a Revolutionary soldier under General Stark. She became a widow, and was married a second time, but was divorced and resumed her maiden name. Her second marriage invalidated her right to a pension as a widow of Benjamin Stevens. The State of New Hampshire, however, granted her an allowance of two dollars a week for the rest of her life. But being "houseless, homeless, and childless," Congress about eight years ago allowed her, as a special Revolutionary pension, sixteen dollars a month. She is now a little over one hundred years old, enjoying excellent health, and retains her mental and physical faculties in a remarkable manner. About one year ago there were three other rollets of Revolutionary soldiers who drew pensions, but who have passed away since, and Mrs. Tilton is the last on the roll to compose the present with 1776.

EDITORIAL BREVITIES.

BIRS NIMROD.

About six miles S. W. of Hillah, and on the west side of the River Euphrates, is a mound that at a distance appears like a hill of shapeless earth, but which proves on examination, to be an old ruin composed of bricks and sand, which is doubtless, from the demonstrations of modern discovery,—in part at least—the old Tower of Babel; of the building of which we have an account in Gen. xi. 1-9. At the present time, it is of an oblong form having a circumference of about 762 yards. The description of travellers is to the effect that this mound on the eastern side is not more than 50 or 60 feet high; but that it rises in a conical form on the western side to the height of 198 feet. A vast mass of brickwork jutting from the mound reaches to a further height of 37 feet makes the full height 235 feet. This latter mass of brickwork is a part of Nebuchadnezzar's tower built of pale red bricks, as an inscription shows, who restored the older work 600 years before Christ. It had however been repaired by Tiglath Pilneser nearly, or quite a century before, and it was then a venerable relic of antiquity. The first bricks have inscriptions on them, and so perfectly are they cemented that it is nearly impossible to extract a brick whole. The other parts of this hill are covered with immense fragments of brickwork indiscriminately tumbled together and converted into solid vitrified masses as if acted upon by the fiercest heat, and in as much disordered as if they had been blown up by gunpowder. Strewn among these masses of vitrified brick are fragments of black stone, sandstone and marble. A bed of lichens covers nearly the whole surface, which in such a climate proves the vast age of the ruin. Of the fallen bricks some are yellow, some blue, and some a dark green. It is evident that the fallen masses have been subjected to the intensest fires. Explorers say that this fire evidently operated from above, and the conclusion is that the place was destroyed by lightning. Indeed there is an ancient tradition that the tower of Babel was rent and overthrown, as were Sodom and Gomorrah, by fire from heaven. It is said that its secret name in a most ancient language is Saggatu, meaning "the high temple," which goes to prove its extreme age. The probability is that it is only the lower stages of this structure that were built at the confusion of tongues. Another proof of identification is that "Borsippa"—the quarter of Babylon where Birs Nimrod is located—is said to mean "The Tower of Languages." There are records among the lately discovered inscriptions in which Nebuchadnezzar speaks of having repaired "The Temple of the Seven Lights and Planets of the Earth," which had remained unfinished from immemorial antiquity. From Geikie's Hours with the Bible we transcribe one of these descriptions and leave the subject for this time, as circumstances may lead us to say more hereafter. The translation of Nebuchadnezzar's account of his royal doings is—

> "The Temple of the Seven Planets, which is the Tower of Borsippa,
> Which former kings had built and raised to the height of forty-two cubits,
> But whose upper part, not having been finished by them,
> Had rolled away from extreme old age.
> The watersprings beneath it had not been kept in order:
> The rain and the tempest had ruined its buildings:
> The slabs that covered it had fallen off, and the bricks of its wall lay scattered in heaps:
> The great Lord Merodach incited my heart to repair it.
> Its site had not been disturbed: its platform had not been destroyed.
> In a fortunate month and on a lucky day
> I collected the first of the bricks of its wall and of the slabs that covered it, and rebuilt the ruins firmly.
> I placed inscriptions written in my name in the finest apartments.
> And thus made an end of rebuilding the ruin and completing its upper part."

But thanks be unto God, which always leadeth us in triumph in Christ, and maketh manifest through us the savour of his knowledge in every place. For we are a sweet savour of Christ unto God in them that are being saved, and in them that are perishing: to the one we are the savour from death unto death; to the other a savour of life unto life. 2 Cor. ii. 14-16. R. V.

The metaphorical language employed in these verses is drawn from the victorious display made by a conquering general when returning in a triumphal procession from a successful campaign against enemies. The ancient Romans made the triumph the stimulus to martial exploits. It was the highest honor that could be bestowed on a military commander. Flowers were scattered, and the sweet incense of aromatic odors was widely diffused as the conquering general moved in pomp along the streets of the capital, attended by his veteran soldiery, with the spoils of war and the vanquished captives in the train. The apostle speaks of himself here as a signal trophy of God's victorious power through Christ. We quote a note on the text which says:

> "θριαμβεύειν (which is mistranslated in A. V.) means to lead a man as a captive in a triumphal procession; θριαμβευειν εν χριστω means, to lead captive in a triumph over the enemies of Christ. The metaphor is taken from the triumphal procession of a victorious general. God is celebrating his triumph over His enemies; St. Paul (who had been so great an opponent of the Gospel) is a captive following in the train of the triumphal procession, yet (at the same time, by a characteristic change of metaphor) an incense-bearer, scattering incense (which was always done on these occasions) as the procession moves on. Some of the conquered enemies were put to death when the procession reached the Capitol; to them the smell of the incense was οσμη θανατου εις θανατον—an odor of death unto death—to the rest who were spared, οσμην ζωης εις ζωην—an odor of life unto life." God was making the apostle a wonderful example of his power to both subdue and save. The willing captive here takes part in the triumph.

> Savour of death unto death.... of life unto life, is well explained as being—"an odor arising out of death (a mere announcement of a dead Christ, and a virtually lifeless gospel, in which light rebels) were the gospel message), ending (to the just and natural consequence, to death (to the unbelievers); (but to the believer) an odor arising out of life (i. e., the announcement of a risen and living Savior), ending in life (to the believer)."

PAUL'S MINISTRY.

We will in this article endeavor to confirm, from Paul's explicit teaching in his writings in other places, that the interpretation, given in a former article, of 2 Cor. iii. 14, was correct; viz: That it was the covenant and not the veil that "is done away in Christ." Our readers will have noticed that this signification of the apostle's language was sustained by several references to learned translators and commentators, as well as to the original text.

Before, however, appealing further to his direct testimony we will quote from Moses himself in order to learn precisely what the old covenant, to which Paul alludes in his writings to the churches, was as defined by the lawgiver himself.

From Ex. xxxiv. 1-3, we learn that the Lord directed Moses to hew two tables of stone like unto the first, and, says the Lord, "I will write upon these tables the words that were on the first tables, which thou brakest. And be ready in the morning, and come up in the morning unto Mount Sinai, and present thyself there to me in the Mount. And he hewed two tables of stone, like unto the first; and Moses rose up early in the morning, and went up into Mount Sinai, as the Lord had commanded him, and took in his hand the two tables of stone." Passing now to verses 27-29, we read: "And the Lord said unto Moses, Write thou these words; for after the tenor of these words, I have made a covenant with the children of Israel. And he was there with the Lord forty days and forty nights; he did neither eat bread nor drink water. And he wrote upon the tables the words of the covenant the ten commandments. And it came to pass when Moses came down from Mount Sinai with the two tables of testimony in Moses' hand, when he came down from the Mount, that Moses wist not that the skin of his face shone while he talked with him."

Here we have the renewed giving of the ten commandments upon two tables of stone written in words, or letters, and not only expressly called the "words of the covenant of the ten commandments," but also "a covenant made with the children of Israel." It was in receiving this old covenant that Moses face was caused to shine. Will our readers peruse the entire chapter and carefully compare it with what we wrote in our last, especially with what Paul said to his Corinthian brethren about Moses' face, and about this "ancient covenant written in letters and graven on stones" being "done away in Christ." As this is an account of the giving of the tables the second time we will refer our readers to another place where Israel's Lawgiver, Moses, gives an account of the receiving of the first tables which he broke. We will quote from Deut. ix, 8-11: "Also in Horeb ye provoked the Lord to wrath, so that the Lord was angry with you to have destroyed you. When I was gone up into the Mount, to receive the tables of stone, even the tables of the covenant which the Lord made with you, then I abode in the Mount forty days and forty nights, I did neither eat bread nor drink water; and the Lord delivered unto me two tables of stone written with the finger of God; and on them was written according to all the words which the Lord spake with you in the Mount, out of the midst of the fire in the day of the assembly. And it came to pass at the end of forty days and forty nights, that the Lord gave me the two tables of stone, even the tables of the covenant." We turn now to Deut. iv, 11-13, for a brief account of the circumstances attending the giving of these two tables which "were written with the finger of God:" "And ye came near and stood under the mountain; and the mountain burned with fire unto the midst of heaven, with darkness, clouds, and thick darkness. And the Lord spake unto you out of the midst of the fire: Ye heard the voice of the words, but saw no similitude; only ye heard a voice. And he declared unto you his covenant, which he commanded you to perform, even ten commandments; and he wrote them upon two tables of stone."

From these quotations we learn two facts; that the ten commandments, were God's covenant and that this covenant was made with Israel alone. Moses, speaking of this very covenant made with the children of Israel at Horeb, says: "The Lord made a covenant with us in Horeb. The Lord made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us, even us, who are alive this day." Deut. v. 2, 3.

Speaking of the Sabbath as a sign of this covenant, the Lord commanded Israel, saying, Ex. xxxi. 16, 17: "Wherefore the children of Israel shall keep the Sabbath, to observe the Sabbath throughout their generations, for a perpetual covenant. It is a sign between me and the children of Israel forever: for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, and on the seventh day he rested and was refreshed." The covenant made upon Sinai, or Horeb, with Israel, of which the Sabbath was the sign, was written in the first place by "the finger of God" upon the two tables of stone, which Moses broke on account of Israel's sin; and was afterward rewritten, not by God, but by Moses on another set of tables. This covenant, as our quotations show was made with Israel alone, and unknown to their fathers. These tables of the covenant, written by Moses, were placed in an ark or chest, of which the cover was the Mercy Seat, and this ark was placed in the Most Holy Place of the Tabernacle, and as these tables were called "the two tables of testimony," the ark containing them was called "the ark of testimony," and the tabernacle itself was called "the tabernacle of testimony." We will once more see how Paul treats this ancient covenant as connected with the ark and sanctuary places. We will give the apostle's allusions to this covenant on the tables, within the ark, and in the most holy place of the tabernacle, in the translation made by the Revisers.

Speaking of the Son of God as High Priest and Mediator of the New Covenant, Paul says: "But now hath he obtained a ministry the more excellent, by how much also he is the Mediator of the better covenant, which hath been enacted upon better promises. For if that first covenant had been faultless, then would no place have been sought for a second. For finding fault with them he saith, Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah: not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers, in the day that I took them by the hand to lead them forth out of the land of Egypt: for they continued not in my covenant, and I regarded them not, saith the Lord. For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my laws into their mind, and on their heart will I write them; and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people. And they shall not teach every man his fellow citizen, and every man his brother, saying Know the Lord: for all shall know me, from the least to the greatest of them. For I will be merciful to their iniquities, and their sins will I remember no more. In that he saith, A new covenant, he hath made the first old. But that which is becoming old and waxeth aged is nigh unto vanishing away.

Now even the first covenant had ordinances of divine service, and its sanctuary was in this world. For there was a tabernacle prepared, the first, wherein were the candlestick, and the table, and the showbread; which is called the Holy Place. And after the second veil, the tabernacle which is called the Holy of holies; having a golden censer, and the ark of the covenant overlaid round about with gold, wherein was a golden pot holding the manna, and Aaron's rod that budded, and the tables of the covenant." Heb. viii. 6-13 and ix. 1-4. Here we find the same tables of the covenant, that Moses repeatedly says was made with Israel, in the ark and in the most holy place of the sanctuary which was in this world. Like Moses, Paul—quoting from the prophet—says this covenant was made with those that God led forth from the land of Egypt, or with Israel. And it is this very covenant—written on "the tables of the covenant," the ten commandments, as Moses explicitly shows; and which tables were in the ark, as both Moses and Paul declare—that has waxed old and vanished away before the glories of the "new covenant," the "better covenant" of which Christ is the Mediator.

Following the inspired teachings of Paul, who was made "an able minister of this new covenant," we have reached the same result that we did in our former article, viz: that "the old covenant is done away in Christ"—has vanished away before the new and everlasting covenant, of which the Son of God is both Mediator and High Priest. With the vanishing covenant vanishes its "sign" the Jewish Sabbath. If it is made binding under the arrangements of the new covenant, it must, as an institution, be re-enacted, and the special reason for this re-enactment given.

In our next we propose to show just what instructions Paul, as a chosen minister of the new covenant, and teacher and apostle of the Gentiles, has actually given about the Sabbath, the sign of the old covenant made with Israel. So far our sole guide has been the Scriptures. We have sought no help from the learned, only as to the grammatical construction and meaning of the original language. If language has any definite signification we have shown that the ten commandments, on the two tables of stone, placed in the ark, embraced the ancient covenant made with Israel, and with Israel alone; and that this very covenant was done away in Christ, and had vanished when the new covenant was preached by its ministers—Paul and the other apostles.

PEACE OR WAR.

It is still doubtful whether we are to have a general war this spring or not. It depends upon many contingencies. There are certainly only two nations that desire a war, Russia and Germany, and these nations have no wish to fight each other. Germany wishes to fight France alone and Russia to attack Austria alone; but Germany does not wish to see Austria destroyed, and Russia does not wish to see France reduced to a second-rate power. There can be no certainty of war, then, unless Germany and Russia either come to some agreement or make up their minds to fight each other. If there were no other strong nations in Europe an agreement would be easily come to. Germany would pay for Russian neutrality by giving her a free hand in the Balkan Peninsula. It seems probable that Germany has already proposed this, but that Russia hesitates to accept, through fear of Italy and England, who might unite with Austria and Turkey to resist the advance of Russia to Constantinople.

We are just now at this point of uncertainty; but Europe is in such a condition that an accident may decide the question of peace or war before any arrangement has been come to between Russia and Germany. The old Emperor of Germany may die. The Czar may be led by the war party in Russia to take some hasty step in the Bulgarian question. France may suddenly take fire at the threats of Germany, or Montenegro may begin the war in Herzegovina. On the whole, there are at least six chances out of ten that we shall have an outbreak of war within two months. As it must come sooner or latter, it is perhaps as well for it to come this year as next.

Bismark was undoubtedly right when he asserted in his great speech before the German Parliament that another war between France and Germany was inevitable. France has never accepted the loss of her provinces, and the one thing that the Republic has steadily adhered to has been the policy of developing the army. It is now larger than that of Germany and is rapidly reducing the government to bankruptcy. At the first favorable opportunity France intends to attack Germany; of this there is no doubt, and the Bulgarian question gives them some hope that they may now win the support and aid of Russia. It seems to me that Bismark had some reason for alarm, although France would not have declared war at this time without the countenance of Russia. She is not ready for it. It would seem that Bismark also hoped to be able to secure the friendship of Russia and thought it a favorable time to provoke the French to war. It is a dangerous game that he is playing, and if it ends in war the result is doubtful.

Russia meanwhile maintains her hostile attitude toward Bulgaria, and is using all her influence to create disturbance there. The Bulgarian deputation which has visited the capitals of Europe is now in Constantinople. It has received assurances everywhere that the independence of Bulgaria will be maintained, and it feels itself in full accord with the Turkish Government as to what ought to be done; but, according to the treaty of Berlin, it is necessary for all the Powers to assent to the choice of a Prince, and Russia holds out in her refusal to agree to any one until after the full satisfaction of her demands. It is evidently her purpose to postpone a settlement until the events of the spring make it plain whether the time is favorable for her to occupy the country. Meanwhile her demands are such as the Bulgarians cannot accept. She demands the abolition of all existing government in the country—the electing of a new Constituent Assembly under Russian supervision, the election of a Prince to be named by Russia, a revision of the constitution, the practical incorporation of the army into the Russian army, and the acceptance of two or three Russians appointed by the Czar as the principal ministers of the Prince. She claims that all this will give her only that legitimate influence to which she has a right under the treaty of Berlin, and the latest official announcement made declares that on these points she will yield nothing. As the Bulgarians naturally refuse to make this wholesale surrender the Russians are trying, unsuccessfully thus far, to stir up a revolution against the existing government.

If this had been simply a question between Russia and Bulgaria, it would have been settled long ago by armed force, and the Bulgarian patriots would have been in Siberia before this time. Indeed, it would have been folly for them to resist at all. But thus far Russia has been restrained from carrying out her will by the fear of finding herself opposed by a coalition of Powers. France and Germany may be ready to sacrifice Bulgaria for a Russian alliance, but no Power in Europe desires to see this advance of Russia toward Constantinople. They may not care much for the Bulgarians, but they see that their own interests are involved. Austria and Turkey especially understand that their fate depends upon that of Bulgaria. Sooner or later, if not this spring, they must resist the occupation of Bulgaria by Russia in a life-and-death struggle. They may yield now on account of the unfortunate condition of the other European states, in the hope of finding allies later; but neither Austria nor Turkey can long exist with Russia firmly seated on the Balkans.

Russia will have to decide within a few weeks whether to strike now or to compromise with the Bulgarians and postpone her advance to a more favorable opportunity. It is hard to see how she can hope for a more promising chance than the present one. Germany and France are engaged in their own conflict. Austria is totally unprepared for war, and cannot possibly complete her preparation this spring. Turkey is bankrupt. England is absorbed in the Irish question, and her new democracy cares no more for Constantinople than for the man in the moon. Her government is liable to be overturned any day, and cannot act with vigor on its own convictions. Italy is in the midst of a great political crisis. If war really breaks out between France and Germany, or if the present state of expectation of war continues, it would seem probable that the Czar will either attack Austria directly or occupy Bulgaria and put Montenegro forward to raise an insurrection in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

It is undoubtedly the most critical moment that Europe has seen since 1815. It is not simply the fate of Empires or the liberty of the Balkan Peninsular which is involved, but the civilization of the world. It is the crisis of that struggle to which Napoleon looked forward when he predicted that Europe would one day be either Cossack or Republican. Russia today makes no secret of her determination to overthrow "the rotten civilization of Western Europe" and to replace it by a new civilization of her own. The editor of the paper which proclaims this most loudly is Katkoff, the most influential adviser of the Czar. If his dream can be realized, if he can make Russia supreme at Constantinople and as far as the Adriatic—taking in all the Southern Slavs; the Czar will certainly be in a position to dominate all Europe and to crush out all liberalism in his own Empire. For the sake of Russia as well as of Europe, it is to be hoped that this scheme of conquest may never be realized.

It is not a new one. It has been attempted many times, and so often it has failed. Now a new barrier stands in the way of Russia. In all her former attempts she has had the sympathy of the Christian population of Turkey, but she has this no longer. Roumania, Bulgaria and Servia have tasted the sweets of liberty, and their submission to Russia would be a return to slavery—a more hopeless bondage than that from which they have escaped. They understand this perfectly. They would be glad to have Russia for a friend. They have strong sympathy with the Russian people, who are of their own race and religion, and are quite ready to pray for the Czar; but they have no desire to be devoured by the Russian bear. So long as there is any fear of this, they would rather dispense with his friendship.

I believe that this new barrier more than compensates for the increasing weakness of Turkey, and that Russia is as far off as ever from the conquest of Constantinople. We had an illustration here the other day of the hostility of the Greeks also to Russia. A new Patriarch was to be elected and Russia used the customary means to secure the election of her own candidate, who, by the way, was a liberal and worthy man; but he was defeated and an open enemy of Russia was chosen. This hostility of the Christians, of the East to Russia is comparatively a new thing and arises from their growing conviction that she is the only Power which they have to fear. Their own desire is to be let alone, that they may work out their own destiny in their own way. Bulgarian, Greek, and Armenian alike are ready now to say to Russia, "We want neither your honey nor your sting." It is not ingratitude on their part. They would gladly have been the good friends and allies of Russia, but she herself, by her agents and by her press, has made them understand that she wants not friends but subjects. To them the impending war seems a matter of life and death.—George Washburn, in Independent.

Publisher's Notes.

A few to whom we sent letters, notifying them that their subscription has expired, and requesting a few lines of instruction as to their wishes in the matter, have not favored us with a reply. To do business honorably we must have a definite understanding with each other, so we ask all who have not yet answered, to do so at once. Any one who cannot pay for our paper will be furnished free, by asking for it.

Fathers and mothers, read the advertisements in another part of this paper of new books for the young. Remember, your child will read something, and in this day of trash in the literary world, designed specially for the young, it is the positive duty of every parent to place good books in the hands of his child.

Bro. J. P. Wyethe writes under date of Mar. 28, that it will be about three weeks before his new book "The Eastern Question" is ready for delivery, so that by the last of next week we hope to be able to fill the orders we have received. Send in your orders, and get one just as soon as the book is ready. Price $2 50—or with "The Coming Age," the two together, $3.00.

Read our book list—The Emphatic Diaglott reduced from $4.00 to $2.50. Cruden's Complete Concordance to the Bible, for $1.50 Smith's Bible Dictionary only $1.50. Views and Reviews in Eschatology—the last work of J. H. Pettingell—for $1.00. Do not fail to secure this book, it is good, and worth double the price asked for it. Tracts for distribution by the pound for 60 cents.

"The Unspeakable Gift," by J. H. Pettingell, is now offered at one-half price. We have 500 copies of this work and should like to have them all taken in the next three months. This book contains absolutely conclusive proof of Life only in Christ, and as a missionary is ahead of anything published. If you do not need it yourself, don't you know a friend who could read it to good advantage? It will only cost a few cents to place it in the hands, and who can tell the good that may come of such a little effort on your part. We want to place a quantity of these books in the hands of missionary workers in this and other lands, and for this purpose will open a fund of free will gifts. Those of our friends who wish to take part in this missionary work may do so. The door is open, and though we do not urge this upon our brethren (for it should need no urging) we will just say, the privilege is yours.

THE UNSPEAKABLE GIFT.

A fund of five will sometime to send the above named work to mission workers in this and other lands.

GOD PRAISED BY THE CREATION.

The sun that walks his airy way
To light the world, and give the day;
The moon that shines with borrowed light;
The stars that gild the gloomy night;
The seas that roll unnumbered waves;
The wood that spreads its shady leaves;
The field whose ears conceal the grain,
The yellow treasure of the plain,—
All of these, and all I see,
Should be sung, and sung by me:
They speak their Maker as they can,
But want, and ask the tongue of man.
Go search among your idle dreams,
Your busy or your vain extremes,
And find a life of equal bliss,
Or own the next begun in this.

PAYNOR, OHIO.

Dear Restitution:

This article was intended for the Voice, a prohibition paper printed in New York, and this article was sent there for publication, and was refused on the ground that they did not publish any thing of a religious character, as that paper was solely devoted to politics. So I thought that I would send it to THE RESTITUTION, and if you consider it worth a place in the paper you can print it. I think that the person who wrote on "the coming man" through the Voice, thinks that the good time which is to come, is to be brought about by, or through the prohibition party.

REPLY TO AN OPEN LETTER ON "THE COMING MAN."

Editor Voice:

I see in the Sept. No. of the Voice, an article written by some one (addressed) an open letter on "The Coming Man," which I have read with deep interest. Our friend says, who is to be the coming man is a question of absorbing interest. He also says that we cannot afford to make a mistake as to who the coming one will be. And in that I fully agree with him, and that we may give the trumpet no uncertain sound we will take the word of God as our guide in answering our friend's most important question. But right here I may be met with the objection, What has the Bible to do with politics? I claim that the Bible has more to do with politics than most people are inclined to think. They have the meaning of the word politics being the science of government (and good government is what is needed).

Then religion intelligently understood is a political question of the very highest order. The word religion as defined by our National Standard Dictionary is a system of faith and worship. And as the Bible alone reveals that system of faith, or things to be believed, we shall appeal to the divine record for light upon this great subject. Now this system of faith embraces the covenants of promise which God made unto Abraham and his seed, whom Paul affirms to be Christ, and which promise is that "they should inherit the world;" and that covenant made to Abraham and Christ, also includes the kingdom of God as embracing all the kingdoms of men, as I hope to be able to prove. Now while our friend beholds the coming man as through a glass darkly, yet there are some rays of divine light which seem to penetrate his mental vision, and if he will patiently bear with me, I think that we can extricate him from the dilemma into which he, with a host of others, has been thrown. This great personage, which looms up before his vision (like Nebuchadnezzar's image of old) is, as I believe, the Lord Jesus Christ, because our friend uses language to describe his coming man which will only apply to God's appointed King, and almost the same which the disciples used when Christ rode into Jerusalem, see Luke xix. 38, "Blessed be the King that cometh in the name of the Lord; peace in heaven, and glory in the highest." Such language will only apply to our Savior, and no doubt will be reiterated when he comes again to set up his kingdom. Jehovah once possessed a kingdom on the earth in the hands of the nation of Israel, and it is this same kingdom which he has promised to give his royal Son Jesus, as I hope to show. I will first invite your attention to Exodus xix. 5, 6, God spoke through his servant Moses to the children of Israel saying, "Now, therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people, for all the earth is mine, and ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation. These are the words which thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel." Turn also to 1 Chron. xxviii. 5, "And David said, of all my sons, (for the Lord hath given me many sons) he hath chosen Solomon my son to sit upon the throne of the kingdom of the Lord, over Israel." In another place it is said, that "Solomon sat upon the throne of the Lord, as king, instead of David his father, and prospered, and all Israel obeyed him." Now it was not until after the nation of Israel rejected God as their King that he overthrew their kingdom. See 1 Sam. viii. 7. And to prove that the kingdom was afterward overturned, see Ezekiel xxi. 25–27. "And thou profane wicked prince of Israel, whose day is come when iniquity shall have an end. Thus saith the Lord, remove the diadem and take off the crown, I will overturn it, and it (the kingdom) shall be no more until he come, whose right it is, and I will give it him." But long before God overthrew this Israelitish kingdom on account of their many sins, he made a promise unto David, that he would raise him up a son, that would build up his throne to all generations. By the mouth of Isaiah the prophet, God says, "And I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a king shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely, and this is the name whereby he shall be called The Lord our Righteousness," also Jeremiah xxxiii. 20. "Thus saith the Lord; if ye can break my covenant of the day, and my covenant of the night, and that there should not be day and night in their season, then may also my covenant be broken with David my servant, that he should not have a son to reign upon his throne." Isaiah ix. 6–7. "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, (now mark) and the government shall be upon his shoulders, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it and to establish it with judgment and justice from henceforth, even forever." Now please turn to Luke i. 30–33, "And the angel said unto Mary, Fear not for thou hast found favor with God, and behold thou shalt bring forth a son, and shalt call his name Jesus. He shall be great, and shall be called the son of the Highest and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end." But says an objector, Christ is now reigning on David's spiritual throne in heaven. To which I reply, that David never possessed a throne there, I think that the apostle Peter settles that point. See Acts ii. Peter was preaching the gospel, and it was about this restored Israelitish kingdom, and was proving to the Jews that this same Jesus whom they had crucified, was the one who was to occupy David's throne, verse 29, "Men and brethren, let me freely speak unto you of the Patriarch David, that he is both dead and buried, and his grave is with us unto this day. Therefore, he (David) being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath unto him, that of the fruit of his loins according to the flesh he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne. David seeing this before, spake of the resurrection of Christ, verse 34, for David is not ascended into the heavens, but said himself the Lord, said unto my Lord (Christ) sit thou on my right hand until I make thy foes thy footstool," Peter in the third of Acts, tells his brethren to "repent, for killing the Prince of Life, and to be converted, that their sins might be blotted out, when the time of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord, and he shall send Jesus Christ which before was preached unto you, whom the heavens must receive until the time of restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." If God means to restore all things instead of burning them up, will not the throne or tabernacle of David be one of the all things to be restored when Jesus comes? Indeed the disciples were so anxious about its restoration that just before his ascension to heaven, they asked of him, "Lord wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel? Christ knew that he would not enter upon his reign at this time; he therefore deemed it best to tell them it was not for them to know the times and seasons that the Father had put in his own power. King Herod understood Christ's reign to be literal, and expected that the new rival king would dispossess him of his throne. He, therefore, demanded where Christ was born, and then sent soldiers to go and slay all the infant children in that region of country. But the heathen did not need to rage then, and the people imagine a vain thing. For God was not ready yet to set his King upon his holy hill of Zion. I will now prove that the kingdoms of this world belong to God's anointed Son Jesus: Psalms ii. God says unto him, "Ask of me and I will give thee heathen, or nations, for thine inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession" also Rev. xi. 15, "And the seventh angel sounded, and there was a great voice in heaven saying, the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever." Also Daniel xi. 13–14, "I Daniel, saw in the night visions, one like the Son of man, who came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days; and there was given him dominion and glory and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve him. His dominion is an everlasting one, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed, and the Lord shall be King over all the earth, in that day. There shall be one Lord and his name one," Zech. xiv. 9. I think that I have proved who the coming one will be of whom we hear so much said. I also think that I have proved who is the rightful heir to David's throne, and also to the kingdoms of men. Although this kingdom of God, or kingdom of heaven will be located on the earth, and will be just as real and visible as any other kingdom, yet it will be divine, and ruled on the plane of spirit as its rulers will possess spiritual or glorified bodies. This is the kingdom in which all true believers in the gospel are invited to participate. And human governments are but a type of God's divine administration. Now if our friend wishes to know when the kingdom will come for which we are taught to pray, I answer Matthew xxv. 31, "When the Son of Man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory," which is the throne of his father David.

And now thou great Jehovah who didst send thine only begotten Son into the world to suffer and die to redeem lost and fallen man, and didst allow him to be mocked, and to have a crown of thorns placed upon his fair brow in derision of his right and just claims to the throne; will thou grant to remove the veil which is over the face of all nations that the people may be made to see and understand thy wise and glorious purpose in sending thy beloved Son into this, our world. Submitted in the Spirit of love.

THE FIRST PRAYER MEETING.

Let us transfer ourselves, through time, to the year thirty-three of the Christian era, and through space, to Jerusalem, a city renowned in both sacred and secular history. We are there on the day of our Lord's ascension, the fortieth after his resurrection. It is a bright day in early summer. The city is unusually quiet, for the multitude that were here at the Passover have returned to their homes, and will not again throng the streets till the feast of Pentecost, ten days hence. The mountains round about Jerusalem," terraced with vineyards, and dotted with orchards of the olive and the pomegranate, present a picturesque panorama. The sun, high up in the heavens, pours his fervors upon hill and valley. The heat is oppressive, and we covet the free atmosphere and the genial shade of suburban retreats. From the house roof we see the temple, lifting high its gilded dome and its many turrets, and we long to go around it, and enter it as far as we may, and study its architecture. Other places we wish to visit, as the pool Bethesda, and Pilate's palace within the walls, and Gethsemane, and Calvary, and Joseph's tomb, "the place where the Lord lay," without the gates; yea, and more remote spots of special interest, as Bethlehem, and the Jordan, and Bethany, and Emmaus.

From our place of observation, we have a full view of the western slope of the Mount of Olives. As we look in that direction, we see eleven men slowly descending by the path that leads over the hill from Bethany. Passing not far from Gethsemane, they cross "the little brook by the way," and enter the city by the north-eastern gate. Soon we see them in the street below us, that leads along the western side of the temple area directly toward Zion. We are interested in their appearance; they seem to be profoundly affected by something they have witnessed, and, with hurried step are hastening to convey to others the intelligence. We descend and follow them, till they come to a private residence, where they know that their presence is ever acceptable, and where they have often been with One who is not now with them. The house is in a narrow, retired street, away from the marts of business, the thoroughfares of fashion, and the mansions of aristocracy. We pass, after the heated and dusty travellers, into a quadrangular court, and then along the corridor, and up a winding staircase into "an upper room" that has often been the gathering-place of the meek and lowly. It appears to us more cheerless than attractive. The windows are unglazed, the floor is uncarpeted, the seats are of the Judean form. There we find a number of persons, both men and women, as if waiting for the arrival of others, and we soon discover that the eleven are the expected comers. But a few words are exchanged before we understand the whole matter. The little company are collected, under new and interesting circumstances, for Christian worship. Their Lord and Master has withdrawn from them bodily, and returned to heaven. They are not without him; they are thrown upon one another for solace and communion. They are about to engage in a social devotion; they need it for consolation and spiritual refreshment. No priest is present with his vestments and censer; and if there were, this is not the place for him to officiate. No one seems to have the precedence. Their whole appearance indicates lowliness of condition. The men are mostly fishermen from Galilee, and the women are of the same gradation of society. None of those who were secretly the friends of their Master are present. Not one has the degree of cultivation that would point him out as a fitting leader. They do not appear as if, by any means, they could ever make a noise in the world, or do anything that would provoke even the contempt of their superiors. A more unpromising convention of embryo reformers could not easily be collected. What ends do they propose by this meeting?

As we observe their countenances, deeply graven with significant lines, we perceive the indications of anxiety. Some burden is evidently resting upon every heart. They have come together under the influence of strong affinities. Kindred trials, exposures, affections, sorrows, hopes, have made them intimate, friendly, mutually sympathizing. They must be a society by themselves, or stand alone in their individuality, unbefriended, having no associates. Only to one another, in guarded words and subdued tones, can they speak without reserve. They are under a common pressure; they have common griefs and apprehensions, common remembrances and anticipations. Everything outward and inward conduces to their union. They are not perfectly calm. The varied, exciting scenes through which, in the last six weeks, providence has conducted them, are not forgotten. Their nerves, ordinarily hardy and insusceptible, have been rendered especially sensitive by the rapid succession of strange events, some very depressing, some very elevating, all unexpected and surprising. Whatever may at times have been their boldness, fearlessness, self-reliance, they are now exceedingly timid and apprehensive. A little flock, weak and unprotected, they are an outcast fraction of the social mass, crushed by a mountain of reproach. Identified with him whose name and cause have been publicly branded as superlatively infamous, they are little less than proclaimed outlaws, and but for their insignificance, would be hunted to the death, as was their Master. Were it known that they are assembled as the followers of Christ, they would soon have priest and elder and scribe and soldier down upon them. But they are not feared, they are not hardly suspected. Pilate knows them not, and cares as little for them as he cared for their Lord. The Sanhedrim do not imagine that, having lost their Leader by public execution, they will be likely to rally and attempt an organized movement. Their danger therefore, so long as they meet secretly, is not great. Yet they are not wholly at ease. Every foot-fall, every sound, in the court or in the street, causes them to listen, and awakens solicitude. Their minds are unsettled, confused. The past is crowded with conflicting recollections; the future is impenetrably obscure. We do not wonder at their tenderness and solemnity.

The eleven disciples—alas! the twelfth is missing!—have, as we saw, just come in from the Mount of Olives, that part which overlooks Bethany. Their eyes are red with weeping and earnest looking. Their hearts palpitate with strong emotions. They have had a tender, parting interview with their Lord. They have heard him with strained vision, taken their farewell look as the cloud "received him out of their sight." For their precious lingering at the place where they last saw him, they have been gently rebuked by messengers from heaven, and assured that their departed Friend should come again according to his promise. Since they came in, they have related the facts with as much of order and minuteness as their agitation would permit. All are affected with a profound interest. There is much that they do not understand, and many questions are asked. They remember intimations of future developments; but their faith has never half embraced them. When their Master died, and was sleeping in the tomb, they gave up all as lost. They had thought that he was the promised one "who should have redeemed Israel;" but his death had darkened that prospect. When he rose and demonstrated to them "by many infallible signs," his identity, they were as much surprised as they were gladdened; for, though he had plainly foretold, they had not really expected, the event. Some of them went to the sepulchre on the morning of the third day, not to see if he had risen, but to embalm his body for permanent preservation and repose. Now that he has ascended, they have mingled feelings; rejoicing that he is out of the reach of harm; sorrowing that they have lost his personal presence, his endeared society, his instructive counsel, his wise leadership. They remember that he said he would send "another comforter," who should supply his place, and render them important service; but into the full purport of that promise they have not entered. The denser shades are removed; Providence has shown them how light may arise out of obscurity; but as yet they see nothing clearly; all is misty and indefinite. He has charged them to do a certain work, and promised to give them success; but when, or where, or how to begin, they do not know. He commanded, "Tarry ye in Jerusalem until ye be endued with power from on high." He promised, "And ye shall receive power after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you; and ye shall be witnesses unto me, both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth." Those words are floating in their minds, and putting them upon the stretch of inquiry; but their meaning is not fully apprehended. The command they can obey; they can remain in Jerusalem rather than return to Galilee; but what is that "power from on high" for which they are to wait? What are they to understand by the coming of the Holy Ghost upon them? A wide field is assigned them for a certain service. What is that service in either form or design? What is it to be Christ's witnesses in such a field, embracing first the city where they are, then the surrounding country, then the adjoining province, then the entire world? Here are problems of magnitude, and, in their present state of mind, difficult of solution. They confer together upon these subjects, but no one seems to have any definite ideas; no one proposes a plan of action. They perceive no door open for a commencement of operations. They remember that their Lord gave them a broad commission, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature," and they are at no loss respecting what he meant by preaching, for he had set them the example, and some of them had known something of the work by personal experience. But the order of procedure was specified. "Beginning at Jerusalem;"—that was a special command. How to obey it they knew not. Were they required to go to Egypt, or to Asia Minor, or even to Rome, and begin, they would be off tomorrow with heart and hope. But to commence in Jerusalem, the headquarters of opposition; to vindicate their Master's claims where the prejudice against him is the strongest, and the hatred of his name the most virulent; to declare his innocence to the people whose hands are yet red with his blood; to attest to his resurrection in face of the belief that they have stolen his body from the tomb; to say that he has ascended to heaven, whence he will return to be King of the world; to exhibit him as the one, the only, the all-sufficient Savior of men—how can they do all this? They regard the obstacles as insurmountable. They feel their own weakness as they never before felt it. Their hearts are tender; but their understandings are dark; their courage is feeble; they are in suspense, not knowing what to do. They seemed walled in by difficulties too high to be scaled, too solid to be broken. True, their Lord has said, "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth;" but he has left them, and their feeling is one of desolation. In what direction shall they look for relief? Discussion kindles no light; they have no counsellor; they have no wisdom of their own. If help shall come, it must be from above.

Important fragmentary as is their faith, they believe in prayer. Old Testament Scriptures teach abundantly the acceptableness and the efficacy of prayer. They have often heard their Master pray; he has taught them to pray, he has assured them that whatsoever they should ask in his name, it should be done for them by his Father. What is so befitting their present condition as prayer?

No sooner is it proposed than all consent, and immediately all are upon their knees. If now we listen, we shall hear prayer that is prayer, and the mumblings of a form, but the expression of felt want. Silenced as these persons are, shut up as we see them, to this one resource, we are not surprised that they are "of one accord" in the exercise—agreed as touching the thing which they ask. We have in them a specimen of true social devotion. Their necessity is one; their source of supply is one; their hearts beat in unison before the mercy-seat; the petitions presented by one bear the signatures of all; they are unanimously in full sympathy with their object and with one another. They need light, and all as one ask for light.

These are holy hours; this is an oratory such as the world has never seen. Jerusalem is ignorant of the power that is here getting hold of the throne—a power that will yet shake this metropolis of pride and unbelief.

The shades of evening come over them, wearied with excitement, and, agreeing to meet again, they embrace, speak words of cheer, and separate for the night. We have seen the beginning of the First Prayer Meeting; we have a presentiment of something more and better. These people, we are sure, have commenced their work at the right point and in the right way.

Let us now come back to our homes and to the nineteenth century, and look at what Christianity has become and has done. There, in that small upper room, we have seen the rudimental Church consisting of a few individuals, unorganized, feeble, hated, strengthless. What could they do? They had no learning, no property, no influence. They were shut up to one course. They availed themselves of the one means to which they were restricted, and as we shall repeat our visits, we may see wonderful results from that simplest of all agencies, a primitive prayer meeting. In that which we have seen, the first of the kind, we see cradled the infant cause of Christ. There is the earliest development of Church life, the budding germ of that enterprise which will soon expand into largely comprehensive results. How instructive the lesson!

It may not be said that the prayer meeting is the life of a Church; but it may be said that it is the nurse of a Church's life, the manifestation of its life, the measure of its life. The Head of the Church, by arranging that prayer meeting in Jerusalem so soon after his ascension, indicated his will and our duty. He made it the type of a permanent lesson. He intended that we should learn from it the condition of spiritual prosperity. If we would have his favor, conveyed under the best circumstances for ourselves and others, we must have a place for social devotion, and we must "continue in prayer and supplication." That church is the most prosperous which is, not the largest or wealthiest or genteelest, but, the most prayerful; which maintains, unitedly, vigorously, the best Prayer Meeting.

COUNT BEUST ON THE JEWS.

Count Beust was a Protestant, and his religious convictions were known to be sincere and deep-rooted; but he was no fanatic. While Prime Minister of Saxony, he always did his best to prevent the Jews of that kingdom from being defrauded of any portion of their political rights. He went even further than this, and held that the Jews themselves ought to forbear from seeking to modernize their tenets and their ritual. In his heart of hearts he was convinced that a Jew who abides by the law, and believes in the teachings of his religion, stands a much better chance of becoming a Christian than one who casts the faith of his father to the winds, and has nothing in common with Judaism but the name. Upon this ground he will, when called upon to take sides, rather favor the Orthodox than the Reform party of Jews.

As an instance, the Ungarische Israelit, refers to the attitude Count Beust took up, when, during his premiership in Saxony, the question of the introduction of a reform of the Jewish ritual arose. The chief rabbi of Dresden, Dr. Landau, was in favor of the proposed changes, and naturally thought that the prime minister would lend them his moral countenance. But he was greatly disappointed. Count Beust replied to the subjoined terms to the application addressed to him by Dr. Landau:

"You are, no doubt, much better acquainted than I could possibly be with the religious maxims and tenets of Judaism. But it seems to me as if you could not be quite correct in the view you take of the history of the Jewish people. It grieves me to be compelled to differ from you, but my own idea is that in the entire history of the nations of the world, the Jewish nation form the greatest phenomenon. Just think of the Jews who have lived scattered about in the world for thousands of years. Think of the Jews, whose existence as a political fabric was repeatedly shattered and destroyed, and who were, by their enemies dragged away from their homes, and whose very families were forcibly rent asunder. Think of the Jews, who for ages and ages were helpless and defenceless in the hands of a world of foes that had sworn that they should perish, so that the very name of a Jew should for ever be obliterated from the book of history. Does it not appear to you as an insoluble Divine enigma, that these Jews, despite the perennial and unceasing persecutions raged against them, should yet have been able to stand against all that violence?

"Does it not seem to you like a celestial problem that these unfortunate people should have clung all the more tenaciously to their religion, the more harrowing the distress was which they had to suffer on account of that religion? And what power do you think it was that sustained the Jewish people during that long succession of suffering and affliction? If I were called upon to read this riddle, I should say that the solution was contained in the phrase, the Jewish faith. This faith was undoubtedly the power that saved the oppressed Jewish nation from entire extinction. Its enemies could turn the individual members of the Jewish race adrift, and could inflict any amount of material injury on them, but no earthly power was able to rend the spiritual tie, that is to say their religion, which drew and kept them together when they were scattered about all over the world. This is an historical truth that every one ought to bear in mind, most of all the Jews themselves. They ought surely not to seek to sever that spiritual tie, which has preserved its virtue for thousands of years. These are the grounds upon which I should be sorry to see any innovations introduced which in their turn would be sure to give way to more radical changes."

The paper from which we have been quoting, adds that so long as Count Beust remained at Dresden, no reforms of the kind contemplated were introduced in their ritual, but no sooner had he left that city, than the Jewish congregation of Dresden was split up in several factions, the bulk being in favor of leaving well alone, while others wanted a moderate reform, and a third party claimed the radical changes which Count Beust had so forcibly animadverted on some years before. The same paper also says that while at Vienna Count Beust made use of all his influence in favor of the Orthodox section of the Jewish congregation of the Austrian capital.

The Diffusion of Blessings.

The globe of the earth is surrounded with a mass of atmosphere extending forty or fifty miles above the surface. Each particle of air is a luminous centre, receiving its light from the sun, and it radiates light in every direction. Were it not for this, the sun's light could only penetrate those spaces which are accessible to his rays. Thus, the sun shining upon the window of an apartment would illuminate just so much of that apartment as would be exposed to his direct rays, the remainder being in darkness. But we find, on the contrary, that although that part of the room upon which the sun directly shines is more brilliantly illuminated than the surrounding parts, these latter are nevertheless strongly illuminated. In the social world, too, there are luminous centres. These are noble souls, who, being especially blessed themselves, diffuse in every direction some of the blessings which they have received. Were it not for them, and their power of spreading brightness, goodness, and joy, the world would be indeed rayless and cold.—Dr. Lardner.

EXPLANATION OF LABEL MARKS.

Some having complained that they do not know what the marks on labels mean, we will just say, "Jay" means January, and when it is followed by a figure "6" and reads "Jay6" it means your subscription expired the first day of January, 1886, "Feb" February, "Mar" March, "Apr" April, and "May" are well understood, but "Jun" meaning June seems to confuse some, and to be taken to mean January, "Jun" stands "Jul" is July, "Aug" August, "Sep" September, "Oct" October, "Nov" November, and "Dec" December. The figure following the month stands for the year, "1" means 1881, "2" means 1882, etc. A postal card of inquiry will bring you any information you wish.

DIVINE LOVE.

Could we forbear dispute, and practise love,
We should agree, as angels do above.
Where love presides, vice there alone doth find
No entrance there, but virtues stay behind:
Both faith and hope, and all the meaner train
Of moral virtues, at the door remain.
Love only enters as a native there;
For, born in heaven, it does but sojourn here.

He that alone would wise and mighty be,
Commands that others love as well as he.
Love so he loved! How can we ever so high?
He can add wings when he commands to fly.
Nor should we be by this command dismayed:
He that examples gives will give his aid;
For he took flesh, that, when his precepts fail,
His practice, as a pattern, may prevail.

His love, at once, and dread instruct our thought.
As man he suffered, and as God he taught.
Will for the deed he takes; we may with ease
Obedient be, for if we love, we please.
Weak though we are, to love is no hard task,
And love for love is all that heaven does ask.
Love that all men would just and temperate make,
Mind to themselves and others feasible sake.

'Tis with our minds as with a fertile ground,
Wanting this love, they must with weeds abound;
(Unruly passions), whose effects are worse
Than thorns and thistles springing from the curse. —Edmund Waller.

Paternity, Genealogy, Nature and Character of Jesus, in the Light of the Covenants; being two Lectures, with some Additions, Delivered at Wyoming, Delaware, by Dr. L. C. Thomas.—No. 6.

"What think ye of Christ? Whose Son is he?" Matt. xxii. 42.

Now let us hear the testimony of John the Baptist. He commenced by preaching, "and saying, repent ye for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." Or as rendered by the Diaglott, "Reform because the Royal Majesty of the heavens [Jesus] has approached." Or, in other words, the King of the promised Kingdom, is at hand—is come. Or, in other words again, "Of this man's [David's] seed hath God according to his promise raised unto Israel a Savior, JESUS;" Acts xiii. 23, just exactly as the Angel told Mary; Luke i. 31; ii. 11, 21; and Joseph, Matt. i. 21, 25.

"John bare witness of him [Jesus] saying, This was he of whom I spake; He that cometh after me is preferred before me: for he was before me;" although born six months after John. "No man hath seen God [the Father] at any time; the only begotten Son which is in the bosom [tender affections and purpose], of the Father, he hath declared him," or manifested him. He repeats "he was before me." What did he mean? How could that be true, if Jesus was a Son of Joseph—a mere man, and not as old as John? The truth is, John knew and understood that Jesus was the promised Messiah, the Son of God—the only begotten Son, as he said; that his origin was in heaven, that he was the Word that was with God and was God, as said by John the Evangelist. For John had been "sent from God," verse 6: "the word of God came unto John," and he was "filled with the Holy Spirit even from his mother's womb;" Luke i. 15, and iii. 2; hence he had been informed about the matter, that the promised King had come; that "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world" had come. He therefore said Behold the Lamb of God. It had doubtless been revealed to him, that Jesus was first to die for the sins of his people—for the world—before he was to reign. His attention had probably been directed by the Spirit which was in him, to Isa. liii. which informed him that Jesus was to be "an offering for sin, brought as a Lamb to the slaughter." And probably Jesus himself, also told John, when he went to him to be baptized to fulfill all righteousness. Matt. iii. 13–15. But still, John did not have the Father's own positive testimony, until he saw the Spirit descending upon him at his baptism, as the Father had told him, and had heard the voice from heaven saying, "This is my beloved Son." For he says, "And I knew him not: [that is before it was revealed to him, and before Jesus had told him he was the one] but that he should be made manifest to Israel, therefore am I come baptizing with water; * * he that sent me to baptize with water, the same said unto me, upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending and remaining on him, the same is he which baptizeth with the Holy Spirit. And I saw and bare record that this is the Son of God"—the only begotten Son. John i. 16, 31–34. John said to the Jews, "there standeth one among you whom ye know not." (So said Jesus himself; "Ye neither know me nor my Father;" and because of their ignorance they crucified him. Acts iii. 17. Was it true that they did not know his father, if Joseph was his father?) Again; John said, "He it is who coming after me is preferred before me, whose shoe's latchet I am not worthy to unloose." verses 26, 27.

I will here give a quotation from that great and worthy Biblical Scholar, Dr. John Thomas deceased; on the last passage cited. The quotation reads as follows:

"John the Immerser, then, was not sent to introduce One who had no existence until six months after his own birth of Elizabeth; but to herald to the house of Jacob, "the Lord of Hosts, the King of Israel, without whom there is no Savior," (Isa. xliv. 6) and who, as the Great Light, was about to tabernacle among them in the sense of his name IMMANUEL, (immanu-ail, DEITY with us).

In what sense, then, was Jesus before John? Certainly not in the sense of being born of Mary before John was born of Elizabeth, because John was born six months before Jesus. John being older than Jesus, he was in that sense before Jesus. But John says, Jesus was before me. Hence he existed before John though born after him: * * who "had glory with the Father before the world was;" who was before all things, and by whom all things consist; in whom dwelleth the fulness of the Godhead bodily."

Like the Melchisedec type, he had "neither beginning of days nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God." This Son of God was a mere man was he? If so, then our Savior's words could not be true; for he said, "Among them that are born of women [that is, by natural begettal and conception] there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist. He was more than a prophet." Matt. xi. 9–11. And yet Jesus himself was born of a woman, and a prophet. Acts iii. 22; but by supernatural begettal and conception. That makes the difference. That is the reason he was the Father's only begotten Son. That is the reason why "never man spake like him." That is the reason he was infinitely superior to John the Baptist. That is the reason why so great a man as John was not worthy to unloose his shoe latchet. That is the reason his death and blood as the Lamb of God, could be adequate as an atonement. That is the reason he had the power to redeem and save his brother, man. That is the reason his name was called JESUS—Savior,—thus showing his origin, power and mission, to save his people from their sins. It was because he "was begotten not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." By the Holy Spirit, the power of the Highest. He was therefore a Son of Power: not only begotten by Spirit Power, but also "anointed with the Holy Spirit and Power;" Acts x. 38; and subsequently at his resurrection, he became and was declared the Son of God with Power; that is, with still more or greater Power, with a powerful nature or body; being then given all power, as he himself said. He is therefore now as Paul says, "the Head of all principality and Power * * upholding all things by the WORD of his Power." This of course does not detract from or lessen the Power of the Father, who is revealed in the Word as the One Being with underived, self-existent, eternal, infinite Power; while to Jesus, all power was given. To concentrate the rays of the sun and thereby light a lamp, does not in the least diminish the heat or light of the sun. In the infinite wisdom and purpose of the Father, it was necessary that the "Just One" by whose death and precious blood, fallen man could be redeemed from the grave, and who could be a Mediator between God and man, should be just such a Being —a God-man—Son of God and Son of Man. One "made like unto his brethren," [as to the flesh, or body] that he might be a merciful and faithful High Priest, who could be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but who at the same time was a GOD in mind or mental organism; in character, name and power; so as to be able to save man from those infirmities, and give him a Divine Nature. A Being having the mental power of a God, and at the same time the physical weakness of a man. One who could be tempted in all points like us, yet without sin; and able to succor them that are tempted —tried—Diaglott. God's representative and man's representative; mediating between God and man, all the equal friend of each. Nothing less than such a Being could possibly fill the purpose of the Father. Nothing less than such a Being could lay down his life, and take it again, or could effectually die on the behalf of man, and as the same time as representative of God. Nothing less than such a Being, could say I proceeded forth and came from God; I came out from Thee; I came down from heaven; I and my Father are one; my Father dwelleth in me; and yet my Father is greater than I; I came forth from the Father; I am not of this world; I came out from God; I am the Son of God; I am the Son of man. It is worse than folly for any person to suppose for one moment, that these words of Jesus himself could possibly apply to a mere man. Never once did he say, hint or admit that he was the Son of Joseph!

John said of him, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. * * And the Word was made flesh, [or became flesh—R. V.] and dwelt among us."

The Roman centurion said, Truly this was the Son of God! The man with the unclean spirit said: What have I do with thee Jesus, thou Son of the Most High God? When those in the ship saw him walk on the water, that was sufficient evidence to them, that he was in paternity, character and power, a God: and they worshiped him, for that reason; saying of a truth thou art the Son of God. Paul said, "God's Son made of a woman"—of the seed and flesh of Mary, Gal. iv. 4. Truly he was and is a wonderful Being—now the express image of his Father's person, or substance, R. V.,—"a better and an enduring substance reserved in heaven for us also." Heb. x. 34—"the image of the invisible God."

Report of Work.

I am again at home after being absent fifty-five days. Notwithstanding the muddy roads, bad weather and the measles three new places were opened and I did the best I could in the time allotted. The first was an opening for the presentation of the prophecies at Pharisburg (Village), Ohio. Gave them five discourses and quite an interest was manifested to hear more. I had arranged to leave for Bladensburg, Knox Co., O., at the request of a Brother D. C. Robison, who was very anxious to have our views presented to the people in that neighborhood where he was teaching. Preached nine discourses to large and attentive congregations (although at times the weather was very unfavorable), some coming three miles on foot to hear us. The last night had a crowded house, some coming six miles. Brother R. was the only person of like faith in that region, and had not seen one of like faith to talk with in seven years.

At the commencement of the last meeting at Mount Zion Church a request was presented for me to go to Bladensburg and preach in the Disciple Church. Yet there were those that stated they had just become interested in my preaching and were sorry to have me leave. But Brother R. said that I had done all that he desired for the present. A witness had been given, and as he was alone he wanted the truth presented in B., especially as they had requested it. I never felt more freedom than I did there. Was invited to the homes of the leading members of the church, and was specially requested to preach on the kingdom as I understood it, as also the subject of justification. Preached five discourses and received a strong request from the leading ones of the church that if I came near there to come and see them and preach for them, etc.

Brother R. was sick on Sunday evening and unable to attend, but the Disciples took up a collection of their own accord and handed me five dollars, which was gratefully received. Quite a number said come again. Well, if it is the Lord's will the way will be opened. I feel that I am only a servant and am willing to go and proclaim the glorious truth of the coming King to reign in righteousness and perform the mercies that he has promised under his benign reign, and my anxious heart says Amen. I am satisfied that the last message of the coming kingdom is but very little understood, and some are ready to fight it although professing to understand all mysteries and can almost tell the very day of our Lord's return, but ignore "the work that is before him" and what "it means." Oh to be ready to bear some humble position under his rulership, and not bury the one talent given and lose all. If any wish my labors they will please write to me now at my home, Lincolnville, Crawford Co., Pa. Yours in hope,

JOHN T. ONGLEY.

Dear Restitution:

Enclosed please find $2.00, which please credit on my account. THE RESTITUTION has been a welcome visitor to my house for several years. In these closing years of Gentile times it is needful that we watch. I have been isolated from the brethren of the One Faith for seven years, and have not had the pleasure of hearing a Bible preacher in that time until recently. Bro. John T. Ongley of Lincolnville, Pa., came here the last Sunday in February, and delivered fourteen discourses. Nine in the Mt. Zion (free for all) Church, and five in the Disciple Church in Bladensburg, O. His meetings were all well attended, some walking four and five miles. All agree that Bro. Ongley preaches the word. Bro. Ongley's meetings in Bladensburg were very interesting. He spoke on the Hope, waiting for his Son from heaven, the tree of life, the kingdom and justification. These subjects were ably presented and we pray that good may be the result. Bro. Ongley is an old man and a very able earnest proclaimer of the word of truth. His favorite theme is the "Age to Come." It has been my pleasure to hear a number of our brethren of the West but none are more able and few as earnest as Bro. Ongley. Let us so live that when the Restorer shall come, we may be found among his jewels. Yours in hope of Eternal Life.

D. C. ROBISON.

Saved by Blood.

In the heart of Africa, it is related by an Englishmen, that a slave procession passed by and the king called out a poor slave who displeased him in some little way, ordered his men to put their arrows to their bowstrings and avenge the offense with his blood. He went up to the native chief and begged for the poor slave's life, offered him a great deal of money and costly bribes, but the chief turned to him and said: "I don't want ivory, or slaves, or gold; I am go against yonder tribe and capture their stores and villages; I want no favors from the white man; all I want is blood." Then he ordered one of his men to pull his bowstring and discharge an arrow at the heart of the poor slave. The young man, with the instinct of a moment, threw himself in front and held up his arm, and the next moment the arrow was quivering in the flesh of his own arm. The black man was astonished. Then he pulled the arrow from his arm, and the blood flowed, and he said to the chief: "Here is blood; here is my blood; I give it for this poor slave, and I claim his life." The native chief had never seen such a spectacle before, and he was completely overcome by it. He gave the slave to the white man. He said: "Yes, white man has bought him with his blood, and he shall be yours." In a moment the poor slave threw himself at the feet of his deliverer, tears flowing down his face, and said: "O, white man, you have bought Lobe with your blood; Lobe," (for that was his name) "shall he be your slave forever and ever," and ever after he could not make him take his liberty; whatever he went, poor Lobe was beside him; no drudgery was too hard, no task too hopeless. He was bound by the mercy of his deliverer as his consecrated servant. O, friends, if a poor savage heart can thus be bound by the wound of a stranger's arm what should you and I say for those deeper wounds in those two living hands and feet, and the heart that was opened by the spear? If we believe that we are redeemed how can we be but consecrated to him.

NOW is the time to renew.

"The Gospel of Our Salvation and Rejected doctrines—we live only through Christ—Resurrection of the dead—Second coming of Christ—The Kingdom of God, etc., will be faithfully preached every Sunday morning at 10:30 a. m., to which services we heartily invite the seeker after divine truth! This service will close at 11:30, after which the church will meet for conference, "breaking of bread and prayer." 316 Grand st., on first door, Brooklyn, N. Y.

The church of God at Cleveland, O., will hold meetings at 10:30 a. m. every Sunday (D. F. in Bland and Heller's Block, Room 36, 374½ Ontario Street, Corner of Bolivar, north of Central Market. Seats free. Brethren from abroad of like faith and all preachers after truth are welcome.

Gospel Without Cost.

A venerable Kentuckian told The Interior the following story: "A wealthy planter, a man of education, an eloquent speaker, a successful politician, was converted. He wanted to do good. His neighbors were irreligious, and he felt that his first duty was to them. He built a commodious church, put an organ in it, and hired an organist. He obtained a license to preach, and prepared some excellent sermons. When the house was ready, he sent his servants all over the neighborhood and invited everybody to come to church at 11 o'clock next Sunday. The people came and listened. At the close of the service the preacher thanked them for coming, and invited them to come again next Sunday. On Saturday he sent his servants out to remind them of the Sabbath service. He did this year after year, paying all expenses himself not taking collections from anybody or anything, for he wanted to convince the people that the gospel was free—'without money and without price.'"

"And what was the result?" we asked.

"Oh, he preached for twenty years and there wasn't a single conversion in all that time!"

People are not likely to prize very highly that which costs them nothing. If you want to get a man into the church, begin by getting him to do something for it. If you want to develop the piety of a church, train its members to work and to give.

THE COMING AGE,

—IN—

Nature and Proximity.

—BY J. P. WARNER.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar terms, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

"THE COMING AGE" is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the COMING AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand is the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensational yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $1.50. Send to this office for this work.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXVI. Read PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, APRIL 13, 1887. NO. 14.

THE RESTITUTION,

Terms--TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

Payable in advance. Three and Six Months thereafter.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final Restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also, heavy belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as are requisite in the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as a result of a real salvation.

THE MILLENNIAL AGE.

There is one thing much overlooked even by prophetic students, which is the cause of much obscurity, and also misunderstanding of some portions of Scripture. In the Millennial age there will be at least two great companies of the saved, who while they stand closely related to each other, will be in some respects entirely distinct. There will be the glorified Church, the elect race, the royal priesthood, the Lamb's wife, who will be co-heirs, co-rulers with Christ. These will be composed of the translated and resurrected saints, and they will dwell in "the holy city Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God, having the glory of God." Then there will be the restored nation of Israel, dwelling in Palestine, the land of their fathers, and promised to them by solemn covenant, all righteous and holy under the restored theocracy, with prosperity and blessedness abounding all around. Israel restored will be in possession of innumerable blessings, —blessings fortified by transgression, but restored by the Lord's coming and the establishment of a righteous rule; but "the church of the first-born," immortalized and glorified, will occupy a higher position, and more distinguished honor will be conferred upon them. The point we now wish to make is this: the prophets foreseeing the relation of these two companies in the kingdom, and the unspeakable blessedness of both companies, predict various things of them, but do not tell us, in so many words, which belong to the joint-heirs with Christ, the people he has purified unto himself for his own possession, and which belong to the restored and saved and highly favored Jewish nation. Some things that apply to the former do not apply to the latter; and some things that apply to the latter do not apply to the former. If, therefore, we apply the predictions to either company without discrimination, great error and confusion will be the result. And some who oppose the doctrine of the Millennial kingdom, and who are careless about distinguishing between these things, have grossly misrepresented our views. For instance, we teach that in the age to come the inhabitants will wonderfully increase in number. Hence we are charged with teaching that there will be sensual pleasure in the kingdom. Now if they would do simple justice to the subject, they would discover that this increase will be on the part of men in the flesh, dwelling in the land in families, and that Scripture supports us in this teaching. But these predictions do not apply to "the Church of the first-born," to the rulers of the kingdom, for the resurrected neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God. Other instances could be readily given, and persons desiring to know the truth comprehending the distinction we have made, will have no difficulty in making a right application of the prophecies.

It seems impossible even to conceive of any earthly blessing that is not promised in the Millennial age. Every blessing that Adam and Eve enjoyed before the fall will be enjoyed then: and there will be one blessing in the Millennial age that our first parents did not have, that is, freedom from the power of Satan's temptations. Satan was not bound when they were in Eden, or he could not have tempted them through the serpent; but in the Millennium he will be bound.

No wonder that in that age there will be heard in a peculiar manner the voice of praise and thanksgiving. "Break forth into joy, sing together, ye waste places of Jerusalem: for the LORD hath comforted his people, he hath redeemed Jerusalem." Isa. lii. 9. "Joy and gladness shall be found therein, thanksgiving, and the voice of melody." Isa. li. 3. "And out of them shall proceed thanksgiving and the voice of them that make merry." "Thus saith the LORD: yet again there shall be heard in this place, whereof ye say, It is waste, without man and without beast, even in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem, that are desolate, without man and without beast, the voice of joy and the voice of gladness, the voice of the bridegroom and the voice of them that say, give thanks to the LORD of hosts, for the LORD is good, for his mercy endureth for ever." Jer. xxx. 19; xxxiii. 10, 11.

It would be well if the fervent desire of the sainted Fletcher were oftener in our minds and upon our lips: "O, that the thought, the hope of Millennial blessedness, may animate me to perfect holiness in the fear of God, that I may be accounted worthy to escape the terrible judgments which will make way for that happy state of things; and that I may have part in the first resurrection, if I am numbered among the dead before that happy period begins."

Many of the Methodists, in opposing Pre-millennial doctrine, are ignorant of the fact that in opposing it, they are opposing John Wesley whom they profess to follow. But on this subject as well as on some others, Wesley's views are kept on the back ground. They are kept on the back ground by the very men who extol his name, and represent his Notes on the New Testament and his Sermons as the proper test of Methodist theology. Wesley was not only a Pre-millenarian, but his views were very clearly expressed. Dr. William Nast, the Commentator, now a very aged Methodist minister, in making a reference to some men of learning in other Churches who advocate this doctrine, says, "I admit that the Methodist Church is not so largely represented, and that at present Pre-millennial views are unpopular among us, but it was not always so. Both John and Charles Wesley, Dr. Coke, as well as Fletcher and Whitefield, occupied Pre-millennial ground." And in the greatest, the fullest, and the most reliable Life of Wesley ever written, this matter is settled beyond dispute. Tyerman gives evidence of this which is most complete. A writer of the name of Hartley, published a work advocating the "Pre-millennial Advent, and the Millennial Reign of Jesus," and Wesley, after reading the work, addressed to Hartley the following letter:—

"Your book on the Millennium was lately put into my hands. I cannot but thank you for your strong and reasonable confirmation of that comfortable doctrine, of which I cannot entertain the least doubt, so long as I believe the Bible." After introducing this letter, which was published in the Methodist Magazine, Tyerman makes the following most important remarks: "With such a statement, in reference to such a book, there can be no doubt that Wesley, like his father before him, was a Millenarian, a believer in the Second Advent of Christ to reign on earth, visibly and gloriously, for a thousand years. This is a matter which none of Wesley's biographers have noticed; and yet the above is not the only evidence in support of it." So firmly did Wesley believe this doctrine to be in perfect harmony with Scripture, that, referring to the early Christian Fathers who accepted it, he said, "To say that they believed this, was neither more nor less than to say they believed the Bible." Still further evidence of this could be furnished, but the above is amply sufficient to establish the truth of our statement, that Wesley believed the Second Advent of Christ would precede the Millennium. Now the somewhat view—the views so prominent in Methodist teaching today—holds out a time of wonderful glory and blessedness for the Church before Christ comes; the Scriptures hold out no hope of a Millennium of blessedness until he does come.

SILAS HENN.

Paternity, Genealogy, Nature and Character of Jesus, in the Light of the Covenants; being two Lectures, with some Additions, Delivered at Wyoming, Del., by Dr. I. C. Thomas.--No. 1.

"What think ye of Christ? Whose Son is he?" Matt. xxii. 42.

Isaiah certainly told the truth and declared the purpose of God, when he said Jesus should be called Wonderful: for "never man spake like this man." More than seven centuries before Jesus was born, the Father said by the mouth of Isaiah prophetically, "unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called WONDERFUL, Counsellor, Mighty God, Everlasting Father, Prince of Peace." Isa ix. 6. Yes, the Savior of the world was and is a Wonderful Being from his birth. Son of man, yet Son of God. Born of Mary, yet he proceeded forth and came from God. He was in the Father, and yet the Father was in him. He was a man in body or nature, yet in mind and character a God. He was in all things made like unto his brethren, yet in all things he had the pre-eminence. He was the fruit of David's body, and yet he came down from above. He was the Son of David according to the flesh, and yet he was not born after the flesh, but after the Spirit. He was of the seed of David as to the flesh, and yet not begotten by David nor any other man, but of God. He was a Being in human nature, yet his father was not a human being, but as he said, John v. 18, "God was his Father." He was born of a woman, yet begotten by the Power of God. He and his Father are two persons—Father and Son—yet he said I and my Father are one. He was made in the likeness of sinful flesh, and yet was without sin. He was born to die for the world, yet was born to be King of the whole earth, over all nations. He was to be equal to the Father in one sense, and yet he said my Father is greater than I. He was to be despised and rejected of men, and yet exalted to the throne of God. He was to die on the behalf of man, and yet as the representative of God. His name was to be a reproach among men, and yet the only name given among men whereby they can be saved. He was before Abraham, and yet Abraham's seed or son. He was to be the root of David, and yet his offspring. He was to be David's son, and yet his Lord. He was to have neither beginning of days nor ending of life. He says of himself, I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last: he that liveth and was dead; and behold I am alive forevermore. To our finite minds all this seems paradoxical: nevertheless it is not only true, but the greatest and most important truth ever made known to man. How is it possible for such a wonderful Being as he was, to be produced, except in the very way made known by the Father's Angel to Joseph and Mary, as recorded in the first two chapters of Matthew and Luke, corroborated by the concurrent testimony of all the Scriptures I have quoted: thus proving the genuineness and God-inspired character of those chapters—that they contain the Father's own record of the begettal and conception of his Son: that they give the explanation and correct and only answer to the questions, How shall this be? How?—the word became flesh—the Father's only begotten Son full of grace and truth; how it was that Jesus was David's Son and David's Lord; how it was that he could be Son of man and Son of God at the same time—man in body, God in mind—man as to the flesh, God as to the spirit, or moral and mental organism—and thus be capable of being a Mediator between God and men.

Here let me ask, If Jesus had been the son of Joseph—a mere man—how could his death have been of any avail in the redemption of the fallen race? How could he have redeemed his brother man? It is written, in speaking of mere man, "none can by any means redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him." No matter how much riches, he could not have thus paid the necessary price. For Paul says, "Ye are bought with a price;" and Peter says, "We know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold * * but with the precious blood [the life] of Christ, as of a Lamb without blemish and without spot." How then could a mere man have given to God ransom? The redemption price required, was not silver and gold, but the precious blood and life of a Being without blemish, without spot, without guile, without sin. Did not all the types show this? Did they all point down to a mere man—a son of Joseph? To my mind, the idea, the more thought or suggestion, seems almost blasphemous. Could a mere man, even redeem himself alone, not to say his brother man—the Race? Could a man redeem himself from the grave: could he bring himself to life after he is dead—lay down his life, and take it again—he might then talk about redeeming his brother. Could a man live all his life, from his birth, without sin, blemish or spot, as did Jesus, then he might talk about his life and blood being "precious" to redeem his brother. Oh no: none other than just such a wonderful Being as the entire record of the Father shows Jesus to have been, in his origin, paternity, conception, name, nature, power and character, could have coped with, and accomplished the great work of redemption and salvation of man. The record says of him, that he was "begotten by Holy Spirit;" "grew and waxed strong in spirit;" anointed with Holy Spirit. Holy Spirit given him without measure; John iii. 34; and finally born from the dead by Holy Spirit; thus becoming a "quickening or life-giving Spirit;" 1 Cor. xv. 45: justified in Spirit and received up into glory; 1 Tim. iii. 16; and afterwards John was told on the Isle of Patmos, to hear what the Spirit [Jesus] saith unto the churches. And in the days of the Prophets, we are told, that they testified by "the Spirit of Christ which was in them;" 1 Pet. i. 10, 11, and hence, that "the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man: but holy men of God, spake as they were moved by the Holy Spirit," R. V. Thus we see in the light of the Scriptures, how through the Power and direction of the Father, the inception, incarnation, and complete production, of Jesus his own Son, was accomplished by Holy Spirit; the Spirit from the time he was the Word with God, and the Spirit in the Prophets, until he became the perfected Spirit Being in Divine Nature—the Spirit-substance of his Father—"God who is a Spirit." His mortal, flesh substance being changed to incorruptible Spirit-substance. Human nature changed to "Divine Nature;" which his brethren are also ultimately to be made "partakers of;" 1 Pet. i. 4; Hence Paul says, WE "have in heaven a better and an enduring SUBSTANCE." Heb. x. 34. He says, it "is hid with Christ in God:" John says, "God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is IN his Son." Peter says this Spirit-substance, or Divine Nature, is an inheritance incorruptible reserved in heaven: and Paul says, when he who is our life shall appear then we shall appear with him: that is, he will then raise from the dead, them that are his, incorruptible, by changing their mortal flesh-substance, to immortal Spirit-substance, which is now in heaven "hid with him," and which he will then bestow upon the righteous, and they shall be caught up to meet him in the air: and so ever be with the Lord; 1 Thess. i. 17; but not with him until then. For nearly his last words are, Rev. xxii. 12, "behold I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be."

Our Savior having been thus perfected with the Father-Spirit-substance Nature, signified by the "glorious and fearful [reverent—Young] NAME;" Deut xxviii. 58; Psa. iii. 9; was able to say "I am alive forevermore." He was qualified to "continue forever," according to David's prayer, and as the Jews expected; 2 Sam. vii. 29; John xii. 34; as the King over the house and kingdom of David and of God, under the whole heaven; of which it is written "there shall be NO END." Luke i. 32, 33. Dan. vii. 14, 18, 27.

I will now call attention to a very important passage and rendering noted by Griesbach, and held by others to be the correct rendering; and which is not only in harmony with all the Scriptures I have quoted, but is of itself alone, if the rendering be correct, as positive proof in regard to the begettal of Jesus, as is found in the first chapters of Matthew and Luke. It is John i. 11-14. "He came to his own dominion, and yet his own people received him not; but to as many as received him, he granted the privilege to become the children of God; even to them believing into his name who was begotten not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of a man, but of God. And the Word, or Logos [thus] became flesh and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory, a glory as of an ONLY BEGOTTEN from the Father, full of power and truth." This is evidently the correct rendering of these verses, and proves positively that Jesus was not begotten by Joseph. If verse 13 had applied to those who believe in Jesus (mentioned in verse 12) instead of to Jesus himself; then it would have read "nor of the will of men," instead of "nor of the will of a man." I am aware that those who render this passage as above, are in the minority. But so it is with many other passages; the correct rendering being often with the minority. The truth is not decided by majorities of popular men. But the truth is that which is in harmony with the entire Scriptures.

Youth's Column.

Baby Thankful.

Roaming in the meadow,
Little four-year-old
Picks the starry daisies,
With their hearts of gold;

Fills her snowy apron,
Fills her dimpled hands;
Suddenly—how quiet
In the grass she stands!

"Who made flowers so pitty—
Part 'em here! Part dere!"
I, half heeding, answer
With a careless nod.

Drops she all her blossoms,
With uplifted head,
Reverent face, turned skyward,
"Thank you, God!" she said:

Then, as if explaining,
(Though no word I spoke)
"Always mus' say 'Thank you'
For the things I take."

O, my little preacher,
Glad in robes of praise!
Would we all might copy
Baby Thankful's ways!

Time to fret and murmur
We could never make,
Should we first say 'thank you'
For the things we take!"

MARION BABY HOOD.

Bertie, Tom and baby were playing together. Baby could not always understand when his turn came and when it didn't, or why it couldn't be his turn all the time. So he took tones when he ought not to and became cross if anyone tried to prevent him. Bert was not the most patient boy in the world, and, boy-like, he began to think baby a little tyrant, which he was without meaning to be, and to rebel against his frequent interference.

"Mamma," shouted he, come and make baby play fair." And then when mamma arrived on the scene, he added more thoughtfully, "I don't see why God couldn't have made a good baby instead of a cross one." Mamma looked amused rather than shocked; indeed it was Master Bert who looked quite shocked when she quietly replied, "Judging from your work since you began to make him, baby would not be much improved if you had made him just to your liking."

"Me make baby," and Bert looked very much mystified.

"Yes, you have been helping to make him ever since God gave him to us. God only made him a baby. It is you and Tom who, more than anyone else, make him either a good or a bad baby. Look at him now."

As directed, Bert, who was standing with his hands behind his back, wondering what his mother meant, cast his eyes upon his little brother, and saw him standing in exactly the same position, his hands behind him, trying to look as much like him as possible.

"Push your hat on one side of your head," said mamma. Bert did so, and immediately the baby did the same with his hat.

"Whistle a little," suggested mamma. In an instant as soon as he heard the sound, baby, too, was puckering his little lips, doing all he could toward producing a whistle. This irritated Bert, who turned and said, "Stop mocking me," and gave baby a push. The reply was a scream of remonstrance and an angry push from baby.

"See, you are making him still after your own pattern, he is just a small copy of yourself. Now try making him another way. Put your arms around his neck and kiss him."

Bert obeyed, though rather unwillingly, and baby's face at once cleared and Bert got a loving hug and kiss from him.

"I told you he wouldn't be cross if you were not," said Tom, who had been an interested listener.

"He will be just what you boys make him. He is only acting now by imitating you boys and others, and as he is mostly with you, you are really making him."

"Well Tom," said Bert, after a moment's thought, "let's not make any more cross into baby." And Tom agreed.—Morning Guide.

"Thy Wages."

The Bible is the most wonderful story book in the world. One of the most wonderful and instructive stories in the Bible is "Moses and the ark of bulrushes."

"Tell me a story," says the child to its mother, and the fairy tales, the romances of the East have not such charms for infant minds as the stories of the Bible, ever new and never old, suited to all ages and circumstances, making an impression in childhood that endures as long as memory lives in the mind and heart.

This idyl has employed the pen and the pencil to present it to the world: poetry, painting and sculpture have added beauty to the scene, and in history it is part of the most remarkable and important annals on the scroll of time. The mightiest work of the greatest sculptor the world ever saw is Moses, by Michael Angelo. And the original of that sublime statue, grown to a hero, prince, leader, prophet and liberator of his people, the friend and ambassador of the King of kings, was once a babe in an ark of bulrushes committed to the mercy of the waters and the crocodiles. From such obscure and simple beginnings the most stupendous results sometimes spring.

The Israelites in Egypt were suffering under terrible, tyrannical persecution, with the full purpose of the despot to prevent the increase of their numbers, and to weaken their power. Orders had been given that all the sons of Jewish mothers should be killed at their birth. The parents of Moses were themselves the son and daughter of ministers, Levites. When the boy was born the mother saw it was "a goodly child." Not very strange was that. What mother ever thought her newborn babe was not a goodly child? But this was a child of promise: an infant prophet on whose brow fell such light as never was on land or sea: the seal of heaven shone upon him as a star. The mother saw, and to her heart the sign was revealed. It was a god-child, given of God for some high purpose, which she did not know. 'Twas hers to do, and God would rule the end. She knew the king's command, but she felt that God would provide. She hid the boy in the securest place of her heart and house for three anxious months, praying, hoping, fearing, believing. Months of mingled joy and alarm: every new step was perhaps a minion of power hunting for babes to destroy them, as when Rachel wept for her dead. And when she could no longer keep the precious secret, she frames a little boat, a floating cradle, and into it with tears and prayers she commits the child of her affections, and puts it out upon the waters to live or die, survive or perish, as best it should please the Lord God of her pious fathers. If the strange light that shone from his eyes were the sign of God's joy in her child, the hand of infinite love would hold the ark in safety, and save the tiny passenger from harm. It is the Lord; let him do what seemeth to him good.

It was a thing of daily occurrence for the maidens of Egypt to bathe in the Nile. And when the daughter of Pharaoh saw the cradle and then the child, and the child wept and so touched her tender heart, it was the most natural of all circumstances, but the hand of God was in it. It was a kind, not a strange providence, that the sister of the child was a young Jewish maiden in the train of the king's daughter, and with quick wit she proposed to find a nurse for it. She was in the mother's secret. She knew the stratagem; probably she had led the mother to place the little ark where the princess was wont to bathe, or by some gentle art had led the princess to the place where the young child lay. And now she becomes the glad messenger to the sad mother, and flies on the wings of filial love to cry, "Mother, the baby's saved, you must come and be its mother-nurse; come quick." Between suspense and joy she has scarce power to move. She thought she trusted God, but now she can hardly believe her own ears that God has heard her prayers and saved her child. The princess must have seen at a glance in the look of that proud and happy mother that the nurse she wanted for her pretty foundling had appeared. She welcomes her at once, accepts the proffered service and says, in short but sufficient words: Take this child away and nurse it for me and I will give thee thy wages.

We have now done with this wondrously beautiful story, romantic, unique, illustrious in the tales of the Orient, a bright page in the book of God's providence, to be rehearsed (as it has been through successive thousands of years) till there are no more nurseries with pious, Bible-loving mothers. On the river of life, in an ark more frail than one of reeds and rushes, begirt by dangers more dire than floods or crocodiles, exposed to perils that Moses in his floating cradle never knew, is every infant launched to live or die, survive or perish: and to the parents of each child, with a deep significance, pathos, eloquence and power, God says, "Take this child." It is the gift of God. It is not the gift of any other friend: not the child of adoption: it is yours from God in whom we live and move, and have our being: we are his creatures: the soul that is in the child is the breath of the Almighty, and the body is the work of his hands. Every child born into the world is the creation of God, each soul as new and fresh, and directly from God as when he bent over the clay of Adam, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life.

He gives no other treasure so precious. Beware, lest money, for how much would you sell your child? In the charge to take it, there is a full conveyance, with all the responsibility of ownership, for which the giver will look to you with confidence that his trust will not be lightly regarded.

Having taken it, he says, nurse it for me, you are not to bring it up for yourselves, nor for the world, but for God. The mistake and the sin of many parents is found in their selfish lavishing of their affections on their children, as though their children were merely idols for them to worship, or objects out of which they themselves were to get enjoyment. This often ruins the child. The fondness of a parent's love may blind the eyes to serious faults which others see and feel, and yet would never dare to mention for fear of giving offence or pain. We may not live for ourselves. We may not nurse children for ourselves. We are the Lord's, and our children are his, in a far higher sense than they are ours. We are to have them with us but a few brief years at most. The eternal years of God are theirs,* and they are to be nurtured not for us, not for time, but for God and eternity.—N. Y. Observer.

EXPLANATION OF LABEL MARKS.

Some having complained that they do not know what the marks on labels mean, we will just say, "Jny" means January, and when it is followed by a figure "6" and reads "Jny6" it means your subscription expired the first day of January, 1886. "Feb" February, "Mar" March, "Apr" April, and "May" are well understood, but "Jun" meaning June seems to confuse some, and to be taken to mean January. "Jun" means June. "Jul" is July, "Aug" August, "Sep" September, "Oct" October, "Nov" November, and "Dec" December. The figure following the month stands for the year, "1" means 1881, "2" means 1882, etc. A postal card of inquiry will bring you any information you wish.

A BEAUTIFUL METAPHOR.

"Take of the best of the land in your vessels, and carry down the man a present, a little balm, and a little honey, spices and myrrh, nuts and almonds." Gen. xliii. 11.

Such, in part, was Jacob's direction to his sons when he had consented to let them take Benjamin down into Egypt with them. In bringing the harvest home the people of early times were wont to celebrate the joyous ingathering with songs of praise. Hence the prophet speaks of the "joy in harvest." In the beautiful simplicity of ancient times the Idyl, or pastoral song, celebrating the scenes of country life, was the kind of tuneful verse chanted by the "sons of song, and the daughters of music." The feathery palm, the rose of Sharon, the lily of the valley, the welling spring, the dew born from the morning, the snow on Lebanon, the wavy harvests, the mantling vine, and a multitude of other natural objects, were put into measured lines and chanted in musical numbers. As objects of special value in those early ages would be the very products enumerated by Jacob, and hence these would enter into the "Song of the land."

Although these gifts were precious, still there was another deeper consideration than money value in proffering presents to royalty. This may perhaps be better understood by those who know what is meant in our day by "the language of flowers." There is an unspoken poetry in the color and fragrance of the floral gift; so gifts pleasing to the senses, especially the incense-breathing gifts, symbolize, in addition to a value they had, a heart-expression of proffered esteem, devotion and honor from the giver who sent them. The precious gifts—the song of the land—were praises embodied in incense as a tribute of profoundest respect and veneration. The heart's best affections were measured by nature's choicest products. Hence the offering of sweet incense to God enthroned in the Most Holy Place. And hence the incense of adoration offered from the golden censer by the angel with the "prayers of the saints." It was Oriental usage never to approach a Great Ruler without a present. Costly presents were acceptable gifts but,— "Dearer by far is the heart's adoration," and so the most acceptable were those that were at the same time costly, and interlaced with heart-sentiment.

ALLEGIANCE EXPRESSED IN SYMBOL.

Thou shalt be over mine house, and according to thy word shall my people shall kiss. Gen. xli. 40.

This is, as critics show, a literal translation of Pharaoh's language to Joseph when he invested him with authority over Egypt. To kiss a person was a mark of homage. When Samuel anointed David king over Israel, he kissed him, as one of the ceremonies of inauguration, as well as an acknowledgement of his own allegiance to God's chosen monarch. 1 Sam. x. 1. In 1 Kings xix. 18, speaking of the worshipers of Baal, the Lord says, "I have left me seven thousand in Israel, all the knees of which have not bowed unto Baal, and every mouth which hath not kissed him." In idolatrous worship to kiss the hand was an expression of adoration. The Roman practice seems to have been to touch the idol god with the right hand, and then apply the hand to the mouth and kiss it. From this practice we have the etymological derivation of the word adoration, from ad, to, and os, genitive oris, the mouth, meaning to the mouth—putting the hand to the mouth as an act of reverence. Job xxi. 26, 27, alludes to this act of adoration: "If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness; and my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand." The Patriarch is here alluding to the worship of the heavenly luminaries, so common in ancient times, and he claims that he had not joined in that system of worship by kissing his hand as a token of adoration. Hosea xiii. 2, shows that Israel had so fallen as to worship the sun. What Pharaoh means is, that he would so invest Joseph with authority, that all his subjects should kiss their hand to him, when he gave command, as submissively as they would to Pharaoh himself. As the king made Joseph second to himself, he made him superior to every other person in Egypt, however noble by birth, or high in office such person might have been.

A short paraphrase will convey the full meaning—"At the command from thy mouth all my people shall kiss their hand as a sign of submission." To kiss the hand, then place it on the forehead, and then respectfully extend it toward a king or his chief officer, was the profound act of allegiance to the supreme authority. To kiss the hand of the Prince or Monarch himself, was a higher privilege, not accorded to all. In Hosea xiii. 2, "to kiss the calves," means this act of adoration to the golden calves set up by Jeroboam. See 1 Kings xii. 26–33.

To kiss the Son, Psa. ii. 12, will be a submissive act of both adoration and submission to his authority as "King of kings and lord of lords." To kiss the right hand, then place it on the forehead, as the seat of intellectual and spiritual faculties, and then, in solemn act, extend it toward the enthroned Son of God, will be required of earth's rulers as representatives of all their subjects.

PAUL'S MINISTRY.

Having conclusively shown in our two preceding articles that the apostle definitely teaches us, in 1 Cor. iii. 6–17, that the old covenant, "written in letters, and graven on stones," "is done away in Christ," or, as he instructs us in Heb. x. 8–13, and xi. 1–5, that the very same covenant on the "tables of the covenant," in the "ark of the covenant," had waxed old and was vanishing away before the superseding new covenant, and consequently, that the Sabbath, the sign of this covenant between God and the children of Israel, —Ex. xxxi. 13–18—written on tables of stone, is done away and vanishes with the covenant itself. As this old covenant was only between God and the children of Israel, we will now follow the apostle in his teachings to the churches which were called out from the Gentiles. Speaking of the new covenant the Revision says that it "has been enacted upon better promises" than the old, where the Greek word nenomothetai is imposed by law, and so is rightly rendered enacted. What Paul teaches, as a minister of this new covenant by the appointment of God himself, is law to all who are embraced in this new covenant by belief of, and obedience to, the Gospel of God. If the seventh day has been placed by enactment, among the institutions of the Gospel, as a Sabbath to be observed by Christians, as it was enacted to be observed by the Israelites, most surely this faithful minister of God's word, who could say, "I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God," will enjoin it in all his epistles in a most positive manner, and classify Sabbath breaking among the sins that exclude from the kingdom of God. Let us then, in the next place see whether this "sign of the old covenant" has been re-enacted as binding upon those who are "not under the law but under grace." Rom. vi. 11. Now, as Paul has written fourteen epistles divided into one hundred chapters, should we not expect to find the Sabbath positively enjoined some ten or more times, if it be an institution of such importance, as thousands in our day claim it to be in order to be saved when Christ comes? We took up a Sabbath Paper at random just now to see how many times the word "Sabbath" occurs, and found thirty-eight occurrences of this word Sabbath, and there were two other places where the word occurred, as quoted in reference to the first day of the week. In a single short article of this paper containing 887 words there were eleven occurrences of this word "Sabbath." This latter did not contain near as many words as Paul's letter to Philemon which embraces about 450, inclusive of the heading, which is as we counted that letter. If neglecting to keep the Sabbath is a crime against law, making one as guilty in the sight of God as crimes against moral law, and if keeping the First-day in honor of Christ's resurrection, is the "mark of the beast," thus making us duplicate criminals, Sabbath advocates ought to be zealous indeed, and we are finding no fault with them looking at things as they do. In their case to make the Sabbath an everlasting theme is all papers is excusable. How many times does Paul then in one hundred chapters use the word Sabbath? we reply once, and once only.

This only employment of the word Sabbath is found in Col. ii. 16, 17. As our brethren have the common version, we will give this quotation, as rendered in some other versions. Wakefield renders it "Let no one, therefore, call you to an account about meat and drink, or with respect to a festival, or a new moon, or Sabbaths; which are but a shadow of what was to come." Conybeare and Howson give—"Therefore, suffer not any man to condemn you for what you eat or drink, nor in respect of feast-days, or new moons, or Sabbaths; for these are a shadow of things to come." Macknight translates, "Wherefore, let no one judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of a festival, or of a new moon, or of Sabbaths; which are a shadow of things to come." As this is the only place in all Paul's epistles where the word Sabbath is used, can any one, in his sober senses, claim that this institution, of the tables of the covenant made with Israel, is enjoined upon those living under the new covenant by the apostle, as an able and faithful minister of this latter covenant? Does Paul re-enact the Sabbath? Does he not rather say that the Sabbaths are a shadow, just as he says of new moons and yearly festivals? Do not shadows vanish away? and was not Paul right when he taught his Hebrew brethren that the old covenant made with Israel —the covenant on the tables in the ark—was vanishing away? Paul has taught us that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, is "the effulgence of his glory;" John, the beloved disciple, that "He is the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world;" and Jesus himself says "I am the light of the world." By "following him we shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life." Then why walk in the shadow of a covenant that dooms to death? For ourself we prefer to walk in "the light of the glorious gospel of Christ," "the gospel of salvation" from sin and death.

But it may be claimed that Paul is not speaking of the weekly Sabbaths here but of festival Sabbaths. Then it follows, by taking this absurdest of all absurd positions, that he has never so much as once named the weekly Sabbath in all his instructions to believers in the gospel. This would be saying, in effect, that not only had the old covenant of the tables vanished, but its sign, the Sabbath, had so effectually disappeared that there was not even the shadow of a shadow of it left by name in all his writings. To use a quite common expression, this comes within one of being right. But to show how indefensibly absurd this position is, let us go to the Old Testament Scriptures themselves, where the same collocation of words occurs, and see what would result from the application of this baseless interpretation. We proceed to quote:—By David's appointment the Levites were "to stand every morning to thank and praise the Lord, and likewise at even; and to offer all burnt-sacrifices unto the Lord, in the Sabbaths, in the new moons, and on the set feasts by number, according to the order commanded unto them continually before the Lord." 1 Chron. xxiii. 30, 31.

In the Greek Septuagint, precisely the same original words appear for Sabbaths, new moons, and the set feasts, as Paul uses—set feasts and holy day are from the same Greek word, and in the R. V. it is feast day. To apply the absurd interpretation here that some endeavor to affix to Paul's language would be to say that David made no provision for sacrifice on the weekly Sabbaths, and, therefore, that he made no account of them whatever. Another quotation reads:—"Behold I build a house to the name of the Lord my God, to dedicate it to him, and to burn before him sweet incense, and for the continual show-bread, and for the burnt-offerings morning and evening, on the Sabbaths, and on the new moons, and on the solemn feasts of the Lord our God. This is an ordinance forever unto Israel." 2 Chron. ii. 4. Here the three Greek words of Paul appear in the Septuagint,—the version generally quoted, from its general use at the time the apostles wrote,—and to carry over into this version the interpretation given to the word Sabbaths in Paul's epistle, would be to say, that Solomon did not build, nor dedicate the temple he erected, for any Sabbath sacrifices except for those of the festivals. Let our readers see for themselves how preposterously absurd the interpretation given to Col. ii. 16, appears when applied to this language of Solomon. If the wise King could only have lived in our day, he might have learned to express himself more perspicuously, if this interpretation be correct. Though we could make several more quotations from the Old Testament, demonstrating the exact meaning and limitation of these three terms, from their employment—the usus loquendi—both in the Septuagint and the English versions, yet we still make but one more now, and let it suffice. It is to this effect:—"Then Solomon offered burnt-offerings unto the Lord on the altar of the Lord which he had built before the porch; even after a certain rate every day, offering according to the commandment of Moses on the Sabbaths, and on the new moons, and on the solemn feasts three times in the year, even in the feast of unleavened bread, and in the feast of weeks and in the feast of tabernacles." 2 Chron. viii. 12, 13. If the word Sabbaths here does not mean the weekly Sabbaths, but those Sabbaths connected with the three yearly festivals, it would follow that he did not offer sacrifices at all on the weekly Sabbath as Moses commanded. A more perfect reductio ad absurdum could not be made than by applying the interpretation, that Paul means only the festival Sabbaths, to passages containing the very same words and referring to exactly the same institutions in the Old Testament. Sabbaths then as used by Paul, in the only text where he employs the word, is demonstrated to mean the weekly Sabbaths. He explicitly terms it a shadow make as much or little of it as we may. Having reached our own conclusions in a perfectly independent manner, we will close our article by quoting from Macknight; of whose scholarship and ability the world needs no proof beyond his writings. We will give his paraphrastic rendering of Col. ii. 16, 17, and then his notes. "Further since ye are made complete in the knowledge of your duty by the precepts of Christ, let no one, whether he be a heathen philosopher or a Jewish doctor, rule you, on any pretence, in the affair of meat or drink, or in respect of a festival, or of Sabbaths; which holy days, with the services performed on them, are a shadow of blessings to come; but the body, represented by these shadows is Christ's body, the church, with its spiritual services and privileges." In his notes he says:—"A festival, as distinguished from New moons and Sabbaths, signifies a day of rejoicing annually observed. Of these, some were enjoined in the law; others by private authority; such as those instituted in commemoration of the deliverance of the Jews by Esther, and of the purification of the temple by Judas Maccabeus." On the New moons and Sabbaths he says:—"Christians are under no obligation to observe any of the Jewish holydays, not even the Seventh day Sabbath. Wherefore, if any teacher made the observance of the Seventh day a necessary duty, the Colossians were to rebuke him. But though the brethren in the first age paid no regard to the Jewish seventh day Sabbath, they set apart the first day of the week for public worship, and for commemorating the death and resurrection of their Master, by eating his Supper on that day; also for the private exercises of devotion. This they did, either by the precept or by the example of the apostles, and not by virtue of any injunction in the law of Moses. Besides they did not sanctify the first day of the week in the Jewish manner, by a total abstinence from bodily labor of every kind."

To see what Israel was directed to do on the weekly Sabbaths, and on the yearly festivals and their connected festival Sabbaths in contra-distinction from the weekly Sabbaths, we request our readers to peruse carefully Leviticus, ch. xxiii., and by doing this they will more clearly apprehend the force of the verses we have quoted above from the Old Testament. See also Num. chs. xxviii. and xxix. In Num. xxviii. 11–15 can be seen directions about New Moons or first days of the month. These were the directions that David and Solomon followed, and these days were the days to which Paul alludes.

Means of Warlike Destruction.

[What a comment does what follows, cut from The Interior, afford upon the means and methods of modern war! How should Christians especially pray for the fulfilment of that old Psalm prophecy, "He maketh wars to cease unto the ends of the earth.")

Dispatches from the continent are burdened with accounts of the invention of and experiments with new implements of destruction. The European powers having barricaded themselves behind immense fortifications, are now vieing with each other in the production and perfection of new guns, projectiles and explosives. An improved shell, loaded with melinite, a new explosive, is the latest product of French invention, and tests made with it in England show it to be the most destructive projectile yet produced. Dynamite is as common gunpowder compared with it, and the obliteration of a whole town at a single attack is claimed as an easy result of its use. Naturally it has created a feeling of alarm in every capital, and the German government has answered the menace by public experiments with a new explosive of its own. A fortification, modeled on the plan of the strongest fortress on the French frontier, was practically obliterated in forty-eight hours, and the method of using the explosive is deemed a susceptible of still further improvement. Doubtless the French staff will now further advertise its military resources by blowing up a reproduction of German frontier fortresses with melinite, and the Belgian authorities have already begun experiments in that line. Every government is in a state of nervous excitability over the discoveries of the other, and no sooner is the smallest improvement introduced into one army than there is precipitate haste to equal it on the part of the remaining powers. Armament has been reduced to such an exact science that no nation can afford delay in the smallest detail, and the arsenals of Europe are filled with arms which, good a few months ago, have now become antiquated. The same mania for improvement shown in the army, moreover, has extended to the navy, and the huge ironclads which for twenty years have been the models of naval architecture, are giving place to the cruiser and torpedo-boat. The sea greyhounds of the Esmeralda type, which can dodge the ironclad and run down the swiftest steamships, are now the pets of naval engineers, as are the gun and torpedo-boats, designed for service against the armored leviathans. The first power to adopt the new system of naval warfare was Germany in 1873; but since then England, France and Italy, have followed, and the bulky and unmanageable ironclad has become practically a thing of the past. The torpedo-boat and light gun-boat, armed with one or two heavy guns, are now the chosen weapons of coast and naval warfare, and the leviathans with heavy armor and still heavier guns, are no longer found in the stocks. Happily, our own government is in position to take advantage of what is best in the altered conditions of warfare, and naval experts have already marked the torpedo-boats and light draught craft as the best adapted to national defence. The bills to be reported to the House and pending in the Senate for the increase of the navy, contemplate the construction of swift cruisers and gunboats, and also the purchase of Ericsson's inventions, including his boat, gun and shell. The boat works under the water and is virtually invulnerable, while the breech-loading gun discharges a projectile loaded with 250 pounds of dynamite. A more terrible enemy could hardly be encountered, and in the opinion of competent judges, no vessel anything like as formidable has yet been invented abroad. With provision made for an adequate supply of high-power guns, and a limited fleet meeting the conditions of modern naval warfare, the ends of national security would be so far promoted as not to involve any great risks.—Watchman.

EGYPT.

As representing the oldest civilization of which we have any existing memorials, and as recording the vicissitudes of so many centuries that even the learned differ in their estimates of the number to the extent of thousands of years, the land of Egypt has an interest not only for the Biblical student and the antiquary, but for general readers of every class and both sexes. One need not plunge into the turbid sea of Egyptian chronology to realise the antiquity of Egypt. It is sufficient to know that the earliest pyramids were already ancient monuments in the time of Abraham and before to Trojan war, and that these, no less by their massive solidity and faultless geometrical form than by the pictorial and heiroglyphical records which they contain, tell of a long antecedent period of human experience, of a highly organized form of society and of a vast population skilled in the arts and sciences, and possessing systems of religious worship and civil administration as elaborate and all-pervading as any of modern times. Not seventeen Pharaohs, but seventeen dynasties of Pharaohs, had been gathered to their fathers before that one arose which gave birth to the monarch who took Joseph into his service. This dynasty was expelled; others took its place, and, long after the exodus of the Israelites, a feeble line of successors to Rameses III.—whose exploits still remain a landmark in universal history—prepared the way for a sacerdotal usurpation, which left Egypt a prey to the incursions of surrounding races. First came the conquest by the Assyrians, who were driven out by the Babylonians, who in their turn gave place to the Persians, who were put to flight by the Greeks under Alexander the Great, who built Alexandria and paved the way for the comparatively brief rule of the Ptolemys. At this point, 300 years before the Christian era, the whole civilization of Egypt underwent a sudden and complete transformation. Arts, language, institutions, organization, were all Hellenized as if by magic. It was no longer Memphis or Thebes, but Alexandria that was the capital. As birds fly to corn so hither from all Hellas the immigrants came streaming in. The riches of Greece and of the Mediterranean shores, the trade coming north from the Red Sea and the produce of the Nile valley all met in the harbor of the new port, or were sold on the mart of the new city. Philosophers and artists, the mathematician Euclid, the physicians Erasistratus and Herophilus, the painter Apelles and the sculptor Antiphilus flourished under the lavish patronage of Ptolemy Soter and his successors. Wealth gave birth to luxury, and amid the sensuous splendors of the reign of Cleopatra, Egypt passed under the dominion of the Cæsars. The Roman away was a mere continuation of the Greek. A superstitious veneration for a hybrid polytheism, which was fast going to decay, repaired or added to some of the older temples and built a few new ones; but the arts and sciences declined, and with the rise of Christianity a new era dawned upon Egypt. The magnificent memorials of paganism were allowed to fall into decay. Disputations on points of faith replaced the culture of Egypt and the philosophy of Greece. The patriarchs of Alexandria consented to the pillage of its temples and the dispersion of its libraries. The conquest of Egypt by the Arabs in A. D 630, although at first attended by destruction and disorder—owing to the religious fanaticism of the Mohammedan victors—led to the revival of the arts and sciences in Egypt under an entirely new phasis. If sculpture disappeared, architecture took its place; and what was wanting in the production of the figure painter was abundantly compensated by the skill of the decorator and the beauty of his work. Manners, customs and civic organizations were all remodeled or absolutely changed. Under the Abbaside Khalifs in the eighth century the country once more attained—if, indeed, it did not surpass—its ancient grandeur and magnificence. It was an age alike of poetry and romance, of enormous wealth and prodigious prodigality—an age when public oppression furnished the means of fostering learning and encouraging the arts.

As a result the reign of the Khalifs has left memorials scarcely less varied and approachable than those of the Pharaohs, and works of art which, while they are quite as suggestive, are far less familiar to the modern student than those of the Greeks. Since that period, and more especially under the Turkish rule, which commenced in the sixteenth century, Egypt has gradually fallen into decay. Not even Turkish rule, however, can destroy those features which, independent of its wonderful relics of the handiwork of man, must ever render Egypt an object of interest to the student of natural phenomena and lover of the picturesque. Year by year the Nile comes pouring down between the Arabian and Libyan hills to convert the dry land into a vast lake, dotted with towns and villages, as with islands, and covered with the craft in which the population travel from place to place. Year by year the waters subside and the dry land once more appears—first to grow green with vegetation and then to laugh with rippling fields of corn.

The people are as unchangeable as the process by which their land is fertilized. Glad in much the same way, and subject to similar habits of life, they still carry on the work of husbandry and discharge the duties of the household in the manner of their forefathers in the days of the patriarchs, insomuch that on opening an Egyptian tomb which has lain closed during five thousand years the pictures therein found represent, in all but the indications they give of wealth and power, the scenes which the traveller in Egypt may see around him in modern times. Not less interesting are the animal and vegetable life of the land, while the general conformation of the country, especially along the course of the Nile and as seen under a cloudless sky and the clearest of atmospheres, is full of charms for the lover of nature.—Liverpool Mercury.

Bro. J. P. Westhee writes under date of Mar. 28, that it will be about three weeks before his new book "The Eastern Question" is ready for delivery, so that by the last of this week we hope to be able to fill the orders we have received. Send in your orders, and get one just as soon as the book is ready. Price $3.50—or with "The Coming Age," the two together, $6.00.

NOW is the time to renew.

Dear Restitution:

I here enclose two dollars to pay for THE RESTITUTION. We have been so unsettled that we have failed to write before. But the Lord has blessed us in that he has given us our four oldest children, Alonzo, Charlotte, Benjamin and Luella Wilkins, adopted into the Abrahamic family, by being baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, and are now waiting the coming and kingdom of the Lord. We are alone here in Winfield and the people seem determined that Christ shall not set up his kingdom on earth if they can help it. There are six large church buildings here and the members are all going to heaven at death whether there is any promise or not in the Scriptures. They claim their inheritance will be in heaven for all eternity, and seem greatly astonished when we produce an overwhelming amount of Scripture showing that Christ is to come personally and literally to establish his kingdom on the earth, and rule over the nations in righteousness, the New Jerusalem that the ancient worthies looked for, the city that has foundations whose builder and maker is God, that it will be on the earth they never heard before. So we pray and ask the brethren everywhere to pray with us for them. Brethren, the little while is about to end, and he who is to come will come, then all our sorrows will be ended. Watch and pray. Pray for us.

S. WILKINS.

Rev. F. A. Klein, the discoverer of the Moabite stone, who is now in Germany, but who for the past twenty-six years has been a Protestant missionary in Palestine (five in Nazareth, and twenty-one in Jerusalem), says that the present population of the Holy Land is divided into three parts,—the city people, the village or country people, and the Bedawins. The first are called madani, pl. madanijé; the second fellah, pl. fellahin; the third, bedawi, or inhabitants of the desert. The last named often call themselves simply el arab, the Arabs par excellence. These three classes are sharply distinguished from each other by their language, their clothing, the shape and arrangement of their houses, and their general customs and manner of living. The fellahin are considered the lowest in the land, and the word fellah is often used in derision. The inhabitants of the cities imitate the ways of western civilization, and pity the poor peasants. The latter, in turn, are the object of the supreme contempt of the Bedawins. Rev. Klein gives a most graphic and instructive description of the manners and customs of the fellahin in the Journal of the German Palestine Society, Vol. III.

Publisher's Notes.

Can any one give us the present address of L. O. Goodrich, formerly of Marvin, Kansas? We will be much obliged for any information as to his whereabouts.

Fathers and mothers, read the advertisements in another part of this paper of new books for the young. Remember, your child will read something, and in this day of trash in the literary world, designed specially for the young, it is the positive duty of every parent to place good books in the hands of his child.

A few to whom we sent letters, notifying them that their subscription has expired, and requesting a few lines of instruction as to their wishes in the matter, have not favored us with a reply. To do business honorably we must have a definite understanding with each other, so we ask all who have not yet answered, to do so at once. Any one who cannot pay for our paper will be furnished free, by asking for it.

"The Unspeakable Gift," by J. H. Pettingell, is now offered at one-half price. We have 500 copies of this work and should like to have them all taken in the next three months. This book contains absolutely conclusive proof of Life only in Christ, and as a missionary is ahead of anything published. If you do not need it yourself, don't you know a friend who could read it to good advantage? It will only cost a few cents to place it in his hands, and who can tell the good that may come of such a little effort on your part. We want to place a quantity of these books in the hands of missionary workers in this and other lands, and for this purpose will open a fund of free will gifts. Those of our friends who wish to take part in this missionary work may do so. The door is open, and though we do not urge this upon our brethren (for it should need no urging) we will just say, the privilege is yours.

THE UNSPEAKABLE GIFT.

A fund of free will donations to send the above named work to mission workers in this and other lands.

THE ROYAL SUPPER.

"Go out into the highways and hedges and compel them to come in."

Art thou "Waiting for Spring,"
Plenished pools of every tattle,
Wherefore are ye hungering?
Comes to you the invitation
To the supper of the King.

Art thou traveltorn and needy?
Are thy feet with wandering sore?
Bread is there And water ready,
Raiment for thee at his door.

All ye lore to thee be speech,
Enter in and take thy rest,
For the Prince himself sitteth
Yea! even with thee at meat.

HADES.

What and where is Hades? These are the two important questions we intend to answer, to the best of our ability, in the present article. If asked for our reasons for dealing with the word at all, we give the following:—First, the word is now a recognized Scripture term, appearing in the pages of the Revised New Testament (and its equivalent "Sheol" appearing in the Version of the Old Testament). It is necessary, then, a new word having been put before the Bible-reading public, that some explanation should be given, which, by its evident truth, and agreement with the entire revelation, should be the means of preserving from erroneous beliefs regarding this new word. The second reason we offer is the fact that among learned men of a certain theological cast of mind the word is made to stand sponsor for a theory which we believe to be very unscriptural, and we think it our imperative duty to make an earnest attempt to rescue any portion of God's revealed truth from the clutches of error.

There has arisen a class of teachers who, finding from the Scriptures that men do not go to heaven or hell at once at death, but that they are invariably said to go to hades, and believing that man is necessarily immortal, conceive that this hades is a place wherein the souls or spirits of the departed are confined, suffering a kind of punishment, or enjoying a kind of bliss, according to their deserts, awaiting the day of judgment. Others, impressed with the many passages which speak of God's love, and of the final obliteration of all evil, still deceived by their belief in soul immortality, clothe that hadean scene yet further by asserting that within its portals a grand remedial process is going on, that those who have not heard the Gospel, or having heard, did not, in the days of their earthly life, accept, will, beneath more favorable influences and more gracious impulses, hear the word of love proclaimed, and the result will be that from this place, very many, if not all, the captive souls will ultimately issue into the light and freedom of eternal happiness. This is the fascinating theory which is woven out of the word hades coupled with the belief in inherent immortality, and this it is against which we lift up our voices, and employ all our powers to subvert, believing that not only is it unscriptural but anti-scriptural, and calculated to numb all present Christian effort, and confirm men in refusal of the Gospel message, under the conviction that whatever may be their present state of life, however degraded, immortal, and iniquitous, yet the future, though it may have its meed of punishment, will line the cloud of penalty with the silver sheen of assured salvation, to be finally effected by the hadean punishment. This latter view is the one which is rapidly gaining ground amongst theologians. Numbers are fast giving up their belief in the old dogma of Eternal Torment, but as rapidly they seem to identify themselves with "the larger hope," and this because they have not the courage to investigate deep enough to find out that the doctrine on which both these unscriptural beliefs rest is a lie—a lie hoary with antiquity, but none the less—rather the more—a lie. That God's Book reveals the true nature of man, as mortal, is certain, and from that revelation we can march forward with steady footsteps and find every correlative doctrine dropping into its proper place without a jar or suspicion of a discord.

Hitherto, the word "Hades" has been a scholastic term, and only scholars were competent to speak upon it; but now that it appears as a Bibleal term in our English Scriptures, it must become a word which, when encountered in the course of reading, will convey an idea of some kind to the mind of the reader. As a needs-be, therefore, we must ascertain its signification. But how? By turning to Grecian-pagan mythology? No; that has done enough harm already. We will have none of it. We have no desire to degenerate to the folly of many Christians and make Bible revelation subservient to pagan belief. We prefer to attempt the explanation of the term from the pages of the Book itself. To do this aright let us first collate our materials and then examine them. We trust our readers will agree with us that this is the best course to follow, and that they with us will adopt the rule that it is the wisest to keep within the covers of the Book for the elucidation of the doctrines it reveals and the doctrinal terms it employs.

Let us to the inquiry, then. First, the word "Hades" is a Greek term, occurring eleven times in our New Testament, and is almost invariably given in the Greek Version of the Bible (Septuagint) as the translation of the Hebrew word Sheol. The latter occurs in the Old Testament sixty-five times, so that we may say the word "hades" occurs altogether in the Bible seventy-six times. Here, then, are our materials—seventy-six passages of Scripture. Surely we ought to determine from its usage and the context in which it occurs something concerning it. It seems pretty evident that the translators of King James' Authorized Version were in a fog about this word, for in the Old Testament they have translated it in thirty-one instances "hell" and of course, in the minds of many, is at once associated with the passages where it occurs, all the horrors of the place commonly supposed to be the habitation of the devil and his angels, and the prison-house and torture-chamber of the wicked. Let, for instance, a believer in Eternal Torment read Psa. lx. 17, "The wicked shall be turned into hell," and immediately in his discourse, the smell of brimstone and the clang of chains are discerned. But here 'tis the word "hades." Again, these worthy men rendered the same word "grave" in thirty-one instances. As when Jacob speaks of going to the "grave" in Gen. xxxvii. 35; as when Paul utters his triumphant cry, "O grave, where is thy victory" 1 Cor. xv. 55. Few imagine that this "grave" is the same place into which the wicked of the 10th Psalm shall be turned. Yet so it is. In three instances the same word is rendered "pit." Would it not be passing strange if the same word should mean the grave and a receptacle wherein wicked souls shall be congregated and suffer torment, and at the same time a place in which the righteous should congregate and be in conscious enjoyment? There is, a bitch somewhere, and we think we shall find it is caused by the translators and the false conceptions of men rather than by the Scriptures, which are in entire harmony upon the meaning of the term. We venture to assert that there would be no discrepancy were the prior question examined and settled. What is the nature of the being with whose death-state this place is inseparably associated? We claim to have determined this question already, and now proceed to examine further this other one. Please bear in mind that in all our quotations we use the word "hades" (introduced by the revisers of the New Testament) as the equivalent for the Hebrew Sheol. We do this on the authority of the Septuagint and of the quotation given in Acts ii. 27 from Psa. xvi. 10.

Now, from the gathered material before us—seventy-six passages of Scripture, sixty-five from the Old Testament and eleven from the New—we ask—Where is Hades? (We once heard it called the ante-room of heaven.) This is a most difficult question for theologians who, although they have the whole universe to choose from, cannot determine its location. Yet this is an easy thing to answer, provided always that the Scriptures be allowed to give the reply without twist or perversion. Note the following Scripture:—

"But if the Lord make a new thing, and the earth open her mouth, and swallow them up, with all that pertaineth unto them, and they go down quick into the pit (hades) then ye shall understand that these men have provoked the Lord. And it came to pass, as he had made an end of speaking all these words, that the ground clave asunder that was under them; and the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up, and their houses, and all the men that appertained to Korah, and all their goods. They and all that appertained to them, went down alive into the pit (hades), and the earth closed upon them"—Num. xvi. 30-33.

Here, then, is evidence that it is situated within the crust of the earth; confirmatory proof can be found in Deut. xxxii. 22, Job xvii. 13–16. Observe, further, all souls, nay, men themselves, pass thither at death:—

"What man is he that liveth and shall not see death? shall he deliver his soul from the hand of the grave (hades')?" Psa. lxxxix. 48.

"For thou wilt not leave My soul in hell (hades')," Psa. xvi. 10.

"They spend their days in wealth, and in a moment go down to the grave (hades')"—Job xxi. 13.

Jacob said—"I will go down into the grave (hades'), unto my son, mourning"—Gen. xxxvii. 35.

"If mischief befall him by the way in which ye go, then shall ye bring my grey hairs with sorrow to the grave (hades')"—Gen. xlii. 38.

"And they shall not lie with the mighty that are fallen of the uncircumcised which are gone down to hell (hades) with their weapons of war. And they have laid their swords under their heads"—Ezek. xxxii. 27.

In this list of passages we have the fact that the righteous and wicked, the soul, the man, grey hairs and weapons of war, all find their way to hades. What direction do they take? The verbs of motion attached all point to descent into the earth. Thus we see, from the Scriptures alone, determine the location of "hades."

Now, we ask, is hades a place of life? The usual affirmations regarding it assume that it is, some making it a place of activity and thought surpassing the present state, and a scene of more productive evangelization than the present. Others, again, differ from these so far as to say that the inhabitants of hades are in a kind of sleep, or a half-drowsy condition. Let us again to the sure Word.

There, is no praise; all is silent—

"In death there is no remembrance of thee; in the grave (hades) who shall give thee thanks?" Psa. vi 5.

"For the grave (hades) cannot praise thee"—Isa. xxxviii. 8.

It is a place of darkness—

"Let me alone that I may take comfort a little, before I go whence I shall not return, even to the land of darkness and the shadow of death, a land of darkness as darkness itself; and of the shadow of death, without any order, and where the light is as darkness"—Job. x. 20–22.

No thought there—

"Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave (hades') whither thou goest"—Eccl. ix. 10.

From these, then, we gather that hades is a land of forgetfulness, of darkness, of silence, nay, of death itself. That of all the vast host of men who have died and are in hades, however much they praised God on earth, none can praise God there. Abel, God-accepted, silent; Noah, rescued by God, silent; Abraham, the friend of God, silent. Can that be a scene of life? No; it must be as Job declares, "a land....of the shadow of death."

To the second question, What is hades? we are prepared by the foregoing data to reply. It is the grave, to which the first man went when "he returned to the ground from whence he was taken." The ordinary conceptions of hades invariably assume that it is there the spirit of man goes on its departure from the body. But he it observed the spirit is never once said to go to hades. It is spoken of as the place to which the soul goes at death, but "soul" and "spirit" are always distinct in the Scripture. But you will also note that the bodies of men go to hades. This proves that the grave is what is signified. Take for instance the passages already quoted, Gen. xlii. 38, Num. xvi. 30, 33. In the latter of these two passages, the unusual thing is, not that the bodies went, but that they went down alive. Compare 1 Kings ii. 6. It is, then, the grave. We do not mean the individual grave, the single grave, or vault, but to make use of an expression coined to convey the thought, it is "gravedom"—all graves viewed in one. A patient study of all the passages in which the word occurs will, we are persuaded, lead to this conclusion. We might quote from lexicographers in support of our position; we would rather point to a clear proof, and that is the fact that in thirty-one instances in the Old Testament alone out of its sixty-five occurrences, our translators were compelled to render it by "grave." This, with their evident belief of soul immortality and the desire to establish a destination between the respective destinies of body and soul in death, is a grand argument in our favor that hades signifies the grave, or state, or place of the dead.

It will be noticed in the foregoing argument that we have confined ourselves to the Old Testament proofs. We have done this because there is the first usage of the term, and there in its first usages we must determine its signification, and its meaning thus obtained must then be carried over to the New Testament passages where the word is found; and unless there is some intimation that the signification is changed that is the interpretation which must abide. Is there any intimation of a change—such as one as would admit of an idea of life? We reply, No. Every passage in the New Testament carries with it the meaning obtained by its usage in the Old Testament. We are, of course, aware, that the story of the Rich Man (Luke xvi.) will be urged against this decision, but our space forbids an examination of that now; we content ourselves with the affirmation that after a close study of that passage, we are satisfied that it falls in with the rest, and ranges itself as a witness against the current view.

The value of the New Testament allusions to hades is made appreciable by the study of the Old, for most of the doctrinal references to hades made in the New Testament refer to a redemption from it by the work of Christ.

Christ on one notable occasion promised his disciples that the "gates of hades should not prevail against his Church." Glorious promise; how grandly it shines out under the knowledge we have gained of what hades is. Mortality must succumb to the grim clutch of death, and it falls prostrate and lies in hades, and to the merely human vision it would appear that the everlasting shades of night had settled upon the dead—an Egyptian darkness never to be lifted. But that promise breaks in upon us in our darkest hours of gloom and despondency, and declares that the portals of the grave, so persistently closed to all egress, shall not forever be shut, but that one day they shall be flung back by irresistible might and be compelled to remain open until his ransomed ones are gathered out. Not only have we the promise but also the pledge, the earnest. Listen, "Thou dost not leave My soul in hades, nor didst Thou suffer Thine Holy One to see corruption." Yes, Christ has been within those gates, he has been in the darkness of death, but its grim doors were forced to admit of his passage out, never more to hold him in their power, even for the briefest period. Henceforth he declares himself the possessor of the keys of hades. They hang at his girdle, and when the proper time shall come he will fulfil his own good word, "They shall not prevail." No; they may imprison for a time, and he beyond human power to open, but conquer ultimately they cannot, for he holds the keys. The Apostolic Church cheered itself with this thought, and through Paul the true note of gladness has come sounding down to us, "Comfort one another with these words." The good word of God has assured by promise and by pledge, "I will ransom thee from the power of the grave; I will redeem thee from death. O death, I will be thy plague; O grave, I will be thy destruction." "I have the keys of hades and of death." Hosea xiii. 14; Rev. i. 18.—George Aldridge, in the New Zealand "Bible Standard."

LATE DISCOVERIES IN EGYPT.

Recent researches in Egypt not only prove the high civilization of that ancient nation, but serve to illustrate many obscure portions of Scripture. In the royal sepulchres near Thebes, mummies wrapped in the finest rose-tinted linens, goblets of variegated glass, pins with ornamental heads, necklaces of gold and lapis-lazuli, earrings, bracelets, and other articles of gold were found, exquisitely wrought, showing great skill and refinement.

With one of the mummies was found an almanac 3000 years old, written on papyrus; giving the probabilities of the weather, establishing the time of the reign of Rameses the Great, and what is singular, the festival days are in red ink. Another papyrus found in the Fayoom contains a marriage contract; gives the names of the bride and bridegroom, and states that the bride has a fortune of her own amounting to one hundred gold pieces, the bridegroom promises to find for his bride food, clothing, and everything suitable for a wife. It was signed in the presence of witnesses and bears a notarial certificate.

Stone or flint knives were also found, one with the owner's name, a priest of Ptah, inscribed upon it in hieroglyphics. These knives were used by the embalmers in the burial of the dead, and in the rite of circumcision. From Herodotus, Strabo, Diodorus, and other historians, and from mummies taken from the tombs, we learn that the rite of circumcision was practiced, not only by the ancient Egyptians but also by the Ethiopians, Abyssinians, and other nations, and that stone knives only were used in the ceremony. We are not to suppose from this, that these nations were ignorant of the use of iron or steel, but it probably was unlawful to use metal of any kind in this religious rite. They supposed iron to be identified with the bones of Typhon, the evil principle, and it therefore was held in abhorrence. This may explain why Zipporah, the wife of Moses, in circumcising her son used a sharp stone (Ex. iv. 25), and why Joshua at Gilgal, their first camping place in the land of promise, when commanded to circumcise the children of Israel (Josh. v. 3) made him sharp knives of stone or flint for the purpose; and it is an interesting fact that several flint knives were lately found on the plain of Gilgal and in Joshua's tomb at Timnath, probably of the very kind, if not the identical knives used on this occasion. We have examined some of these knives and found their edge equal to most instruments of the kind in steel. This recent discovery at Thebes shows that the Egyptians in the remote age of the Pyramids, though well acquainted with the use of iron, bronze and gold, still used the flint knife, considering it profane to use any other kind of instrument in preparing their dead for embalmment, or performing the rite of circumcision. And this probably is why the Hebrews used similar knives in their ceremonies. Hence it is written, "If thou wilt make me an altar of stone, thou shalt not build it of hewn stone; for if thou lift up thy tool upon it, thou hast polluted it." Ex. xx. 25.

Another very curious and interesting discovery has been made during 1886, in the loneliest and dreariest corner of the northeastern delta. In a land where other explorers have found only temples and tombs, Mr. Wm. Flinders Petrie has lighted upon the ruins of a royal palace. Here are the ruins of the very palace to which, as recorded in the Book of the Prophet Jeremiah, chap. xliii., Jonathan, the son of Kareah, followed by all the captains of the forces, and the remnants of Judah, brought the fugitive daughters of Zedekiah, then a dethroned and mutilated captive in Babylon. This flight of the Hebrew princesses took place 581 B. C., during the 26th Egyptian dynasty, in the reign of Uaabra, whom the Hebrews called Hephra, and the Greeks Apries. The Pharaoh received them with hospitality. To the mass of the Jewish immigrants he granted tracts of land extending from Taphenes to Bubastis, while to the daughters of Zedekiah he formally assigned the royal residence, which the Bible calls Pharaoh's house in Taphenes.

At the time these events occurred, the whole of this part of the delta to the westward as far as Tanis (Saul) and to the southward as far as the Wady Tumeilaut, was a rich pastoral district, fertilized by the annual overflow of the Pelusiac and Tanitic arms of the Nile. It is now a wilderness, half marsh, half desert. Towards the eastern extremity of this wilderness, in the midst of an arid waste relieved only by a few sand hills overgrown with stunted tamarisk bushes, lie the mounds of Defenneh. Two of these mounds are apparently mere rubbish heaps, the third is composed entirely of burnt and blackened ruins of a large pile, visible like a lesser Birs Nimroud for a great distance across the plain.

Arriving at his destination towards evening, footsore and weary, Mr. Petrie beheld the singular object standing high against a lurid sky, and reddened by a fiery sunset. The Arabs hastened to tell him its local name, and he may be envied the delighted surprise with which he learned that it was known far and near as El Kasr, el Bint, el Yahudif; the castle of the Jew's Daughter. He at once concentrated his forces upon the Kasr, which has now been thoroughly cleared out and cleared up, and not only its architectural structure but also its history has been rescued from oblivion.—M. A. Quirk, in International Standard.

The Southern Sky.

From the time we entered the torrid zone we were never wearied with admiring, every night, the beauty of the southern sky, which, as we advanced towards the south, opened new constellations to our view. We feel an indescribable sensation when, on approaching the equator, and particularly in passing from one hemisphere to the other, we see those stars which we have contemplated from our infancy progressively sink, and finally disappear. Nothing awakens in the traveller a livelier remembrance of the immense distance by which he is separated from his country than the aspect of an unknown firmament. The grouping of the stars of the first magnitude, some scattered nebulæ, rivalling in splendor the Milky Way, and tracts of space remarkable for their extreme blackness, give a particular physiognomy to the southern sky. The sight fills with admiration even those who, uninstructed in the branches of accurate science, feel the same emotion of delight in contemplation of the heavenly vault as in the view of a beautiful landscape or a majestic site. A traveller has no need of being a botanist to recognize the torrid zone on the mere aspect of its vegetation; and, without having acquired any notions of astronomy, without any acquaintance with the celestial charts of Flamsteed and De la Caille, he feels he is not in Europe when he sees the immense constellation of the Ship, or the phosphorescent clouds of Magellan, arise on the horizon.—Humboldt.

MICA PEN NOTES.

Take the first fourth of 1887. What a catalogue of disasters! What crushings, burnings, drowningsl Deaths by water, by fire, by collision, by explosion, deaths of men and animals; deaths by cold and starvation,—and the winter long prolonged. Some are fearful and wondering whereunto this will grow, and others mind it all but slightly, saying, let us build with brick and granite, and make ourselves and nation a name. But in all this commotion and portent there is a sweet thought. If only our hidden and absent Lord will be with us soon. If he will only look on us with his look of light, and speak one word of power we shall live! Till then all is weak and cloudy. I thought last night in a waking moment, O, for the day to come, and the clock to strike the hour of redemption; that, the body of frailty may die in a twinkling, and the body of immortality instantly supplant it!

As for the calamities, I doubt not they will continue and increase, for thus the stone chronology of the Egyptian pillar of God has warned us. We are not surprised in the least. We are fully prepared for earth commotions and convulsions. Alas for the the dear, and fair and brave that suffer and die. Alas for those that are wrapped in mantles of fire, and that are swallowed by the eager and pitiless waves of the sea and that are crushed by the walls that the earthquake jars out of equilibrium, and that are shattered or suffocated by the fierce energies of underworld caverns where men toil for their bread. We pity them and remember that the whole creation groaneth in pain. Our comfort is in that assurance that the very judgments will work out the grandest good, first for the saints, and finally for all. To God belongs the praise of his unspeakable love. Death, hades and corruption are doomed, but we will walk softly and soberly in the time of coming judgments.

But there are trials. There are disappointments. There is weakness and unfaithfulness of men. Some are worldly, even when appearing to be religious. They are intensely selfish even when seeming to be good. They are under the influence of something sinister; more or less captive to an insane delusion. They say things they do not mean, or forget what they have said. They multiply words and wounds without cause. Some are rushing on in a whirlwind of excitements, and talking about being ready for death and the world to come, when if death should suddenly confront them they would shrink appalled. What a time for self-knowledge now, and what a time for keeping God and his grace chief and supreme before the mind, that Christ may win in us—win the victory of love and salvation.

We have been thinking and talking of forgiveness. I have said to my wife, "Now I see how we can forgive those that have wronged us, how we can pray for those that have robbed us. Let me tell you something. When I ask God to forgive such and such a man, I necessarily and inclusively ask that he may have repentance also, and if he has repentance, then he has the vital and necessary thing. If God forgives a man, he sure of it, he will, he must repent, for repentance shall certainly follow an effectual forgiveness. O, how my heart aches that the wrong doer may repent! But now he is ready to justify himself. He will make no apologies. He will defend and exculpate himself to the last moment, and this aggravates the wrong, and intensifies the bitterness. But he shall repent. I will beseech God to forgive him, and in some way, forgiveness and repentance shall by no means fail to prove inseparable. He will repent, and when he has thoroughly repented you can let the past die forever out of mind, let all the wrong melt and die and be buried in the darkness of oblivion. It is really comfortable to remember that he who prays God to forgive his enemy, is by that very act laying the most potent siege to the citadel of his evil self conceit, for God in forgiving a sinner will certainly bring him to a sense of right and wrong, of good and evil, of ingratitude and obligation, as one can see beyond the shadow of a doubt must prove to be the case in the experience of those evil men who caused our Lord to be crucified. And who were they? Not the men (mainly) who drove the nails and reviled for the apparel of the Master, but the Jews in church and state, who had hunted their brother to death, and knew not that he was the Lord of glory. "They shall see and be ashamed." And how much this language comprehends! There is a world of most affecting and precious truth and high and rare instruction in it. It may well prove a text for weeks and months of gracious meditation.

Now I hope I have said nothing dogmatically; if I have, I would fain retract the dogmatic quality. For I have said I would neither write or read whatever was controversial or dogmatic, because it is an offence and a weariness. The very moment I see the savor of either the one or the other, I say, "that is not for me; I am weary of the sight and sound of this," and how careful I ought to be not to betray what I myself deprecate or disrelish.

I will close with lines which need neither explanation nor apology, and whichare but the expression of deep felt grief at the cruelty of the bird killing, and the folly of the wing and plume head decorations of the time.

Kill the birds—hunt them!
Hunt them to the end of the earth;
Send men in troops to the furthest bound
Of the wide inhabitable world,
To snare and entomb and kill and plunder,
To catch and pluck, and slay them alive or dead.

Show no mercy,—know and take no rest,
Hunt them with insatiable enterprise,
And cover the heads of the women of the world
With the plumage of the slaughtered innocents,
Imperial and imperious fashion orders it,—
Her royal edict goes like lightning,
Merciless, urgent and irrevocable.

Desolate the world and make it a solitude,
Rob it of every living and beautiful thing,—
Quench the sweet life of the forest songsters,—
Bid the ravaging insects multiply;
Let the destroying myriads take wing and fly
In unbridled fury across the waving fields,
Fierce as pouncing, devouring and insatiable,
Till the earth is an uninhabitable desert,
While the heartless goddess fashion reigns,
A ghost of wrath and vanity over empty space.

Kill, kill, kill.—rob and plunder,
Spare not a living and beautiful thing
That warbles in all the realm of space around
For great is the mother of cruelty, fashion.
That cries in haste, across the countries of Christendom,
Kneel to the utmost recesses of the wilderness
To find plumes and plumage for head dresses,
Wings and carcasses of the people of the air,
Beneath whose slaughtered glory of plumage
The wives and mothers and sweethearts
Of the wonderful nineteenth century,
May go joyous and sprightly and free-footed,
Reeking not of all the misery, and torture, and pain
Of the guiltless creatures that were sacrificed
To furnish the poor mockery of adornment.

Go, reap my harvest, by sea and land,
By night and day, crier the insatiable, get
Into every realm of the dusky pagans,
Into the home of the wild sea-islanders,
Seek incessantly, endlessly, and everywhere.
Take if need be, every helpless bird life,
And shed every drop of innocent blood
Of the wonderful things that God has made,
To people and beautify the air and forest,
And charm and cheer the wide extent of space,
With all the unrivalled wealth
Of their unexplained sweet minstrelsy.

C. COLEGROVE.

P. S. And still the sea, turbulent, insatiable and immense, with awful, pitiless eagerness, engulfs its thousands. And war, that sharpens its sword blades, that darkens the sky with the smoke of its cannon-forging foundries, that startles the ear with the click of scabbards, and the muffled roar of boundless preparation, is ready to involve a continent in tumult and bloodshed. Scarce can the suppressed fury be kept from flaming out. Do DeLesseps and Emperor William cry peace? Look at the Czar, a prisoner in his palace, fearful and angry, with a tempest of tumult in his own breast. When shall he launch his legions forth to battle? How shall he subdue the maelstrom of internal hate and revolutionary restlessness at home? And democratic France, with all her host ready to leap at the throat of Germany, how shall she keep her passion and resentment under restraint? To what extent will socialism in Europe prove her ally in the coming grapple of Titans?

"THY WILL BE DONE."

Kings of earth, in kingly train,
All your counsels are in vain;
God will set on Zion's hill
One, the chosen of His will;
Give to him the earth afar,
All your wrath may not debar;
He will say, "Thou art my Son!
Let my will on earth be done!"

All the nations, given Thee,
Rule Thou to the utmost sea!
Still the sigh, and right the wrong
Lips of sadness fill with song;
Make the wastes, break forth in bloom,
Take away the doleful tomb,
Fig and myrtle, trees of grace,
Take the thorn and briers place.

Let the glorious city rise!
Till its praises reach the skies.
Lay its stones with colors fair
Set the sparkling sapphire there,
Let the saints, the land possess,
Every wrong on earth redress,
Give them place upon thy throne,
Let my will on earth be done!"

To the Brethren in Indiana.

As the time for our conference to convene is fast approaching, let us examine ourselves and see if we are preparing ourselves for it. Do we remember Sec. 2, of our Constitution, which says, "It (the conference) shall be composed of the organized churches of the State,.... which churches shall be represented in the conference by duly authorized delegates." Now have we any authorized delegates? If not, let us authorize them at once. Let us not wait until we see the notice of the conference in THE RESTITUTION, and then try to excuse ourselves by saying, we didn't have time enough. Now is the time, let us improve it.

Again, do we remember the resolution adopted at the conference last November, which requires, That each organization shall contribute as much as they can for evangelical purposes, said contributions to be forwarded to the treasurer of the conference. Now are we complying with these requirements? Are we doing all we can? Ah! are we doing anything in this direction? If not, it is high time to awake out of sleep. When we look over the country, we see it dotted over with sectarian churches. How are all these brought about? Ans. By good organization, and an effort put forth to work in that direction. Why. Ans. Because of their faith, and love for what they believe to be the gospel. We read of $1,000,000 contributed last year by the M. E. Church for foreign missions, besides contributions for home evangelization, benevolent societies, etc., etc. While all this is being done, we are sitting dormant, believing (or professing to believe) the glorious gospel as delivered by our blessed Lord and his apostles, and yet doing nothing, comparatively, to extend it to those who would gladly accept and obey had they an opportunity. Brethren, our Lord has gone into a far country. He has left with us his goods. He has said to us, "Occupy until I come." Soon he will come and reckon with us. O! let us not be among that number represented by the one in whose hands was delivered the one talent, who went and digged a hole in the earth and hid his Lord's money. No, let us put it to the exchangers, that when our Lord comes he may receive his own with usury. Then he will reward us an hundred fold for our labor.

Remember he is not teaching us in the parables referred to how to use his money for our temporal welfare, but for our eternal welfare. Let us make our deposits in heaven's bank. No danger of bankruptcy there, the cashier being the Lord of heaven and earth. Brethren, let us all put our shoulders to the wheel and roll on the gospel of the kingdom as we have never done before. Let us make provisions that the next conference can put at least one or two evangelists in the field and keep them there. Let every organization in the State be represented at our next conference. Let us not wait to be urged to duty by the secretary, but go to work at once. Choose our delegates, throw in our mites, and be ready, ever realizing that "Procrastination is the thief of time." Yours in the blessed hope. L. H. CONNER.

Under Conviction.

It is no uncommon thing to hear men and women saying, "I am under conviction." Now what they mean by their use of the word, I do not know; if that they are not convicted or convinced of sin by their conscience, it is because they do not reflect or have not read the Bible with the care that it should be read when so much depends upon the reading.

Do they not know that "all have sinned?" that condemnation has passed upon all, and God does not condemn until he first convicts. God then convicts you of sin and condemns you to death, for "the wages of sin is death." And yet you "are not under conviction!" not convinced that "all the world has become guilty before God," and you with the world! The righteousness of God by faith of Jesus Christ is unto and upon all them that believe—do you believe?

God hath set forth his Son to be a propitiation through faith in his blood—have you faith in his blood? His righteousness is declared to be for the remission of sins that are past—have you that righteousness, clothing you as a garment? Have you been reconciled by the death of God's Son that you may be saved by his life? Are you the servants of sin, or the servants of God? "To whom you yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom you obey, whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness." If you have obeyed from the heart the word of doctrine delivered unto you, you have been made free from sin, if not, you are still the servants of sin. When God says, "do this," and you do not do it, you are sinning, and indeed he says in plain terms that they who neglect the great salvation that he proffers them, cannot escape.

Are you not then under conviction? Are you not proved guilty? Are you not convinced of sin? These things are not to be trifled with; they are matters of life and death. The moments will not wait. God will not always lengthen out your days. Be wise and seek him now, find safety in Jesus now.

"Earth has honor, wealth and pride,
Earth has joys and fancies gay,
These are but bubbles on the tide,
What will they be in the judgment day?"

To the Church of God in Christ Jesus, re ering.

"If any man teacheth a different doctrine and consenteth not to sound words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the doctrine which is according to godliness; he is puffed up, knowing nothing but doting about questionings and disputes of words whereof cometh envy," etc., etc. 1 Tim. vi. 3.

As the April number of the Advocate has come to hand, and in it there is no mention made of the discussion on resurrection, though I sent the reply as seen in this No. of THE RESTITUTION as usual, I believe I am warranted in concluding that Elder Williams has decided not to give my last reply a place in his paper. Had it not reached him through the mail, I doubt not he would have presumed that his last paper was unanswerable. Had he intended to publish it at a future time he would most likely have said something to that effect. Utter silence shows that he cannot defend the position he has taken, and that it is best to keep his readers in the dark, as to the weakness and unscripturalness of the theory he so dogmatically teaches and tries to enforce.

I ask every reader, to take his last reply in the discussion as found in the March Advocate or RESTITUTION March 16, and carefully compare with the reply I have given in this paper, and see if he has not vanquished both himself and his theory.

I know full well that the faithful are watching to see what can be brought out to support what they have been taught to believe as a doctrine of the Scripture. Many dear ones scattered all over the land from TEXAS to Oregon as well as abroad are asking "What is truth," on this question? For their sakes and their's alone I have written.

Circumscribed as I have been as to space; and so often obliged to turn aside from the regular line of argument to reply to foolish quibblings, and points quite irrelevant to the subject, I have done the best I could, and leave the entire outcome in our Father's hands, believing that he will bless the work to the enlightenment of those who really desire to know his will. CARRIE WILLIAMS.

WILL THE DEAD EMERGE FROM THE GRAVE IMMORTAL? No. 5.

A Discussion in which Carrie Williams affirms they will, and the Editor denies—claiming the dead will emerge Mortal and be Judged before they receive Immortality.

Elder Williams. When I entered this discussion, I supposed it was on the teaching of the Scripture as contained in 1 Cor. xv. 35. Your last paper indicates that there has been a change of basis, and that it is now a "case in court," where you preside as judge, with all authority and power; while I have no rights but to answer whatever questions you see fit to ask, whether they be relevant to the case or not. This assumption of power I dispute, and claim equal rights with you in the exegesis of the Scripture in question. All your accusations and innuendoes I pass by without notice. That the resurrection of the unjust is not in the issue of this question, I still insist, for the Scriptures above quoted is the leading text in the discussion; and it does not embrace the unjust.

When I stated the question at the first, I had in mind the grand, and yet future event awaiting a portion of our race (not the dead universe. " " that would include all that ever com. into human existence); nor did I for a moment think of referring to any past miracle, either to prove my position or to disprove yours; for they have no place in this discussion. Therefore Lazarus, and all others who were brought back to mortal life as special demonstrations of God's power over death, have nothing to do with this question.

You refer our readers to the cover of the Advocate, Oct. 1886, and say, "This was the beginning of the discussion." Will any of our readers accept this as truth if they read both covers of the Advocate? I will quote your own words. " " "So she proposes to affirm that the dead in Christ come forth from, or out of the grave in incorruption, and discuss the question through the Advocate. " " " If there could be a discussion of the real issue, the pro and con, " " some good may be done and we might have offered space " " " we suggest she send her first letter to commence a discussion of—first—will the dead emerge from the grave immortal, and second—Will the just, and unjust, be judged at the second coming of Christ; before receiving the reward of immortality and the punishment of death? Bro. Moyer, if he is able to use his pen will discuss the subject; if he is not, we will.

Now sir, having given your statement, both as to the question and who are the subjects of resurrection involved in it, and the fact that you have taken Mr. Moyer's place in it, I again assert that the language used to express the subject in hand all taken in its legitimate connection, none others are included than the dead in Christ. Note also that your second clause in the discussion does not embrace either the righteous or the wicked dead.

Contrary to all rules of discussion, you took the statement of the question entirely out of the hands of the affirmative, and did not even tell how you had modified it, till the first articles appeared. The question is, "How are the dead raised?" (not how did Christ exercise his divine power in calling back to life) and to this question I assert that there is no mention in the Bible that they will be raised to mortal life. I find no proof, and I have faithfully sought for it—that Paul taught the resurrection of the unjust. He believed all things that were according to the law, and that were written in the prophets.—See Acts xxiv.-xxvi.-xxviii.—concerning the Christ, and this he preached as the hope of Israel. In Mark iv. 33-34, we read of Christ's teaching " " "and without a parable spoke he not unto them." In Luke xvi. he gave the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus; which orthodox teachers insist was a literal narration of facts, and in John v. 28-29, he gave another parable, which some insist is a literal statement of facts that will come to pass. A careful study of these Scriptures, will show to every earnest seeker after revealed truth, that they are parables. Compare them with Luke xx. 34-37, which is a direct answer to the Sadducees' question. Dan. xii. 2, and Ezek. xxxvii. the valley of dry bones, stand on the same plane. In the foregoing I think I have replied to every point worthy of notice in your eleven "judicial" questions, as embraced in No. 2, 3 and 4 demand no reply. No. 5, you have surrendered of absolute necessity and in No. 6 you launch out into 1 Cor. xv. and truly make short work of it, summing it all up in three short paragraphs. I do not wonder that you feared to attack the pyramid (air-castle) of revealed truth that I constructed out of the divine teachings of this wonderful chapter. The structure thus reared is an impregnable to an attack of speculative philosophy, as the Great Pyramid Gizeh in Egypt is to a poisoned arrow from the bow of a wandering Arab.

In your brief exegesis of the chapter, you travesty the glorious doctrines therein set forth—and bid defiance to the time-honored and common-sense meaning of words; and without any authority, assert that to sow, is to cast out, (Why did you not illustrate your idea by referring to Jonah being "sown or cast out" by the whale) and that a natural body after being sown or cast out is raised a spiritual body. Now Elder W. the position you have here taken may be summed up thus—

a. The word sown as here used signifies to cast out.

b. That which is cast out is as a natural body—a living soul, and is in the first order of the resurrection.

c. It, the natural body is raised out of the lower nature into the higher or spiritual nature, which is the second order in the resurrection, and therefore follows the inevitable conclusion that—

d. Those that do not attain to the spiritual nature are never raised! And so you leave nearly "cast out" of the ground all but those who are in Christ! Here you have done precisely as Haman of old, when he prepared the gallows for poor Mordecai and was thereon hanged by decree of Ahasuerus.

You prepared a gallows on which to execute me because you insist that I do not believe in the resurrection of the unjust, when lo, without the decree of king, or the aid of courtiers, you ascent step by step, till you reach the pinnacle: and down you come, and leave unresurrected, all who are not in Christ. They are cast out merely, they are not raised. For them there is no resurrection. Now sir, to what conclusion has your reasoning led? Still further—Your solution of the question does not answer the query of the Corinthians; for they ask, "How are the dead raised" and you only tell how the living are changed.

You teach them that the bones of the dead will be cast out of their graves, and the sinews and flesh drawn over them and then the skin. And then, into these carcasses the breath of life is breathed, and then they are again in mortal life; waiting for their turn to come to "tell the story of their lives," etc. Let me ask. Are not mortal beings subject to death and liable to disease? What if some of those mortal creatures take sick and die before they hand in their report? Will they be "cast out" a second, and perhaps a third time? Again. If the saint who is asleep in Christ, who is now in possession of immortality and they awake "in his likeness," where is there any time left for this mortality and corruption after the sleep in Christ has ended? Now Elder W. if the resurrection be but an ascension from a lower nature to a higher nature, why have you wasted so much time talking about "mortal resurrection?" According to your Lexicon what does the phrase "mortal resurrection" signify? Is it according to a higher plane of mortality—attaining to better health? Truly, truly a house divided against itself cannot stand! You by your own hand have dashed to the earth your unscriptural dogma of mortal resurrection. You have closed the discussion abruptly without having given one text to prove your theory: and so when I add a few thoughts as implied in my last, I leave you with the earnest prayer that the Lord may open the eyes of the blind.

3. "It is sown in weakness"—and weakness as here used means "strengthlessness or wanting in power." Here is another striking contrast, while in grain there is no contrast. Every seed gives back a body of its own kind, in every particular, so that the countless kinds of seed sown always remain separate.

4. "It is sown a physical body it is raised a spiritual body." This crowns the grand climax of contrast between the body buried and the body raised. To sow is not to "cast out," but "to scatter, to plant," and "to plant is to put in the ground and cover as seed for growth." Webster. Therefore I say that the body sown is the body buried, or put into the ground, and covered up. And the body raised, is the body taken out of that low position. The condition when it was put in, was corruptible, dishonorable, weak, animal or physical; and the condition when it is raised out of that position, will be incorruptible, glorious, powerful and spiritual.

No illustration of the resurrection could be given by the sowing and raising of grain; or by any other of the visible works of the Great Jehovah, because the resurrection will not be according to the fixed and immutable laws of nature that govern all the visible creation. Nature, in her entire book unfolds to us nothing of the great beyond. Her book is bound, and clasped, with, and by mortality and corruption. Yet the whole creation is of God, and "So also is the resurrection of the dead," Jehovah has not yet told us how he will exercise his divine power in bringing back the dead to life. He simply tells us that the dead in Christ, the righteous dead shall be raised incorruptible, and that this will take place when "The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God. And the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we that are alive, that are left, shall together with them be caught up in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord."

"Wherefore comfort one another with these words." 1 Thess. iv. 16-17

THE COMING AGE,

—1776—

Nature and Proximity.

—BY J. P. WESTRUP.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is creating in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

The coming Advent the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are many at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the test of current events. It discloses the wonder working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand is in the present age, in shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensation yet to be. It is a work of absorbing interest, and points out with clearness and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great thinking Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 300 large pages, bound in Cloth, Price $1.00. Send to this office for this work.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXVI. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, APRIL 20, 1887. NO. 15.

Communications.

A Brief Review of the International Lesson for the First Quarter of the Year 1887.

"In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth."

This is the golden text for the first lesson of the quarter. What was before the beginning no mind can fathom. Concerning the beginning itself philosophers know nothing. It is only by God's word that we can learn God's plans as they commenced from the beginning: therein we find that "The works of the Lord are great, sought out of all them that have pleasure therein. His work is honorable and glorious, he hath made his wonderful works to be remembered," Psa. iii. 2-4.

When God had created the heaven and the earth, the sun, moon, and stars, and made vegetation to grow on the earth, and animals for the use of man, "He then created man in his own image, after his own likeness, in the image of God created he him, male and female created he them. And God blessed them," and gave them dominion over the works of his hands. So the Psalmist says with astonishment, "When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained: What is man, that thou art mindful of him? and the Son of man that thou visited him? For thou madest him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honor. Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands; thou hast put all things under his feet," Psa. viii. 3-6.

Then to prove the loyalty of man, it pleased God to put him under a test trial, and he placed life and death before him. Obey and live, or, transgress and die. Now was Satan's opportunity, so he changed God's word, and deceived the woman, and the man hearkened unto the voice of the woman, then sin and death followed, so the golden text of the second lesson is, "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin," Rom. v. 12.

As time passed on, and offerings were made unto God by the sons of Adam; one proposed to worship in accordance with God's plan, while the other determined to offer his gift in accordance with the dictates of his own will. When the offering of Abel was accepted by God, Cain became angry, and rose up against his brother and slew him. So crime was practiced, and death was witnessed. Then Cain answered rudely, saying, "Am I my brother's keeper?" but God said, The voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground. Still to this day we labor under the curse put upon the ground because of transgression.

Then as the people multiplied upon the earth, wickedness prevailed, but the eye of God beholding all things, saw the righteousness of Noah, and made known unto him his intentions, and instructed him to build an ark for the saving of his house. God said, "Behold, I, even I, do bring a flood of water upon the earth, to destroy all flesh, wherein is the breath of life, from under the heaven; and everything that is in the earth shall die."

So Noah who was a preacher of righteousness, built the ark, and gathered in his family, and of the birds of the air, and of the beasts of the field, and of every creeping thing after its kind, as God had said to him. Yea, "Noah did according unto all that the Lord commanded him."

In about five hundred and twenty-seven years after, was "The call of Abram," from his own country, and from his kindred, and from his father's house, unto a land that he knew not. And God said unto him, "I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing." So at the age of seventy and five years Abram departed. He took with him Sarai his wife, and Lot his nephew, and all their substance, and came into the land of Canaan, and the Lord made a promise unto him saying, "Unto thy seed will I give this land," and he became a sojourner there.

And when strife arose between the herdmen of Abram and the herdmen of Lot, Abram liberally gave "Lot's choice" of land to him, and Lot beholding the beauty of the plains of Jordan, so desirable for his stock, he covetously selected that portion, forgetting to "seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness," Matt. vi. 33. Then Abram dwelt in the land of Canaan, and "Lot dwelt in the cities of the plain, and pitched his tent toward Sodom."

But God still had respect unto Abram, for he promised him saying, "Fear not, Abram; I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward," Gen. xv. 1.

So now in the seventh lesson, God promises Abram that his seed shall become multitudinous, even as the stars of heaven, also an inheritance in the land of Canaan, and although his seed should serve four hundred years in a strange country, yet he would deliver them with great substance, but as for Abraham himself he should die in peace, and be buried in a good old age. Herein God entered into covenant relationship with him, and renewed his promise saying, "Unto thy seed (Christ, says Paul) have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates." So God changed the name of Abram, to that of Abraham; because he should become a father of many nations; and he dwelt in the plains of Mamre, and as he sat in his tent door, he looked, and behold, three messengers from God came to him. Here he received angels unawares; and when God through these angels had promised to him a son, even Isaac, through whom the promised seed should come, to bless the nations of the earth, they went toward Sodom, for the wickedness of that city was great, and God purposed to destroy it. Now in full view of the city of Sodom, Abraham stood before one whom he calls the Lord, and there Abraham pleaded earnestly for the salvation of that city, that it should not be destroyed for fifty righteous' sake, but fifty righteous could not be found there, so he continued his intercession, reducing the numbers till he came down to ten. "In wrath (God) remembered mercy," but as ten righteous persons could not be found there, "The Lord went his way, as soon as he had left communing with Abraham, and Abraham returned to his place." The angels passed on to Sodom and saw the wickedness of the people, "And when the morning arose," they hastened Lot and his family out of the city, saying, "Escape for thy life; look not behind thee." So Lot and his daughters entered into Zoar, and the "destruction of Sodom" was made complete, but Lot's wife is a standing monument of God's dealings with the disobedient ones.

Here we come to the lesson of "Abraham offering Isaac" to prove his loyalty, but Abraham's faith is steadfast, he remembered God's promise to him, that in his seed all families of the earth should be blessed, therefore we read in Hebrews xi., "By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac, and he that had received the promises offered up his only begotten Son, of whom it is said, that in Isaac shall thy seed be called: accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead." So Abraham said to Isaac "God will provide himself a Lamb for a burnt offering." Here is a type of Jesus the "Lamb of God."

God is always ready to accomplish his purpose, so he directs the line of marriage, and Isaac sent his son Jacob from Beersheba unto Haran, to take a wife of the daughters of Laban. On his journey we find "Jacob at Bethel," where he saw the Lord in vision, who said to him, "I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac; the land whereon thou liest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed;" the promise is that this seed should become multitudinous, even as the dust of the earth, and he and his seed should bless the earth. "And Jacob awakened out of his sleep, and he said, Surely the Lord is in this place and I knew it not," and he believed when God said, he should "come again to his father's house in peace."

Now about twenty years after, we find Jacob wrestling (or striving) with the angel of God, (on his return to his own country), and prevailed; and would not let the angel go without receiving a blessing; here his name is changed. And what is "Jacob's new name?" The angel said, "Thy name shall be called no more Jacob, but Israel: for as a Prince hast thou power with God and with man, and hast prevailed." So his name was changed to that of a prince with God, Israel.

Thus the twelve lessons of the quarter are briefly reviewed, and what are the leading thoughts:

1. God is the creator of all things.

2. "The wages of sin is death," Romans vi. 23.

3. Obedient sacrifices alone are acceptable to God.

4. Salvation is the reward of obedience.

5. It is always best to obey God's call. To the faithful he has promised the blessing.

6. Self gratification sometimes leads into bad company and danger.

7. It is always well to live in covenant relationship with God.

8. It is good to pray for others, as well as ourselves.

9. God will destroy the wicked, "They shall be ashes under the soles of the feet of the righteous, "See Mal. iv.

10. God proves the loyalty of his people, and blesses them that are faithful.

11. God directs the ways of his chosen people.

12. God gives a new name to them that prevail, so we read, "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it," Rev. ii. 17. "So the secret (counsel or friendship) of the Lord is with them that fear him. And he will show them his covenant," Psa. xxv. 14.

J. B. COX.

RESTORATION OF ISRAEL.

Many Christians speak and act as if all truth was with them, as if they were absolutely free from error, and as if those who differ from them were necessarily wrong. And they seem unwilling to read on some subjects unless they know beforehand that the books brought under their notice agree with their preconceived opinions. To look at both sides of any great question, and carefully weigh arguments on both sides, is the way to discern between truth and error. "It is a great stride forward," says the Jewish Messenger, "when people begin to recognize windows in their ancestral creed, through which they can catch a glimpse of the broader sky and the larger purpose." This is true, but it is a greater stride still, and yet a greater blessing, when they make good use of the windows and obtain fresh and bright light. On the subject before us some seem to close their eyes against the most plainly revealed truth.

This subject of the return of the Jews to the Holy Land, and their establishment again as a nation, we wish you to examine from a Scriptural standpoint, and without any leaning to preconceived views. There is a strange and an almost unaccountable prejudice existing against the teaching that they will again be settled as a people in their own land, and will be pre-eminent among the nations. This truth is so distasteful among some, specially among those who spiritualize so many of the promises and prophecies, that it meets with great opposition; and on this account we beseech of you to examine what the Scriptures say about it, and keep your eyes wide open that you may see what God has revealed.

Now we would observe, at the outset of our remarks, that Israel are God's peculiar people. "For the Lord," says the Psalmist, "hath chosen Jacob unto himself, and Israel for his peculiar treasure."—Psa. cxxxv. 4. It was to the Israelitish nation that Jehovah gave the covenants; and the blessings promised in the covenants can only be obtained by those of Gentile nations by their becoming the seed of Abraham, or adopted sons of Abraham by faith, as Paul teaches. It is only thus that they can become a part of the elect nation. And Christ says, "Salvation is from the Jews." These are truths not so much relished by many Gentiles, but they show, with many other things that might be named, the correctness of the statement we have made. Some speak of Christianity as a modification of Judaism, and as a descent from Judaism. Abbott says that "Christianity is developed Judaism."

No union is so close, so intimate, and, it on a proper basis, so precious and happy as that between husband and wife. By the figure of this union was God's relation to the Jewish nation set forth. But as the nation forsook God and rebelled, and were guilty of abominations, Jerusalem, as their representative, is addressed as a harlot, and charged with whoredoms. She is compared to Sodom and Samaria, who are called her sisters, and charged with having committed more abominable things than they committed. Yet after quite a long list of sins and evils of which she was guilty, and which are enumerated in the 16th chapter of Ezekiel, and after an enumeration of the judgments which should come upon her for her sins, we read in verses 60-63: "Nevertheless I will remember my covenant with thee in the days of thy youth, and I will establish unto thee an everlasting covenant. Then shalt thou remember thy ways, and be ashamed, when thou shalt receive thy sisters, thine elder sisters and thy younger: and I will give them unto thee for daughters, but not by thy covenant. And I will establish my covenant with thee; and thou shalt know that I am the Lord: that thou mayest remember, and be confounded, and never open thy mouth any more, because of thy shame; when I have forgiven thee all that thou hast done, saith the Lord God." Jehovah here promises unconditionally to his chosen people, not only divine knowledge, but contrition for sin and forgiveness of sin.

There are promises of restoration and blessing, observe, where conditions are expressed, besides some where no conditions are named. This we frankly admit; but the point we here press is this—and it is a pivotal point—that the very conditions which God requires in order to their restoration, he himself will supply. In grace and mercy he has promised to do for them what, if left to themselves, they would never do. While many, as individuals, will still harden their hearts in unbelief and impenitence, yet, as a nation, God, who is unchangeable, has unconditionally promised to bring them to repentance and righteousness and purity and peace.

There is no lack of promises both of the gathering and the redemption of Israel that are unconditional. There are also prophecies of their pre-eminence as a nation, of their possessing the Holy Land, and of the mission they will fulfil in carrying the word of life and salvation to other nations, which are also unconditional. And with all the efforts that have been made, it has never yet been proven that they are not unconditional. The conditions apply to them, not as a nation, but as individuals. As a nation, God has promised unconditionally to restore them, for he foresaw that a remnant, in the exercise of their free moral agency, would repent of their rejection of the Messiah; but who, as individuals, as the hour of redemption is close at hand, will be found among the saved remnant, will depend upon acceptance of the Christ.

The casting off of the Jewish people is only for a period; the most emphatic declarations of the Word prove that it is not permanent. "And I will strengthen the house of Judah, and I will save the house of Joseph, and I will bring them again, for I have mercy upon them; and they shall be as though I had not cast them off: for I am the Lord their God, and I will hear them."—Zech. x. 6. "For God will save Zion, and build the cities of Judah; and they shall abide there, and have it in possession. The seed also of his servants shall inherit it; and they that love his name shall dwell therein."—Psa. lxix. 35, 36.

And the time we think is not very distant when Israel's afflictions and sorrows shall end. Jehovah's faithfulness will be manifest, and his word will be made good, as we read in Isaiah xxx. 18, 19: "And therefore will the Lord wait, that he may be gracious unto you, and therefore will he be exalted, that he may have mercy upon you.... For the people shall dwell in Zion at Jerusalem: thou shalt weep no more; he will surely be gracious unto thee at the voice of thy cry; when he shall hear, he will answer thee."

Dear Restitution:

Thinking that some of the readers of THE RESTITUTION might wish to hear from an old veteran and lover of all Bible truth and freedom to proclaim it orally or through a channel which I have done much to support, therefore I write.

Since my last I have performed much manual labor, have kept up an extensive correspondence, the majority upon the plan of human redemption, hence a critical examination of portions of Holy Writ, and an exposer of false doctrines. I have spent a number of first days with the brethren worshipping near Penthill, Ont. Had free time in preaching what I believe to be the truth and essential to man's salvation. Have spent most of the winter months at home instructing the many who call on us upon the all-important truths of revelation, the history of the world, the signs of the times, the coming of Jesus and the restitution of all things foretold by the prophets of Israel!

As I cannot see to read, Mrs. L. and others read for me, and during my leisure hours I have rolled over in my mind the past, from Adam to our day, and the awful judgments that are to come upon an ungodly world! Then I have taken a leap into the glorious future when the effects of sin shall be removed from the universe of God, and his glory shall fill the earth! The sky be clear and the soil free, the victor's song float over the plains of Eden, and the anthems of seraphs blend with its strain; the sun rolls down its brilliant flood and shines on a world that is fair and good!

March coming in like a lamb, I concluded to comply with the advice of my better half and take the advantage of a cheap fare, but a good and quiet one, and visit Richmond, Va., Washington and Baltimore, Md., for the purpose of viewing the works of Deity and art, and also scatter a quantity of my works and preach the gospel of the kingdom of God and those things which concern our Lord Jesus Christ, as opportunity might present itself to me. I disposed of all the works I took with me and could have sold many more if I had taken them. Have sent some to parties since my return.

Richmond is a fine city, and is in the midst of a fine country, situated on the James River, at the head of navigation. It has a grand water power which is improved. There are quite a number of manufacturing establishments, some of them for the manufacturing of tobacco. This weed is destructive to the health of all who use it. The city is healthy. It lays high, having a gradual ascent from the river. The water for its inhabitants is taken from James River. The people are kind and possess the Southern generosity and hospitality. Good could be done here through an able and practical minister of the gospel.

Washington is a fine city, beautifully laid out. Its streets are wide, the main one being eleven rods. All of them are paved superior to anything I have ever seen. Its public buildings are strong and grand. The capitol cost some 16 million; some say 150 million. But people differ in knowledge and judgment. In the building where they make greenbacks there are 850 hands employed and in the treasury department over 300. In this building there is locked up 108 million of gold and 18 tons of silver. Therefore there is nothing to hinder Washington from being a fine city for it has Uncle Sam to make it. The White House, Smithsonian Institute and Patent Office, the Washington Monument, which is 550 feet high, and the bridge leading across the Potomac River into Virginia, a mile in length, are all noble structures and worth seeing. The whole is an ornament to the nation. But I am looking for Jerusalem, now desolate, to be rebuilt, which will surpass in glory and grandeur all that earth or Gentile nations now possess.

I found none in this city of the one faith, one hope and one baptism. I was in hopes to have found Eld. Bond, for I wanted to see him and have a short interview. The city, it is said, has a population of 200,000, who enjoy all they live for; and I am not disposed to take from them or deprive them of anything they now enjoy unless they are willing to receive something better, which the gospel of Abraham's God offers. The people are civil, quiet and kind, and the best of all I found some who listened with deep interest to what I believe to be vital truths, whose minds had already entered the channel of thought which I have been pursuing for years. By a faithful and intelligent minister of the gospel good can be done under God in this city.

I spent four days in Baltimore. Visited my son whom I had not seen for years. It is a city of grandeur, of monuments, of beautiful squares and parks, perhaps not equaled by only a few if any in the United States. It has a population of between 400,000 and 500,000. Its streets are beautiful and kept clean. If we were to judge we should say the people are polite and kind, and many of them churchgoing people. As to a knowledge of the gospel they are like other cities I suppose.

On the first day of the week I, in company with my son, at 3 p. m., attended meeting with the people calling themselves the "Church of God in Christ Jesus." The audience was small, only twelve adults besides myself and son, and a few little children. My son introduced me to them. The question was asked if I was connected with THE RESTITUTION party, or went with them, but no liberty given me to speak.

Having learned that Mr. M. Baxter, editor of The Signs of the Times, was lecturing in Masonic Temple on the coming of Jesus in 1800, and the events that are to take place previous to his coming, in company with my son I went to hear him. The audience was large and gave the best of attention to his lecture, which occupied one hour. When through he invited me to speak and introduced me to the audience as and author of a book and a lecturer. First I stated that I was glad that I was present to listen to the subject presented to us this evening. It was a subject that I had been deeply interested in since 1840. That every line of prophecy, and everything in the political and religious world bespoke in tones of thunder that Gentile times will soon close. Jesus will soon vacate the Father's throne, step into the car of glory whose wheels will in fire roll down the burning pathway of the heavens. That time could only prove that the speaker was not right in his calculations, from the fact that there is no testimony to my knowledge in the universe of God to prove him to be wrong.

The great question for each one of us to settle, in view of the subject presented to us, is, am I ready to hail that day with joy? for it will be a glorious day to those who are prepared to stand amid its splendors, but awful to those of us who are alive and not prepared. To which of these classes do we belong? Do any of us belong to the latter class, who will call for rocks and mountains to fall on us and hide us from the face of him who sitteth on the throne and from the wrath of the Lamb? For the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand? But you inquire, What must I do to be ready? I answer, Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved. That is, believe the record God has given of him, which embraces pardon for all your sins, resurrection out from among the dead ones, future life, a title to the kingdom of Israel restored, and earth in its restored state where it is to be enjoyed. Then repent and be baptized into the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins. Then add to your faith courage—knowledge—and to knowledge temperance, and to temperance patience, and to patience godliness, and to godliness brotherly kindness, and to brotherly kindness charity; for if ye do these things ye shall never fall, for so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. Will you comply with the conditions and thus be saved? Or will you refuse to comply and be among the lost, and if alive when this tremendous day shall burst upon thee, be compelled to exclaim, The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and I am not saved! Not saved!! O, how this will ring in thine ears! Not saved!!

I had a short but pleasant time with Mr. Baxter. He treated me like a gentleman and Christian, although we differ on some important doctrines of the Bible. He was quite urgent that I should remain in the city and preach or lecture the coming Sunday, but my ticket would not allow me to comply with his request. He also invited me to visit two of his stations in Canada and spend a week lecturing in each place. Mr. Baxter is doing good in calling the attention of the people to the soon coming of Jesus, and I bid him God speed in this all-important work. Fraternally, R. V. LYON.

THE GREATEST CHARACTER IN PROPHECY AND HISTORY.

"He shall be Great."

It was the distinguishing mark of the Jewish people that their golden age was not in the past, but in the future; that their greatest hero, as they deemed him to be, was not their founder, but their founder's latest descendant. Their traditions, their fancies, their glories, gathered around the head, not of a chief, or warrior, or sage that had been, but of a King, a Deliverer, a Prophet who was to come. Of this singular expectation the prophets were, if not the chief authors, at least the chief exponents. Sometimes He is also identified with some actual prince of the coming or the present generation; sometimes he recedes into the distant ages. But again and again, at least in the later prophetic writings, the vista is closed by his person, his character, his reign. And almost everywhere the prophetic spirit, in the delineation of his coming, remains true to itself. He is to be a King, a Conqueror, yet not by the common weapons which the prophetic order recognized, but by justice, mercy, truth, and goodness; by suffering, by endurance, by identification of himself with the joys, the sorrows of his nation, by opening a wider sympathy to the whole human race than had ever been opened before. That this expectation, however explained, existed in a greater or less degree among the prophets, is not doubted by any theologians of any school whatever. It is no matter of controversy. It is a simple and universally recognized fact that, filled with those prophetic images, the whole Jewish nation—nay, even the Eastern world—did look forward with longing expectation to the coming of this future Conqueror.

Was this unparalleled expectation realized? and here we speak only of facts which are acknowledged no less by critics and by sceptics than by theologians and ecclesiastics. There did arise out of this nation a character by universal consent as unparalleled as the expectation which had preceded him. Jesus of Nazareth was, on the most superficial no less than on the deepest view we take of his coming, the greatest name, the most extraordinary, that has ever crossed the stage of history. And this greatness consisted, not in outward power, but precisely in those qualities on which from first to last the prophetic order had laid the utmost stress—justice and love, goodness and truth.

We push this argument no further. The fact which arrests our attention is, that side by side with this great expectation appears the great climax to which the whole history leads up. It is a proof of a unity of design in the education of the Jews, in the history of the world. It is a proof that the events of the Christian dispensation were planted in this very centre of human hopes and fears. It is a proof that the noblest hopes and aspirations that were ever breathed were not disappointed; and that when "God spake by the prophets" of the coming Christ, he spake of that which in his own good time he was certain to bring to pass.—Jewish Herald.

Any one sending us a new subscriber for 1887, and the subscription price of $2.00, may select books or tracts to the amount of 75 cents from our list, and they will be sent them free, post paid. Sample copies of THE RESTITUTION furnished on application.

THE RESTITUTION.

Terms—TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

Payable in advance. Three and Six Months, three months.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the doctrine of "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

We sometimes dip a little into Versions of the Scriptures, in some of the Modern Languages for the sake of comparison. We give our readers this week the ideas suggested from some late studies in the Italian Version. While we try to examine what little we read with care we make no pretensions to being a linguist.

EDITORIAL BREVITIES.

UNLESSENED DURATION.

I feel mai non verran giammai meno.
Thy years shall never be lessened. Italian Version, Heb. i. 12.

This idiom is used of anything that can be completely reduced to nothing. When a person feels the strength is lessened to nought. So with the years of our life, if they be lengthened to four score years, yet life "soon passeth over and we vanish away." In our life each year lessens the term of our brief being. God is "from everlasting to everlasting." Neither years nor ages lessen the duration of his existence. Of man's life the Psalm says, "passing," of ourselves, when dying, it says "we vanish away;" vanish "like a dream." Of God alone can it be said that "He inhabits eternity."

UNFAILING PROMISES.

Avendo fatto ragione che Iddio era potente eziandio da suscitarlo da morti.
Having made a reasoning that God was powerful even to raise him from the dead. Italian Version. Heb. xi. 19.

God had made a solemn covenanted promise with Abraham that he should have a son, and through that son a multitudinous posterity. The son was born according to promise, and right in the bloom of youth God commands Abraham to sacrifice him as a burnt-offering, and thus reduce the child of promise to ashes. Abraham might, like Job, have patiently said, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." This would have been submissiveness, but it would not have been faith. Abraham knew that it was the same God, who had made the promise, that commanded the death of Isaac, that God was unchangeably true, and almighty in power. So the Father of the Faithful reasoned out that God would raise Isaac from the dead. Let us have the faith that God, who could have raised Isaac from the ashes, will raise his children from the dust. Faith has its sublimities, and the crown of sublimities was reached by Abraham.

PAUL'S MINISTRY.

From lessons delivered to the churches of God in Christ Jesus by Paul, as an able minister of the New Covenant, we have learned that the Sinaitic covenant "lettered and engraven upon stones," was "done away in Christ;" that it "waxed old and vanished;" that Sabbaths and all other holy days were but shadows. But as line is sometimes reached upon line, and precept upon precept, we will attend further to his instructions upon the weekly, monthly and annual days, as well as upon the Sabbatical years. In his epistle to the Galatians he vividly contrasts the vassalage of Israel, under the covenant given from Mount Sinai, with the liberty of the children of God, who are such by their faith in Christ Jesus, and by being baptized into him. In our present article we will follow the course we took in our last—give several versions of a passage having the central place in our argument.

This Scriptural quotation, thus rendered by different ones, is Gal. iv. 9, 10: "But now since ye know God, or rather are known by him, why are ye turning back again to those weak and beggarly elements, to which ye are desirous of becoming slaves as before; and are observing days, and months, and times and years?" Conybeare & Howson render this: "But now, when you have gained the knowledge of God,—or rather, when God has acknowledged you,—how is it that you are turning backwards to those childish lessons, void both of strength and blessing? Would you seek again the slavery which you have outgrown? Are you observing days and months, and seasons, and years?" Blacknight translates: "But now, having acknowledged God, or rather, being acknowledged of God, why turn ye back again to the weak and poor elements, to which again, from the first, ye incline to be in bondage? Ye carefully observe days, and moons, and seasons, and years."

Bloomfield, in a critical note in his Greek Testament, thus renders vs. 10: "So then ye observe days, and months, and times and years!" No proof is needed to show, that by days here, Paul means the weekly Sabbaths, other than a reference to vs. 24 of this same chapter; and, indeed, nothing else can be meant; for the Sabbath day is the only day in the covenant from Mount Sinai, which, the apostle says, was "bearing children unto bondage." R. V. It will be, however, more satisfactory to some, that we give learned authority. Accordingly we make some references; and first to Bloomfield, who says: "ἡμέρας (days) refers to the Sabbaths; μῆνας to the novilunial festivals; and ἐνιαυτους to the Sabbatical and Jubilee years, passover, etc. By καιρους (times) are supposed to be designated the stated festivals. Παρατηρεῖσθε here signifies to superstitiously observe, by scrupulously distinguishing certain days from other days. It properly signifies to keep the eye fixed upon (κατα) any person or thing, so as to watch the former, or attend to and observe the latter."

Conybeare & Howson, in foot-notes, say of days, "Sabbath-days, compare Col. ii. 16;" of months "The seventh months;" of seasons, "The seasons of the great Jewish feasts;" and of years, "The Sabbatical and jubilee years." Macknight says, "By days the apostle means the Jewish weekly Sabbaths; by moons, (or months), their new moons; by seasons, their annual festivals; and by years, their Sabbatical years and jubilees."

As the days, spoken of by the apostle in this place, can refer to nothing but the weekly Sabbaths, and as these weekly Sabbaths were enjoined upon Israel in that covenant made at Mount Sinai with the nation, as "a sign between God and the children of Israel," and as it is our special object to learn the instructions of the apostle to the Gentiles as regards this old covenant, and its instituted sign,—the Sabbath,—we will now attend to his teaching concerning this apostle covenant, in a subsequent part of this chapter, to see whether the piquant censures he employed—chap. iii. 1—when he called the observers of "days, moons, seasons, and years," "foolish and bewitched," were deserved or not.

In order that our readers may compare translations we will give Conybeare & Howson's translation of the verses to which we refer. "Tell me, ye that desire to be under the Law, will you not hear the Law? For therein it is written that Abraham had two sons; one by the bond-woman, the other by the free. But the son of the bond-woman was born to him after the flesh; whereas the son of the free woman was born by virtue of God's promise. Now, all this is allegorical; for these two women are the two covenants: the first given from Mount Sinai, whose children are born into bondage, which is Hagar (for the word Hagar signifies Mount Sinai in Arabia;) and herein she answers to the earthly Jerusalem, for she continues in bondage with her children. But [Sarah is the second covenant, which is in Christ, and answers to the heavenly Jerusalem; for] the heavenly Jerusalem is free and is the mother of us all."

To make the points of comparison in this allegory a little plainer to our readers we will add Macknight's translation and paraphrase of verses 22-25, "For it is written that Abraham had two sons; one by the bond-maid, and one by the free woman. But he verily, who was of the bond-woman, was begotten (κατα) according to the flesh; but he who was of the free-woman, (δια) through the promise. Which things are an allegory; for (αιται) these women are the two covenants: the one, verily, from Mount Sinai, bringeth forth children into bondage, which is Hagar, (το γαρ Αγαρ, for the name Hagar denotes Mount Sinai in Arabia), and she answereth to the present Jerusalem, and is in bondage with her children."

Now for the paraphrase: "For it is written in the law, that Abraham, the father of the people of God, had two sons; one by the bond-maid Hagar, and one by the free-woman, Sarah, his wife. But he, verily, who was of the bond-maid, was begotten of the natural strength of his parents, and being born a slave had no title to inherit his father's estate; but he who was born of the free-woman, was begotten through the strength supernaturally communicated to his parents by the promise, 'Lo, Sarah thy wife shall have a son,' and like his mother being free, was his father's heir. Which things, concerning the sons and wives of Abraham, and the power by which these sons were begotten, and the state into which they were born, are an allegory. For these women, as the mothers of Abraham's children, are types of the two covenants, by which men become the church and people of God. The one is that, verily, which was given from Mount Sinai, which made Abraham's posterity by Isaac only the visible church and people of God, and bringeth forth its children into bondage to the Law; which covenant is fitly represented by Hagar, who brought forth her son Ishmael into bondage."

It is obvious enough from Paul's teaching in this chapter, and in the whole epistle to the Galatians, that the covenant of the ten commandments, made with Israel at Sinai, with its weekly Sabbaths, was a covenant fitted only for a fleshly nation in pupilage and bondage, and that keeping the days, or Sabbaths, enjoined by this covenant, was a badge of the bondage to which Israel was temporarily subjected, or till the "Seed should come to whom the promise belonged." To the things promised to Abraham and this One Seed, Christ, those in Christ became heirs, because they were not slaves but in a state of sonship and therefore of heirship. Was it not "foolish," then, for the Galatians to go back to that covenant, and to keeping its "days," and thus give up the filial relation and heirship, to become bondmen without any inheritance in reversion.

We ask our brethren and readers, of the two conditions, which is preferable, as a relation, the relation of a slave or the relation of a son? Is a relation through Hagar best? or is a relation through the free-woman best? Paul tells us, just as plainly as language can tell us, that the covenant given from Mount Sinai was allegorized by Hagar, a slave woman. Her child was not an heir, neither is the heirship to the future inheritance "through the law, but through the righteousness of faith." What is wise for us to do on our part; to trust the new covenant of promise or go back to the old? The writer concludes—taking all Paul's teaching into consideration about these covenants—to cleave to the Free-woman covenant, and let Hagar and Ishmael—"the bond-woman and her son"—go adrift, as Paul advises and directs.

"The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ." Paul says of Christians, "Ye are not under law, but under grace." Although "the law is holy, and just, and good," still it dooms all to death, "for all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God." Having "become dead to the law by the body of Christ," let us walk "in the newness of life," to which we, by our faith and baptism, have been raised up. What adaptation has an Old Covenant to a New Creation? Christ is the Head and Lawgiver of the Church, and God has commanded us to "hear him."

CHRIST'S MORAL CHARACTER.

The New Testament assigns to Jesus of Nazareth a moral character of sinless perfection. Though he was a man, and, as such, had all the essential attributes of our humanity, he was, in this respect, unlike the race to which, as a man, he belonged. Paul, in alluding to him, says that he "who knew no sin," was made a sin-offering for us that "we might be made the righteousness of God in him," and also that he was "holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners." Peter says of him: "Who had no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth." Assuming his own sinlessness, Jesus said to the Jews: "Which of you convinceth me of sin?" To his disciples he said: "My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to finish his work." "And he that sent me is with me; the Father hath not left me alone, for I do always those things that please him." God, by a supernatural voice from heaven, said of him: "This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased."

Jesus, according to this testimony, was a perfectly holy being, without variation or exception, alike in his relations to God and man, and, in this respect, without parallel in the history of this world. It was in the plan of God that before entering upon his ministry, he should be the subject of a severe temptation, occurring immediately after his baptism by John the Baptist. Matthew, Mark and Luke refer to this temptation. The statement by Matthew is as follows:

"Then was Jesus led up of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted by the devil. And when he had fasted forty days and forty nights, he was afterwards a hungered. And when the tempter came to him, he said, If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread. But he answered and said, It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. Then the devil taketh him up into the holy city, and setteth him on a pinnacle of the temple, and saith unto him, If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down, for it is written, He shall give his angels charge concerning thee, and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone. Jesus said unto him, It is written again, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God. Again, the devil taketh him up into an exceeding high mountain, and showeth him all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them, and saith unto him, All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me. Then saith Jesus unto him, Get thee hence, Satan, for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve. Then the devil leaveth him, and, behold, angels came and ministered unto him."

Mark simply alludes to this temptation, while Luke describes it substantially in the words of Matthew. There has been, first and last, not a little speculation among commentators and theologians as to the exact nature and manner of this temptation of the devil. It is not important, for any practical purpose, to solve this question. The Bible does not solve it. What it states is the fact of temptation by the devil. Whatever may have been the precise mode of the temptation or trial of Jesus, the devil did not succeed in corrupting his character in the very outset of his public career. The purity of Jesus stood the test, and Satan was foiled at every point of the attack upon his virtue. It was God's design that he should be subjected to this test, since it is expressly said that "he was led up of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil."

Paul, in his epistle to the Hebrews, says that Jesus "was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin." Does the apostle in these words mean to say that he had the same susceptibility of being tempted as that which is common to the race of men, and which, unhappily, leads them to actual sin? This is a nice and speculative question in technical theology, to which the Bible gives no formal answer. Certain it is that he could be tempted; and Paul says that he "was tempted in all points like as we are." Whatever he had or had not the same degree of susceptibility to temptation that we have, it is equally certain that temptation in his case was always "without sin."

It should be borne in mind that the pure and perfect character which the Bible assigns to Jesus, was formed, and lived out, not in heaven among the angels of God, and among "the spirit of just men made perfect," but on earth, in a body of flesh and blood, and under all the outward conditions that belong to existence and residence in this world. He was human as well as divine; and, as human, he had human faculties and human susceptibilities. His mental organization was not, in this respect, different from that of other men. He lived as a man for about thirty-three years among men. What he did and said and suffered was, hence, cast in an earthly mold; and this makes his character both intelligible and appreciable by human beings. Men can understand it in its form and in its facts, since it has developed in the essential conditions that are attached to the race. The history given of his life follows him through all these conditions, with its recital of actions, sayings, and sufferings, from the moment he entered upon his public ministry to that in which he hung lifeless on the cross. The narrative is in human language, and deals with matters that are not above our apprehension.

Reading this history with a thoughtful consideration of what it contains, we have Jesus set before us in his earthly circumstances, in his relations to God and man, in his most retired intercourse with his twelve disciples, in his contact with the people at large, in his treatment of revilers and enemies, in his sympathy with the poor and the suffering, in his use of miraculous powers, in the sweetness and purity as well as the wisdom of his teaching, in his effort to persuade sinners to come to him for salvation, in the total absence of all the signs of evil and base passion, in his patience with others, in the simplicity and gentleness of his whole bearing, in the Garden of Gethsemane, in the presence of the Sanhedrim, before Pilate and Herod, and finally on the cross; and wherever we see him, and in whatever forms of suffering or action, we see one and the same character, always equal to itself, never divergent to the breadth of a hair from its own perfection, and never exhibiting anything over which a generous criticism need to cast the mantle of charity. We see in him nothing to regret, no moral mistake of any kind, nothing that can be called an indiscretion, and nothing that does not exhibit the perfume of his own perfect excellence. His ethical and spiritual maxims are not more perfect than his own personal character. He practiced what he preached, and by the former illustrated the latter.

The character of Jesus, being one of perfect harmony in all its parts, without disproportion, excess, or defect, anywhere or in anything, needs no reconstruction or readjustment, by way of addition or subtraction, to make it symmetrical, as a true expression of the great law of love. It is just right as it is, having in it neither too much nor too little of anything, and hence admits of no improvement. Jesus never shed a penitential tear, never had an occasion to do so, never felt the pang of conscious guilt, never made a confession or an apology, and never asked God or man to forgive him. He wept over the sins of others, never over his own. The Publican's prayer would not fit his lips. No history describes his parallel, and no critic ever saw a just occasion to find fault with his moral department. He is the moral wonder of the world. Infidels and cavilers have, in all ages, felt the power of his matchless character, as set forth by the evangelists in their record of his life; and no one, be he saint or sinner, philosopher or peasant, ever studied the facts as they appear in the history without being impressed with the faultless moral beauty of this most wonderful person. One will be struck with this beauty at sight; and the longer he looks the more he will see to admire.—Part of a Sermon by Samuel T. Spear, D. D., in Independent.

FRESH BIBLICAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

As we conclude the biography of Joseph, and enter upon the history of the exodus, an opportunity is offered to say a few words concerning the comparatively recent discovery of embalmed Pharaohs in a sepulcher at Dair el-Bahari, on the Nile, near Thebes. As to its bearing upon the interpretation of the Bible lessons of the second quarter, nothing has for years occurred of so much importance. Then add to this information, that obtained from the identification of Pithom as one of the "treasure cities," with its bearing on the course of the departure of the Israelites, and it is evident that some popular views must be changed.

In the summer of only last year, 1886, the mummy of Saul I., and that of his extraordinary son, Rameses II., with that of Rameses III., and that of Thotmes III., the obelisk-maker, were divested of the resinous shrouds they were buried in, and the inscriptions were read with skilled knowledge of the characters the priests had used in the funeral rites and liturgies. So now there is visible in the Museum at Cairo a long row of mummies, whose very names fill our entire imagination with amazement. There is the king who knew not Joseph; there is the father of Pharaoh's daughter, and the founder of the dynasty that dwelt in Zoan. They are dead as stones; but each "being dead yet speaketh," as plainly as did Abel.

2. Let us try to realize what is opened to the Bible-loving race of men the world over. How fantastic is the conception, yet it may be a literal fact, that we can yet look upon the lips which said to Jacob the world, "How old art thou?" Nay, we can look upon the hollow eyes where once flashed the meanness with which another Pharaoh said: "Every son that is born ye shall cast into the river." How real such revelations make these Pharaohs to become! What confirmations of Scripture are appearing, now close at hand! Over those silent graves a hundred generations of men have walked, unconscious how near they were to valuable discovery. Tourists have gossiped among the ruins of the temples at Luxor, with no suspicion that the still forms of a hundred sovereign rulers of lost ages were slumbering amid their spices just underneath the rock they trod upon. We do not have to talk about them as if they were Mars and Saturn and Jupiter and Vulcan; their story was not a pagan myth; they were real beings, and have been waiting some thousands of years in the dry sands of their own land for our service. We ought to be able to become positively picturesque and enthusiastic in teaching our classes this season. For these public characters are offering their lives as illustrations of Scripture. A great wealth of interesting information has just come to us. Domestic life as it was in the days of Joseph and the Hyksos kings, is under exhibition. Tanis is discovered; Pharaoh's little world is open as Moses and Aaron once saw it.

3. How is this? The Egyptians believed that each soul of a human being was wont to return sometime to the body it used to inhabit. They therefore embalmed the corpse speedily after death, with the view of preserving it absolutely through the eternity of years. There have been found, sculptured upon the walls of temples, certain very significant representations of their ideas on the subject. A winged insect, with a human head, is just flitting down toward the coffin-lid, underneath which is the shrouded form preserved in its spices; outside, upon the case, is painted the countenance in bold outlines, seeming just glad to give a welcome with its wide-open eyes, as it used to give.

Remember that there might be said to be almost no rain in Egypt. The Nile River gives all the moisture the fields have with its annual inundation; but this covers only the plains, the hillsides are dry always. Hence it results that when the corpses of the dead were properly embalmed, and then deposited in one of these dry receptacles of the rocks beneath the unchanging sands, they might be considered well-nigh imperishable. It need give no surprise whatsoever to us that the bodies of veritable men and women, who lived four thousand years ago, are still on the earth, unchanged in lineament and feature. Not unlikely there are countless thousands of those who saw Joseph on his throne in Egypt now lying undisturbed in their sycamore coffins, their hands on their breasts, their eyes closed, their funeral garlands still twined. And so just now, that old dreamy, dreary land, which is first and even foremost in this inspired history, has come forth into conspicuousness because of its deadness. We have lived through the ages, till, in these last few months, there is offered before the entire world a new species of logical argument, a fresh kind of evidences of Christianity.

4. It is likely that some Bible students will grow confused over the recurrence of Pharaoh's name here at such widely extended periods through the Old Testament, and also the New. It needs to be borne always in mind that "Pharaoh" was not a man's name, but the name of an office. It was like the word "Czar" among the Russians, like "Cæsar" among the Romans; it was the title of the king in all the dynasties. Scholars tell us that it is one of remote antiquity; originally it was "Per-ao," or "the Great House;" this would to the Hebrews be "Pharaoh." It is like the term "the Sublime Porte," which is in our time applied to Turkey; "the Reigning Family," as the British people would call it. Hence we must try to identify the individual with each act as the story runs along. That Pharaoh who troubled Abram so vexatiously about his beautiful wife lived and died two hundred years before that Pharaoh arose whose dreams gave Joseph such difficult problems to solve with his interpretation; and it was two hundred years more before that Pharaoh arose whom oppressions in the brickyards forced the Hebrew slaves into rebellion. Then there was another king, Rameses II., who made the Israelites still more wretched; and another still, Menephtah, who tempted God, received the ten plagues, and whose host was overthrown in the Red Sea. We must avoid confounding these men with each other now.

5. It is best not to surrender the old trusted commentaries with too much swiftness. Nothing is so perplexing to any student of Egyptian history as the absolute clashing of the highest historians. Each one can test this for himself; let him take the route of the exodus as an example, and try to settle which is right, Ebers or Brugsch, President Dawson or Edouard Naville. It is wise to hold opinions cautiously just at present, and not to be scared because great (so-called) authorities are quoted against what one says or another. Matters are so new as yet, and changes in our ideas are so revolutionary, that a fair moderation is far more becoming than any extreme stand taken suddenly.

6. The miracle of crossing the Red Sea is to come up again. Now, it is better not to insist that Pharaoh—that is, Menephtah—was really drowned; the Bible does not say so. One psalm, by an unknown writer mentions, four hundred years after it was all over, that he and his host were "overthrown;" that is all. Moses does not record it; Miriam leaves it out of her song; there is no actual proof. And on the monuments in Egypt, and in the historias found on the papyri, it is plain enough to see that Menephtah was alive some years after this catastrophe. So he was not drowned; and there are some things in connection with his succeeding history which are excellent corroborations of Scripture traits, if we do not break their force by insisting on the old view that these poetic words were meant to be exact history. Then, perhaps, the spot of crossing may turn out not to have been at Suez; Naville's book locates Pithom; and even Brugsch surrenders his own favorite theory of the Hebrews' track; and Dawson disposes of the geologic hinderance to the ancient extension of the sea. And the fact is, we might as well confess to our older scholars that we are not so certain as we used to be.

7. Looking back over the lessons of the last quarter, we discover that almost the whole of one system of life and government has been exhausted in bringing the chosen people of God into existence and organization. Joseph's story remains to be briefly studied; but Joseph was the last in the line of the patriarchs. The first quarter ends with Jacob, at the moment when he becomes Israel; the second quarter takes up in detail the story of the children of Israel. The plans for human redemption begin to grow clearer; Jehovah names his people, puts them in the foreign land of Egypt, disciplines them for some centuries, then takes them away from their bondage with tremendous miracles. He spends many years in getting them out of Canaan, then many more in getting them in again. The patriarchal dispensation yields place now to the theocratic, which in course of time will be displaced by the monarchical, when Saul comes into conspicuousness and shame. Out of all this confusion, through all these changes, infinite wisdom is working clearness, and a personal God is bringing on the apocalypse of his grace. The Bible is already opened; the creation, man's sin, death because of sin; this is resolved, and all so far is hopeless. Now God interposes; sin is partly swept away; the world has a new start in Noah. Then the Church has its beginning in the covenant with Abraham. There is hope in the near future, for the Almighty holds the world in his hands. Oh! how much a willful and wicked race like ours might have saved for themselves, if a swift obedience and a faithful love had been rendered earlier to proffers of amity and restoration, made so directly from heaven.—Charles S. Robinson, in Sunday School Times.

Publisher's Notes.

Brother J. R. Willett, of Sunset, Texas, wishes to correspond with any brethren living near Oakland, Oregon. Any brother near there please address Brother Willet as above.

Can any one give us the present address of L. C. Goodrich, formerly of Marvin, Kansas? We will be much obliged for any information as to his whereabouts.

Fathers and mothers, read the advertisements in another part of this paper of new books for the young. Remember, your child will read something, and in this day of trash in the literary world, designed specially for the young, it is the positive duty of every parent to place good books in the hands of his child.

"The Unspeakable Gift," by J. H. Pettingell, is now offered at one-half price. We have 500 copies of this work and should like to have them all taken in the next three months. This book contains absolutely conclusive proof of Life only in Christ, and as a missionary is ahead of anything published. If you do not need it yourself, don't you know a friend who could read it to good advantage? It will only cost a few cents to place it in his hands, and who can tell the good that may come of such a little effort on your part. We want to place a quantity of these books in the hands of missionary workers in this and other lands, and for this purpose will open a fund of free will gifts. Those of our friends who wish to take part in this missionary work may do so. The door is open, and though we do not urge this upon our brethren (for it should need no urging) we will just say, the privilege is yours.

THE UNSPEAKABLE GIFT.

A fund of free will donations toward the above named work to mission workers in the Melinder lands.

A PRESENT HELP.

There is never a day so dreary,
But God can make it bright;
And unto the soul that trusts him,
He giveth songs in the night.

There is never a path so hidden,
But God will show us the way,
If we seek for the Spirit's guidance,
And patiently wait and pray.

There is never a cross so heavy,
But the all-hearted hands are there,
Outstretched in tender compassion,
The burden to help us bear.

There is never a heart that is broken,
But the loving Christ can heal;
For the heart that was pierced on Calvary,
Doth still for his people feel.

There is never a life so darkened,
So hopeless and so unblest,
But may be filled with the light of God,
And enter his promised rest.

There is never a sin or sorrow,
There is never a care or a loss,
But that we may carry to Jesus,
And leave at the foot of the cross.

What more can we ask than he's promised?
And we know that his word cannot fail;
Our refuge when storms are impending,
Our help when temptations assail—

Our Savior, our Friend, our Redeemer,
Our portion on earth and in heaven:
For he who withheld not his own Son,
Hath with him all things freely given.

"THE VALLEY OF THE SHADOW OF DEATH."

Few there are who have not been familiar from their childhood with the twenty-third Psalm,—one of the simplest and sweetest of sacred songs. With advancing years it loses none of its charm, and when the heart is pious, that spiritual charm increases till the latest hour. Happy they who realize the picture it presents of the Infinite God; who exercise the confidence it avows in his ever-watchful care, and experience the calm which that picture and that confidence diffuse athwart the inner being, alike in seasons of rest and in seasons of trouble. And yet a part of the Psalm, we more than suspect, is commonly misunderstood, namely, the fourth verse; and as any misapprehension of its meaning mars the essential beauty and virtue of the whole composition, we design to inquire how the words referred to should be explained. Unfortunately they have long been misinterpreted; for many years we erred in this way ourselves; and as we were thankful when their true import was discovered, perhaps others may yet join us in an humble offering of thankfulness to the great Teacher of his people for a clearer apprehension of what David meant when he formed the lines.

The popular sense extracted from—rather imposed upon—the words is certainly pleasing; the picture drawn is touching, and marvellously suggestive. The picture is that of a saint passing through the night of death, in his mysterious journey from time into the unseen world, and upheld in the perilous transition by the gracious presence of him who is the friend of his people in all conditions, especially in what is supposed to be the greatest crisis in their history—leaving earth and entering the blissful climes. "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for Thou art with me," etc. Millions have died in that faith, based on these words; and millions are now cheered, or profess to be cheered, by them, as understood, in prospect of their exit, be it near or remote, from amid the scenes of time. But the words in that view are, as we shall attempt to show, entirely misunderstood; in fact, they are compelled to express what their author never intended them to convey. In their case, as too often, the wine—the conceptions of heathenism—has been poured into Scriptural bottles,—that is, words dictated by the Holy Spirit, whence the truth had been emptied that vein fancies might occupy its room.

Indeed, strange though it may appear to certain readers, the words have no necessary reference to dying at all; and yet death has been imagined to form their central thought. The very position they occupy in the hallowed poem might have suggested the idea that death, as an event sooner or later to enter into his experience, was not before the Psalmist's mind when the hymn was composed. Had it been so, one would naturally suppose the reference to it would fittingly and dramatically have ended the song, as the act itself would determine his career. But it stands in the middle of it, preceded by a narration of enjoyed and expected blessings, and followed by a narration of similar and invaluable privileges. The reasonable presumption, therefore, is that this fearing no evil when in "the valley of the shadow of death" is just one other blessing, expressed in highly metaphorical terms, which he expected in life, and perhaps often in life, to be journeyed along the path Divine Providence had marked out for his feet to travel. The whole Psalm is a record of blessings, and as the lot of man has sorrows and gladnesses, trials and deliverances, is it unnatural to infer that comforts looked for in the day of perplexity would be alluded to as well as the "green pastures," and the "still waters," with which he had been pleasantly familiar? This is the spirit of the song, and the key to the verses which has been so diverted from its native significance.

In all languages light and darkness, sunshine and shade, are common figures, or symbols, for joy and grief, prosperity and adversity. Everything is bright, we remark, under such a roof; in the hour of bereavement, a dark cloud, we are wont to say, has fallen on another abode, where but lately gloom, or care, was unknown. Drawing the blinds, which produces literal shade, is indicative of grief within a dwelling; or is a token of sorrow at some one's passage to the tomb, and sympathy with those who mourn for their friends.

To describe extreme affliction—core anguish of mind—the approach of despair or something like that, the Hebrews summoned, as a matter of course, the most significant figures with which their observation and experience made them acquainted. These were borrowed mainly from their obvious and unperverted notions of death, and their estimate of its inevitable and disastrous results to him who fell under its blow. As to some things they may have welcomed illusions, but assuredly death was not one of them. They saw the stern reality in its case, as their descriptions of what they held it to be so plainly indicate. To them death was the terrible king. It removed the generations of mankind into the blackness of darkness, where silence and ignorance, in fact, unconsciousness, absolutely prevailed. For the present, it will be enough to quote but a few descriptive lines by the author whose words we are attempting to unravel. He affirms (Psa. vi. 5), "In death there is no remembrance of Thee: in Sheol (the grave) who shall give Thee thanks?" "Lighten mine eyes, lest I sleep the sleep of death" (Psa. xiii. 3). Thus agreeing with Moses, the man of God, "Thou turnest man to destruction" (Psa. xc. 3); with Job (e. g. chapters iii. and vii.); and with Hezekiah—"the grave (those committed to the dust) cannot praise Thee.....The living, the living, he shall praise Thee, as I do this day" (Isa. xxxviii. 18, 19). And so in those ancient times other godly men and other inspired men speak of death, when its appalling gloom invites their utterance. To them nothing was so repulsive, so ghastly, so depressing as death. It withdrew their loved ones from the sweet light of day into a realm where no voice cheered their solitude, where no praise ever rose to heaven, where no morning beam ever fell on their eyelids. To join them was the dreariest of prospects, at which we need not wonder, for "life and immortality" were yet in the womb of a distant futurity. As a consequence, they were "through fear of death"—"all their life-time subject to bondage" (Heb. ii. 15); intimating that they spent their days overshadowed by an angel of darkness who at any moment might execute his tremendous mission; whom no tears could soften; and from whose poisoned weapon escape there was none.

Again and again all over the earlier Scriptures the imagery of death, viewed as a terror and an unrelieved gloom, is employed to depict with most graphic power, intense anxiety, and peril, and woe, either endured at the moment or expected to arrive without delay. Jeremiah describes the wilderness through which the twelve tribes wandered as "a land of drought and of the shadow of death" (ii. 6)—a scene of danger, and privation, and awful judgments; Job speaking of the day of his birth, desires that "darkness and the shadow of death" may "claim it as their own" (iii. 5); the princely Psalmist, enduring "the oppression of the wicked," thus exclaims, "My heart is sore pained within me, and the terrors of death (the greatest terrors) are fallen upon me" (lv. 4); in another ode (Psa. cvii. 10), he speaks of "such as sat in darkness and in the shadow of death; being bound in affliction and (meaning, as with) iron, because they rebelled against the word of the Most High;" speaking of the unclean and murderers, whose congenial element is where no light shines, Job (xxiii. 17,) has these words:—"The morning is to all of them as the shadow of death," since to them the dawn is abhorrent being unfavorable to their crimes; the same penetrating intellect declares that the Almighty "discovereth deep things out of darkness; and bringeth out to light the shadow of death," or what lies concealed beyond mortal discovery. The Lord, according to Jeremiah, can disappoint ungodly men who presumptuously look to him for light, that is relief, or a providential interposition on their behalf, by turning it—the light they expect—"into the shadow of death," and making it "gross darkness;" that is, by permitting calamities to fall thickly upon their heads (xiii. 16). To mention but one instance more, Zacharias speaks of the infant John as one intimately connected with the Messiah who was soon to appear, and in his person to be the "dayspring from on high—to shine upon them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death" (Luke i. 78, 79),—that is, on those who had agitated thoughts regarding their own salvation, and had wearied, and wearied long, for the advent of the royal Christ, in whom their personal and national hopes were centered.

Surely it cannot be difficult now to reach the meaning of the words before us:—"Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil," etc. The valley of the shadow of death is a defile shrouded in darkness—darkness black and dismal as death's shadow, or as death itself; which to the Old Hebrew thinkers appeared to be the embodiment of all that was hideous and repellant. Than a "valley" other figures, as will yet be seen more clearly, might have been chosen by the speaker, who was a poet as well as a saint, to give expression to his mind. He might have said, for example, when I am in a dungeon lurid as the shadow of death—sunless as the grave, "I still fear no evil;" or, when I am in the furnace of trial, I will endure the ordeal with uncomplaining submission, dreading no injury, for help will be near; but nothing could be finer, than the imagery preferred, which would occur most naturally to the genius of one who had been a shepherd in his youth, and had passed with his flock through the narrow ravines, flanked by towering, precipitous rocks, while the storm was howling, and thunder booming overhead.

As explanatory of the clause "the shadow of death," the Revision Version has this note on the margin,—"Or, deep darkness (and so elsewhere);" and thus what has already been advanced by us as its import is confirmed by excellent authority. Walking through the valley spoken of, then, is not equivalent to this—"When I am dying"—for "deep darkness" may be gone through oft and again during life's chequered pilgrimage, as the memorials of the godly abundantly testify. This happens to be confirmed by the very language,—"When I walk through the valley," etc.,—because saints, though they pass through trials, and from one trial to another, go into death, not through it, as if it were a door opening into a better world. Strictly speaking, death is not like walking, an affair of voluntary motion at all; it is an event in which the subject is necessarily passive; in other words, it is nothing less than the arrestment and suspension of life, and, by consequence, of its varied functions. To go through death alive—to die, and yet not to die—may please, and it will please those only who are satisfied with fables and contradictions. Nothing can be more unambiguous than the voice of inspiration,—"Thou turnest man to destruction;" and though an unenviable fate, it is incumbent on the pious meekly to accept the destiny assigned them, in hope of revival by the Savior's resurrecting fiat when he descends in glory.

After what has been evolved, it need hardly be written by our pen that this "great darkness"—darkness deep as the shadow of death—symbolizes, when properly understood, grievous affliction of body or mind, perhaps of both conjoined. The sainted speaker does not refer to any particular tribulation; this quality, however, he presupposes in the visitation—it must be unusual and severe. It may be of such a kind as Job underwent, at once crushing, and complex, and long continued; into which accumulation of trouble entered the loss of his children, and property, and health, along with unwarranted suspicions of his piety, the cruel branding of his unstained name with hypocrisy, and the apparent—it was only apparent—indifference of the Almighty, who is likewise the All-Merciful, to his agonies and prayers, which pierced him even more than the deprivations and corporeal affliction he had to endure. It may be some, purely mental anxiety—trouble of soul—a path of duty at a critical season hard to determine; an eclipsing of the hope of heaven that once was so assured; deep distress over the insensibility as to eternal interests shown by the giddy millions, especially by the sufferer's kindred and friends among them; a term of doubt as to the validity of the promise that he who left the world some eighteen hundred years ago would some again; a terrible conflict between the flesh and the spirit—between the supremacy of truth and the demon of skepticism, that threatens to leave one consecrated to Christ down-trodden in the dust, and a prey to despair; or finally, though many conceivable cases might be added, it may be with some disciple the hour and the power of relentless persecution. Before the captive for the testimony of Jesus is the scaffold or the stake, and the anguish of wife and children because of the cruelties he has borne and must bear, piercing his heart with all but intolerable throes—suggesting, it may be, wild questionings as to the prudence of his persistence in defying authorities that hold him in bonds: out of which diversity of vision and reflection comes over his faculties darkness—peradventure a "horror of great darkness"—transient though terrific distress, which might number him among the cowards and apostates, if it did not unhinge his brain, were there no comfort to bear him up and on through the tempest that has burst on his head. But in any such approach of distress there is mighty comfort for the sons of men, and David knew well where it lay. "I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me." His own experience warranted him so to speak; and in all future trials, however great, he intended to exercise the same trust, assured that the infinite Deliverer would not fail him in the hour of need. It might be dark, but the Lord who had redeemed him in his mercy, was close at hand, and could turn "the shadow of death into the morning." Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh at the break of day. Why did this saint speak thus confidently—"I will fear no evil?" Simply because God had promised never to forsake his own, and he was one of the number. To all in trouble, in adversity, in temptation, his counsel and assurance has constantly been—"Who is among you that feareth the Lord, that obeyeth the voice of his servant? He that walketh in darkness and hath no light, let him trust in the name of the Lord, and stay upon his God" (Isa. l. 10). In every position is it not seemly—is it not grand to trust in his faithfulness and might? "If God be for us, who can be against us?" Having that trust—that child-like confidence in infinite love and ability to do for his people what is best for them, and best for the accomplishment of his divinest ends, come what may, they are under an unfailing shelter, their wants shall be relieved, their griefs consoled, their energies upheld, their final victory over sin, and Satan, and death, made certain. "Many sorrows shall be to the wicked: but he that trusteth in the Lord, mercy shall compass him about" (Psa. xxxii. 10).

Dear Restitution:

Yesterday was a happy day to our company of believers. No excitement, no series of meetings in progress. Last February seven discourses had been delivered by Brother Prosser and myself. For several years the gospel had been proclaimed in our vicinity by Brother Prosser and at times by myself and others. At times bitter prejudice existed in this vicinity as well as in other parts of Oregon. I and a part of the brethren had passed through the turmoil and contention resulting from a union with, and withdrawal from the Christadelphians. But yesterday was a bright day for the cause. More of heaven's bright rays of hope, more to encourage than had been given us during the twelve years that we have been in Oregon. Yet there were only sixt Those who gather multitudes under their denominational names, by the religion of the nerves, might be ready to sneer at our rejoicing, because six earnest believers were obedient. Only six! How indeed compared with the numbers that ought to believe and obey the Lord. But six souls are worth more, much more, than six worlds; of how much more value then the labors of six years!

In my discourse, "What is Truth?" I maintained that the truths essential to obedience are repeated many times in the Scriptures in direct terms, and that growth relates to details. Important principles: One God the Father; Christ the Son of God; the Spirit of God, Omnipresent, creative and upholding, King of kings only hath immortality; the wages of sin is death; the gift of God is eternal life; Christ will come again the second time; life and immortality then; the meek shall inherit the earth; the Lord God shall give unto Christ the throne of David; he shall reign over the house of Jacob; the twelve apostles shall sit on twelve thrones and judge the twelve tribes of Israel; the saints will live and reign with Christ; in Abraham and his seed all the nations of the earth will be blessed; faith and repentance prerequisite to obedience; immersion; life of Christian virtue or growth in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, for we must add to our faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge; a growth in knowledge, as well as Christian purity from new-born babes, fed on the sincere milk of the word unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ unto a perfect man.

After the discourse Brother Prosser immersed the following brethren: W. W. Jaqueth, Edgar Hunt and wife, Edwin and Urial Groat and Charles Brooks. Principally through the labors of Brother Prosser and by months of independent investigation, they had been convinced that the gospel of the kingdom must be believed and obeyed. After immersion eight brethren met at Brother E. E. Brooks' house to break bread. Two or three others that are "of us" were not able to be present. We expect others to obey. Some half dozen of the Christadelphian brethren withhold themselves from our company. Why should they? Surely the Church of God and the Christadelphians agree on the facts of the faith. They differ on "how" and "when" rather than on what the Lord will do for his people.

W. L. SKEELS.

P. S. Since writing the foregoing Brother Trudell has come to my house and requested me to attend the immersion on next Sunday of his daughter Ida, aged 18, who is sick with consumption. It will be necessary to prepare a box or tank and immerse her at her home. This calls up vividly, events of the past. Three years ago last fall, my oldest son, then aged 16 and in the first stage of consumption, was baptized in a tank of water prepared for the occasion; fit emblem of his final burial in his grave by kind friends last January, at San Diego, Cal., and that rising to walk in newness of life, perfect figure of that new life—which we hope shall be his—to which the obedient faithful ones will arise when the trumpet shall sound and the dead shall be raised incorruptible. A little over two years ago Sister Schmeltzer, far advanced in consumption was immersed in the same tank. She, too, has been laid away in the silent tomb to await his coming and kingdom.

Love One Another.

Love now. Do not, I pray you, do not wait to love one another until death has taken the loved one, but give the heart of love today, speak the encouraging, sympathizing word now, while it is so much needed, while the burdens of life are heavy, while pain and disappointment are our portion. There are so many lives we might brighten, so many hearts be made lighter if we could always remember the beautiful golden rule of "Love one another." It should not be hard work for the child of God to speak kindly to their fellow men; for we have all felt the power of a smile when heavy-hearted, of a caress or pitying word when weary or racked with pain. "If my friends have any white flowers of love and beauty preserving for my funeral, O bring them and lay them beside me now, to cheer my life instead of decorating my coffin lid. "Post mortem kindnesses do not cheer those upon whom they are bestowed. Flowers on the coffin waft no fragrance backward over the weary days." Open your alabaster boxes of love and tenderness today, do not keep them sealed for the dead, but anoint them beforehand for their burial. "The things you mean to say when they are gone, say before they go." Better far to show your appreciation for them with loving care at home, than for the world to gaze at your tears and moans of lost opportunities as you stand at their open graves.

"If I should die tonight,
My friends would call to mind with loving thought
Some kindly deed the icy hand had wrought;
Some gentle word the frozen lips had said;
Errands on which the willing feet had sped.
The memory of my selfishness and pride,
My hasty words, would all be put aside;
And I should be loved and mourned tonight."

"O friends, I pray tonight,
Keep not your kisses for my dead, cold brow,
The way is lonely; let me feel them now.
Think gently of me! I am travel-worn,
My tempted feet are pierced with many a thorn.
Forgive, O hearts unstirred, forgive, I plead,
When dreamless rest is mine, I shall not need
The tenderness for which I long tonight."

Looking for Home.

I am looking beyond this abode of strife,
With its burden of tears and sighs,
To the far away realms of eternal life,
Where the sunsplit of glory rises
Where a star-jeweled canopy of cloudless blue
Is wrapped round the vaulted dome,
And the faces of angels are smiling through
The portals of home, sweet home.

I am looking away to the sun-lit hills,
With their chaplets of summer bloom,
Where the fair-tinted orphans the meads are filled
With a nameless and strange perfume;
The love-birds carol their wild, sweet lays
Where the palm in its grandeur swings,
And the skies are aflame through the long, bright days,
With the glitter of seraph wings

I am looking away to the mansions fair,
With their turrets that pierce the blue,
Gem-starred and radiant with beauty rare
That blushes the eyes through.
The jasper sea with its crests appears
Where the weary of earth shall rest,
And the glow of a thousand dazzling spheres
Seems mirrored upon its breast

I am looking away till the day star brings
Its promise of glad release—
Till the rose-tipped fingers of morning flings
Her banner upon the sky.
I heed not the scourge of the tempest's wrath,
I reck not the surges foam,
For beyond the sad vistas of sin and death
I am looking for home, sweet home.

In a cemetery a little white stone marked the grave of a dear little girl, and on the stone were chiseled these words: "A little girl of whom her playmates said, "It was easier to be good when she was with us."

What a beautiful life that little girl must have lived to have her little playmates say that of her! Dear children, it is your privilege to make your lives beautiful by kind words and deeds, and to help others to be good.

Given Back from the Sea.

A night-scene of shipwreck off the ragged bluff of Dynmouth, England. A foreign vessel, tossed in a fearful storm, has just cleared the rocks by Lunday Island Light, only to be driven into Bristol Channel, and dashed to pieces on the shores of North Devon. Summoned by the signals of distress, the sailors and fishermen of Dynmouth and their families gathered on the beach, some to gaze and mourn, some to attempt a rescue. Among them stood the widow Carew and her only son Will. But a few months before, the husband and father in his fishing-boat had been lost on the same awful sea that now raged before them. The cry is now for one more volunteer, the life-boat crew is almost complete—only one more!

"May I go, mother?" says Will Carew. He is a mere lad, but he is brave and strong. The mother's heart in its agony cried, "No, no!" How could she give up all that was left to her? Almost with the wailing of Jacob her love resisted the sacrifice. "Joseph is not, and ye will take Benjamin away!" But that humble woman was a noble Christian. She remembered him who walked upon the sea—who gave his life for the world—and her lips uttered no refusal.

"Go, Willie," she said; "there is no one else to go. Almighty God can bring you back to me again."

The son went to fight the terrible waves and the mother remained to pray. Heaven alone knew how greatly she had conquered. Here was humanity's finest, most pathetic victory—the grand, strong sympathy that can curb one's own suffering in the thought of the suffering of others, and for their sake.

The night and the storm passed by, and the Dynmouth life-boat had saved all the shipwrecked passengers and crew. Weary with his noble labor, brave Will Carew came back to his rejoicing mother. Her faith had its triumph—almost like that of Abraham after he had devoted Isaac to death. But the son had a story to tell. "Mother, prepare your heart to hear it. I have heard from father. He was not drowned when the squall swamped his boat. An out-bound vessel picked him up and carried him to a foreign port. He is alive—and he is one of the passengers whom we have just saved!" That moment there was a step at the door—one loud, happy cry, and the wife and long-lost husband were clasped in each other's arms.

Our greatest sacrifice prepares the way for our greatest blessing. When we lend our best treasure to a holy cause, God will see that we lose nothing. Hereafter, if not here, we shall receive back a hundredfold.—Theron Brown, in Christian Weekly.

Rising Hands.

"Why didn't you strike back, you silly thing?" Such were the words which caught my ear, and made me raise my eyes from my work, to look at a little group of my pupils who were playing near the house.

A little girl was running away as fast as she could, while the others gathered round little Amy, who was looking at her small, fat hand with a sort of indecision, and at the same time striving to repress an evident desire to cry.

Amy was a sweet little girl, the only child of a widow lady who had recently come to the village, and who attracted the respect and sympathy of all who had anything to do with her.

I waited with interest to hear the little one's reply to the question of her irritated companion, "Why did you not strike her back?"

"Because—because mother would not have kissed my hands this evening if I had struck any one." And she sobbed aloud, softly rubbing one little hand, red from the blow received. It could be seen the blow had struck the heart as much as the hand.

"Will not kiss your hands tonight! What do you mean? What a funny idea!" said the children in chorus.

"Mother always kisses them when they have not done anything naughty during the day. To give a blow would be naughty; the mother of that little girl who struck me won't kiss her hands this evening, will she?"

And Amy lifted her innocent eyes to her school-fellows' faces, while they caressed and comforted her. I went out to speak to her. Stroking her head, I said, "Will you take me to your mother, my dear?"

"Oh, ma'am," cried all the other children, "if you only knew! Carrie struck Amy such a blow, just because she refused to go with her. Wasn't it bad?" Of course I admitted it was very bad, and then went with my little conductor to her mother. I related the garden scene to her, and begged her to enlighten me as to what the child had said.

The mother smiled, replying, "Perhaps it is childish on my part, but ever since she was a tiny baby I have liked to kiss her little hands, as well as her rosy lips. I used to put the little palm on my mouth and kiss it till she smiled. I have continued this habit. Every night on undressing her, if I omit to kiss her hands, Amy knows that they were not clean from some naughtiness. It they had been raised in anger against her nurse or some little friend, mother could not kiss them. And this was a very serious matter to my darling, I assure you. And the same with her lips; if, knowingly, a bad word escaped them, or if in the course of the day my dear child had told an untruth, I could not kiss her lips. I always kissed her forehead and cheeks, but she cared much more for my kisses on her lips and hands. Little by little the offences disappeared, and every evening she would say, 'Clean hands, mother? clean hands! Mother can kiss baby tonight!' And even now that she is five years old, I continue the practice, because I think it helps her to become good.

"I much desire that my little Amy should grow in truth and kindness, and that every word and act should be pure, and I rejoice if, by the kisses of her mother, God has given me a means of education pleasing to him. And I mean to follow the same plan until my child is old enough to walk alone under God's eye."

So, thanks to the prospective reward, the blow had not that day been returned, and the rosy lips had abstained from hard words.

Dear mothers, are you thus leading your children in the paths of goodness?

EXPLANATION OF LABEL MARKS.

Some having complained that they do not know what the marks on labels mean, we will just say, "Jay" means January, and when it is followed by a figure "6" and reads "Jay6" it means your subscription expired the first day of January, 1886. "Feb" February, "Mar" March, "Apr" April, and "May" are well understood, but "Jun" meaning June seems to confuse some, and to be taken to mean January. "Jun" means June. "Jul" is July, "Aug" August, "Sep" September, "Oct" October, "Nov" November, and "Dec" December. The figure following the month stands for the year, "1" means 1881, "2" means 1882, etc. A postal card of inquiry will bring you any information you wish.

MIDNIGHT THOUGHTS.

'Tis night, and silence reigns around,
Life's troubles* officers sunk to rest,
The storm subsided into calm,
And man with grateful quiet blest.

I guess around; not form of life,
Nor thing of motion meets mine eye,
Nor murmuring voices stir the air,
Nor discourse laugh, nor sorrowing sigh.

Yet am I not alone; my soul
With you pale moon, each solemn star,
Mysterious converse seems to hold,
For holy faith brings nigh their far.

Not all more, for hosts nor
Around the realms their vigils keep:
And angel-sentinels all night
Watch o'er my wakening and my sleep.

Indeed, not all alone. Then yield,
My spirit to no vain alarms:
Above is shielding Deity;
Beneath the everlasting arms.

Paternity, Genealogy, Nature and Character of Jesus, in the Light of the Covenants; being two Lectures, with some Additions, Delivered at Wyoming, Delaware, by Dr. L. G. Thomas.—No. 8.

"What think ye of Christ? Whose Son is he?" Matt. xxii. 42.

Another very important testimony of Jesus is found in his conversation with Nicodemus a ruler of the Jews, who came to Jesus by night. Jesus said to him, "God so loved the world, that he gave his ONLY begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him, should not perish, but have everlasting life. * * He that believeth on him is not condemned: but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only BEGOTTEN Son of God." John iii. 9–18. Here Jesus teaches the necessity of understanding and believing in him, both as the Son of man and Son of God—the only begotten Son of God in order to be born again by water and Spirit as he had just told Nicodemus; who asked him the question, How shall these things be? It was in answer to this question, how shall these things be? that Jesus said these words. Nicodemus evidently supposed that Jesus was then about to set up his kingdom; and naturally enough, desired to have his rulership over the Jews continued under Jesus in the kingdom. Jesus knowing his thoughts proceeded at once to set him right. He told him he could not enter the kingdom of God which was ultimately to be set up by him, and become a ruler in it, without first being again born—born from above; explaining that the new birth consisted in being born of water (by faith and baptism) and of Spirit (at the resurrection) and thus becoming Spirit—a Spirit being; and so prepared to be a ruler in the kingdom of God. This was the same as was taught by Paul, a few years later, when he said, "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, and therefore we must all be changed from flesh and blood to Spirit, the image of the heavenly." 1 Cor. xv. 42–55. Jesus continued by showing him in answer to his question, how shall these things be? that in order to be born again, of water and Spirit, it was necessary first, before the burial and birth of water (baptism) could take place, to believe in him; not only that he "came down from heaven," (vs. 13) or that he was "a teacher come from God," as Nicodemus had acknowledged, (vs. 2) but that it was necessary to believe that he was both the Son of man (vss. 14 and 15) and the Son of God—"the only begotten Son of God;" adding, that he who does not believe it, is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the Name of the only begotten Son of God. "For there is no other name under heaven, given among men, whereby we must be saved." Acts iv. 12. "Wherefore God hath highly exalted him and given him that name which is above every name"—his Father's name. He said himself, "I am come to my Father's name." He that believeth not in that name, is condemned; just according to the great commission which Jesus subsequently gave to his disciples, commanding them to go and preach the gospel. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be condemned. To believe in that name—Jesus, the Son of man, and only begotten Son of God—is the same as to believe the gospel, which consists in the glad tidings—"the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the NAME of Jesus Christ." Acts viii. 5–12. We see therefore, that Jesus set Nicodemus right by showing him that the kingdom of God was not to have flesh and blood rulers, but rulers with a Spirit nature, and therefore he must be born again in order to inherit it and be a ruler in it; and hence that the kingdom was to be a thing of the future. He also showed him that in order to be born again with a new nature, he had not to enter his mother's womb, as he suggested, but that it was to be accomplished by faith—by believing in him and being baptized, thus being born of water, or regenerated in mind, resulting ultimately in the completion of the Spirit birth when his flesh and blood nature should be changed to the divine nature—Spirit substance. He said, "that which is born of Spirit is Spirit." He thus taught him that the new birth consisted in being changed from a flesh and blood being to a Spirit being. That cannot be until those who have been begotten by faith in Christ shall be born from the dead, by the Spirit, at the resurrection. Then they will be prepared to be rulers—"kings and priests"—in the kingdom under Christ. He showed him that the process by which he could be thus changed to a new creature—a Spirit being like God, "who is a Spirit," and so fitted for a ruler; which process he called being born again—from above—begins by faith in him, in his Name as before shown. "In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might LIVE through him." 1 John iv. 9. And this is LIFE eternal, that they might know thee the only true God and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself; he that believeth not God, hath made him a liar; because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son. And this is the record that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. * * That which was from the beginning (the word with God) which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the word of life, (the word made flesh—God's Son) for the life was manifested, and we have seen it, * * that eternal life which was with the Father (as the Word, Logos, or power.) These things have I written unto you that ye might believe on the Name of the Son of God." 1 John i. 1, 2; v. 10. There are thousands who really suppose they believe in Christ but do not. There are many who really suppose and think they believe in Jesus, who do believe some of the things in the word concerning him, but who reject other things just as important and even more so, and who therefore do not believe in him.

I understand that when Jesus was here in the days of his flesh, he was the perfect representative of his Father, in Name, Spirit, mind, character, power and purpose; and therefore in all these respects, even then, he and his Father were one; as he himself said; but not one in person or being. The body alone is not the person, neither is the mind alone the person; but a person is a being with both body and mind. Hence they were and are two persons or Beings, Father and Son. Jesus was therefore in all other respects, God, as he was called. But at his resurrection he became God as to his physical nature, or the substance of his body. The flesh of David, of which he was made, was changed to Spirit-substance or Divine Nature. So that now, ever since then; he is and had been, God, in the nature or substance of his body: "being the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person." Or, as the Diaglott renders it, "an exact impress of his substance;" which is evidently Spirit-substance: for it is written that God is a Spirit;" and that Jesus also is "a life-giving Spirit," or Being. Since his resurrection therefore, with a Spirit body, by which he was proved or declared to be the Son of God with Power, according to Holy Spirit; all Power being then given him, as he himself said; since that, "in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." "No one has ever seen God; (the Father); the Only-begotten Son, who is in the bosom (tender affections and purposes) of the Father, he has made him known." John i. 18—Diaglott. "He who was GOD manifested in flesh"—the Word which was with God and was God, and became flesh and dwelt among us; is now a life-giving Spirit. He is now God in all respects except in person or Being—"the God which is, and which was, and which is to come, the ALMIGHTY." Rev. i. 8, See R. V. There is ONE GOD, the Father, of whom (out of whom, Diaglott) are all things; and one Son of God; that is, one only begotten Son, ever since Jesus was born of the Virgin Mary. One "External Spirit" or Power, by which, or through the medium of which, the Divine purposes are accomplished: and being, as has been said, "that mighty influence which, radiating from the local center of personal Deity, fills all and constitutes all; and by this means is God omnipresent, because his consciousness by his Spirit is placed en rapport with every point of his creation. Had Jesus been the son of Joseph, having been begotten by the will of man—a mere man in degenerate human nature, or sinful flesh, it would have been impossible for him to have lived all his life "without sin," and he could not therefore have been qualified as an adequate Redeemer. He could not have been the "the Lamb of God without blemish and without spot." To be an adequate Redeemer he must be of the same flesh as his brethren who were doomed to death, and whom he was to redeem, that he might be capable of dying for the sins of the people; and yet so highly organized in mind as to be enabled to withstand the temptation arising through the sinful action of the organs of the flesh, being personally sinless all his life in order that he might be entitled to a resurrection from the dead unto incorruptibility or Spirit nature. Then by thus becoming a sacrifice "without blemish or spot," and by his "obedience unto death," after having been tempted in all points like as we are because of the same sinful flesh and yet without sin; having kept his body under and bringing it into subjection all his life; the great work of redemption was accomplished. "He taketh away the sin of the world."

And thus also, by his sinless life in human nature and his death on the cross, he "condemned sin in the flesh" and won eternal life in Divine nature, and opened the way of salvation to his brother man. By his sinless spotless life, his blood become "the most precious blood, as of a lamb without blemish or spot;" being the blood of the most precious being that ever lived in a flesh and blood nature. His blood is thus rendered that which "cleanseth us from all sin." A son of Joseph could not have accomplished all this: for in his years of childhood he could not have restrained and controlled the abnormal sinful action or working of the organs of the flesh—"the lusts of the flesh"—and so avoided all wrong doing—the "sin of ignorance, which ought not to be done," (Lev. iv. 1–13. Num. xv. 28) if nothing more. But Christ was "without sin," "without fault," "without spot or blemish."

What is called "sinful flesh," "sin in the flesh" etc., being nothing more nor less than the effects of Adam's sin, in the flesh; which effects consist in the unbalanced abnormal working of the organs contrary to God's original natural LAW of action, and contrary to his revealed will or law, and therefore sin; as all action contrary to his law is "transgression of the law," and therefore sin. All such unlawful action is not right, and therefore unright; and "all unrighteousness is sin." The best name for the unlawful action of the organs of the flesh, is given in the word, viz; "the lusts of the flesh." If the flesh of Christ had been free from the abnormal impulses, or lusts of the flesh, he could not have been "tempted in all points like as we are," (Heb. iv. 15) for "every man is tempted by his own lusts." James i. 14.

It was the common human sinful flesh that was under condemnation, that was condemned to be destroyed, not Jesus himself. There was something more of Jesus than mere flesh. There was a great difference between mere flesh and the wonderful being or personage called Jesus. (As great a difference as between the moving puffing powerful Steam Engine, and the material of which it is made. The material is one thing, the powerful Engine another). The one was sinful, the other—the being himself—was not sinful. "In the FLESH dwelleth no good thing." Not so Jesus. "HE did not sin." 1 Pet. ii. 22. "In HIM is no sin." 1 John iii. 5. "HE was holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners," Heb. vii. 26. "Who knew no sin," 2 Cor. v. 26. Sinful flesh was so bad, so unlawful, so wrong, so unright, so lustful, that it deserved to be judicially "condemned" to destruction, to endless nonentity, (under which condemnation it had been ever since Adam's disobedience). But not so Jesus, who had done "nothing amiss;" Luke xxiii. 41; "in whom was no sin." And yet it was absolutely necessary that HE should die—willingly and freely "lay down his life," John x. 15–17, to carry out the condemnation of sin in the flesh, and save his brother man. He needed not to die that he himself might obtain salvation—eternal life—for he had won that and become entitled to incorruptibility, or Spirit nature, by keeping the whole law in its letter and spirit—by living without sin all his life—and thus became entitled to a resurrection and change of nature, from mortal, or flesh and blood to Spirit, and to unending life. But it was necessary for him to lay down his life for or on behalf of his brethren—to "die for the world." He therefore "offered himself without fault," Heb. ix. 14; "a Lamb without spot or blemish;" 1 Peter i. 19. "He appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself." Heb. ix. 26.

Before Adam sinned, the flesh contained desires or impulses, which were proper and right. After he sinned, the natural, proper, legitimate impulses or desires become too strong—excessive—"inordinate desire," (James i. 14, Diaglott), unnatural, i. e., as to human nature before the fall, hence unlawful, therefore "sinful." For whatever is not right, is wrong, and all moral wrong is "sin." I am not very much surprised, that some persons, if they think that Jesus personally "walked the grand corridors with God at the creation," and do not understand what is meant by "sin in the flesh," "sinful flesh," etc., nor why it is so called, nor do not perceive the difference between the mere flesh of a being, and the being himself, between the condemnation of the flesh, and the condemnation of Jesus himself; who suppose that sinful flesh means a sinful person or being: I do not much wonder that such persons should "stumble at the word"—sinful flesh, and "shudder at the idea"—the fact of its being applied to Christ in any sense, and try to make it appear that to be "in the likeness of the sinful flesh" must mean something else; that is, flesh unlike sinful flesh!!! But the meaning of the term is settled by the apostle himself. He says "part of the same." That is, as the other children of David and Solomon, his brethren, were "partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself took part of THE SAME." "Wherefore in all things it behooved him to be made like unto his brethren, Heb. ii. 14, 17. "Made of the seed of David according to the flesh," Rom. i. 3; Acts ii. 3. "Made of a woman," Gal. iv. 4. Not a word about a man.

Report of Labors.

Commenced meetings at Millbrook March 3rd, preached fifteen discourses, baptized two, and left others studying the word, being almost persuaded. This church was organized over twenty years ago by Bro. Leonard Aldrich. Bros. Peter Aldrich and Peter Decker were among the early pioneers both in the settlement of the town and church. These ever-faithful workers have fallen asleep, but the "Church of God" (it being organized under that title) has lived and grown in the blessed faith, for they are truly a strong, consistent people. THE RESTITUTION has a goodly number of warm friends at this place.

Hesperia was our next point to reach, having been earnestly requested to visit them again; we determined like Paul to visit and encourage if possible these faithful ones. It had been about eighteen months since we had been there, but March 26th found us once more going into the old familiar faces that helped us in the work of organizing the church about five years ago. Many that we had hoped to see were gone; some have fallen asleep, several others have moved away, but those left, though struggling under opposition and very many disadvantages, were true and faithful still. No church in Michigan has had as hard a struggle as this Hesperia church. Twelve miles from any railroad station, no minister of our faith among them who will work in harmony with them, not able to hire one from a distance, removals by death, others seeking to better their condition in other places, opposition, and all combined to weaken and scatter them, but God be praised, the faithful ones are just as faithful today as ever, waiting with glad expectation the coming of the King to hear the well done, thou hast been faithful over little, thy reward is ready, enter thou in.

Bros. A. N. Seymore, Brothershow and Sister King of the Christian Advent Church are with them and have rendered good service and given them much encouragement. I preached in all eight sermons, and as a result of the effort baptized ten willing souls. On Friday after the baptism we gathered in the hall for a social meeting. O, what a feast! The Spirit of the Lord was wonderfully manifest. At its close three more requested baptism, making in all thirteen who took their Master's name, being admitted into his family. May his Holy Spirit abide with them, helping them to walk in newness of life. Let us all pray for these dear ones in Northern Michigan, and may it be our motto to help the perishing. The Lord will take care of the resurrection and the heathen, but now, just now, is our chance to save men. Let us improve these golden moments. We have no time to waste, our stewardship will soon be required of us.

B. W. WOODWARD.

"The Gospel of Our Salvation and Kindred doctrines—as Life only through Christ—Nature of section of the dead—Second coming of Christ—The Kingdom of God, etc., will be faithfully preached every Sunday morning at 10:30 a. m., to which services we heartily invite the seeker after divine truth! This service will close at 11:30, after which the church will meet for conference, "breaking of bread and prayers." 176 Grand st., 2d flat floor, Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE COMING AGE,

Nature and Proximity.

—By J. P. WESTREL.—

This is a ridiculous book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, by which men disconnected are constantly being united—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the new age preparatory to a culminating period of the world's history.

Prof. Comas Aviels the product of laborious research, covering a period of more than forty years, involving much toil study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the COMING AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the clear light of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand is in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

"THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD." No. 12.

THE KINGDOM AND THE PARABLES—MATT. xiii.

In last article I dealt with the parable of the wheat and the tares, and its explanation as given by our Lord. There remain in this chapter five other parables which are given, however, without any explanation. We are, therefore, left to guess, as best we may, from the fitness of things as derived from the plainer teachings of Scripture, what that explanation is, and especially as to whether there is anything in them to warrant the idea that the kingdom is the church.

The parable of the Mustard Seed growing to a great tree is given as follows:—The kingdom of heaven is like to a grain of mustard-seed, which a man took and sowed in his field: which indeed is the least of all seeds: but when it is grown, it is the greatest among herbs, and becometh a tree, so that the birds of the air come and lodge in the branches thereof.

If we keep to the simple terms, it goes without saying that there is nothing indicated here but GROWTH from small to great—QUANTITY irrespective of QUALITY. Yet there has been imported into this parable, and that mainly from the one which follows:—that of the Leaven and the Meal—the idea of deterioration in quality, and confining it to the church in the present dispensation. In a series of "Eight Lectures on Prophecy," by W. Trotter and T. Smith, the latter has a lecture on the "predicted corruption of Christianity" in which he remarks on this parable—"When the ecclesiastical tree had grown great, and afforded comfortable shelter, without being scrupulous as to those who came for shelter—then the world would nestle in it. Then the unclean birds—the harpies, vultures, cormorants, and owls and bats, would flock beneath its branches. Behold the attractive branches of this enormous tree! its benefices and endowments, its glebes and its foundations, its livings and reversions, its dues and fees and tithes, rights (and wrongs!) episcopal and hierarchal, monastic and manorial." Now, it will be at once apparent that this category of birds of prey is purely gratuitous, and consequently imaginary; and of no avail towards an explanation of the parable.

Mr. B. W. Newton, quoted in last article, taking the parable of the sower as "fixing a character to the whole period," applies it to the present dispensation, although he does not introduce birds of prey to bear out his idea of the corruption of the church. He says, "In the fourth century, the Empire of Rome and the Church united.... It was no wonder that, under such circumstances the church should become great in the earth... Though little as the mustard-seed once, it had grown, and become a tree." He admits, however, that that greatness "is a sorrowful fact," "that it is equally plain that that greatness was neither held nor exercised according to God. Intoxicated by their exaltation, they began to speak and to write as if the millennium were already come; and appropriated to themselves not only the national blessings of Israel but even the descriptions of the New Jerusalem."

Mr. Newton then quotes, in a footnote a long paragraph from Elliott's Horæ Apocalypticæ from which I transcribe the following:—"The state of things was such, Eusebius tells us, that it looked like the very image of the Kingdom of Christ. The city built by the Emperor at Jerusalem, beside the new and magnificent church of the Holy Sepulchre—the sacred capital as it were of the new empire,—might be perhaps, he suggested, the New Jerusalem, the theme of so many prophecies. Yet again on occasion of the new church at Tyre, he expressed in the following glowing language not his own feelings only, but those, we may be sure, of not a few of the congregated Christian ministers and people who heard him, and what so many of the Lord's saints and confessors before our time desired to see and saw not, and to hear, and heard not, that behold now before our eyes! It was of us the prophet spake when he told how the wilderness and the solitary place should be glad, and the desert rejoice and blossom as the lily. Whereas the church was widowed and desolate, her children have now to exclaim to her Make room! enlarge thy borders! the place is too strait for us! The promise is fulfilling to her. In righteousness shalt thou be established; all thy children shall be taught of God; and great shall be the peace of thy children!"

This speech of Constantine is quoted by Mr. Newton to support the idea that the church, though become great in the earth, had become corrupted by connection with a worldly power. He says—"As soon as the church became linked to the Roman Empire, the glory of the nations was given to it, and was mistaken for the glory of Christ's coming kingdom. The great ecclesiastical structures of the Gentiles, in which idolatry or worldliness are hallowed, still bear the once despised names of Peter and Paul."

This notion of the ecclesiastical dignitaries of the fourth century, as thus given expression to by their new head, the Emperor Constantine, however far removed from the actual truth it is, is at least a historical fact so far as its having been entertained by Constantine and the professing church was concerned. Moreover, viewed as a historical fact, it would seem to favor an interpretation of Rev. xii. 10, by the late Dr. John Thomas. Speaking of the Pagan Power of Rome under the designation of "the Old Serpent," and its overthrow by Constantine, he says, "Hence the Spirit of God surnamed him Diabolos or the Accuser; and Satanas or the Adversary; so that when he was cast out of the government of the empire, a loud voice is represented as saying in the heavens—Now is come deliverance and power, and the kingdom of our God and the dominion of his Christ; for the Accuser of our brethren, who accuseth them before God day and night, is cast down." Elpis Israel, p. 31. Looking at this matter as it thus presents itself, it is to be noted that the "loud voice," represented as "Saying in the heavens" the words quoted, is not necessarily the voice of any party Divinely commissioned or authorized. Besides the reason given is simply of a negative kind, namely, the casting down of some person or power called "the Accuser of the brethren;" and not the manifestation of any positive prerequisite for the setting up of the kingdom of God.

Apart from the accuracy of this interpretation, there can be little doubt that this notion of Constantine is the root of the prevalent idea that the church is the kingdom.

Accepting simple growth, without deterioration as the true sense of the parable of the mustard seed, we might now look at the application of growth to the church and the kingdom respectively.

It is quite true that an institution, or rather a number of diverse institutions all claiming to be the church of Christ, have grown to considerable dimensions in the world during the last 1800 years. It might so suggested here, however, that such a diversity of conflicting claimants can hardly suit a parable which speaks of only ONE tree as representing ONE kingdom. But taking such of those institutions as have attained to the greatest dimensions, as most nearly corresponding with the parable,—do we observe any likeness to the church formed by our Lord and his Apostles? Taking Mr. Newton's view that the parable of the Sower "fixes a character upon the whole period," embraced by the parables,—What do we find? Has the good Seed—"the Word of the kingdom" any place in such institutions? The Apostles preached the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ, for at least thirty years after his ascension. Even in Rome itself, the centre of the largest of the institutions claiming to be the kingdom of Christ, about A. D. 62, Paul "dwelt two whole years in his own hired house preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ." Even before this date Paul wrote his letter to the Romans in which he said—"I thank my God through Jesus Christ for you all that your FAITH is spoken of throughout the whole world." And can it be allowed that the church of Rome of the first century, as the grain of mustard seed is to be found in its grown up counterpart of that institution which owns the supremacy of—"The Pope."

If not, how can it be said that "the kingdom of heaven" as represented by an institution destitute of the first element of Gospel truth as preached and taught by our Lord and his Apostles, and maintained by the church of Rome in the middle of the first century,—has grown from a mustard seed to be a great tree?

We come now to enquire—How does the Millennial Kingdom fit the requirements of the parable? Is there any prediction foretelling its growth from a small beginning to great dimensions? Let the Scriptures answer:—"Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even for ever." (Isaiah ix. 6, 7). Mr. Newton would have admitted that this growth of the Messiah's "government and peace upon the throne of David," is to have its beginning only at his Second Appearing, and therefore could not have objected to this as an explanation of the parable. Again:—"A stone was cut out without hands, which smote the image upon his feet that were of iron and clay, and break them to pieces. Then was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold, broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the summer threshing floors; and the wind carried them away, that no place was found for them: and the stone that smote the image became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth." Dan. ii. Here the image is destroyed by a sudden stroke inflicted by the stone, and it is only after the image is entirely destroyed that the stone becomes a great mountain. Verse 44 shows that the stone signifies the kingdom of God; and if the church is the kingdom here spoken of, as Mr. Newton contended, How can the fact be explained that so far from the church destroying the dominions represented by the various parts of the image, the Roman Empire virtually destroyed the church, by absorbing and secularizing it?

Let it be noted that the image is destroyed by the stone before the stone begins to become a great mountain. But the church so-called has already grown to great dimensions and the image is not yet destroyed. The conditions of the prophesy, therefore, cannot be fulfilled by any action of the church as representing a stone cut out of the mountain. The same truth is so far indicated in the vision seen by Daniel (chap. vii.) where the Son of Man is seen "coming in the clouds of heaven and receives dominion and glory and a kingdom that all peoples, nations, and languages, should serve him." The KINGDOM here received by the Son of Man is evidently the kingdom of Israel which shall form the nucleus of a universal dominion extending over all the nations of the earth. In the very nature of things this must involve a process of subjugation necessarily implying growth and increase. I need hardly repeat that this affords an exact parallel to the parable of the mustard seed.

The parable of the Leaven in the Meal, and the others as opportunity is afforded.

Paternity, Genealogy, Nature and Character of Jesus, in the Light of the Covenants; being two Lectures, with some Additions, Delivered at Wyoming, Delaware, by Dr. I. C. Thomas.—No. 9.

"What think ye of Christ? Whose Son is he?" Matt. xxii. 42.

But says the objector, how can it be possible that he was "made in all things like unto his brethren," if, as you say, he was far superior to any other human being in mind and character? I answer, it is a common and universal characteristic of all his brethren, that they differ in mind—in mental powers; one being naturally far superior to any other in mental powers. No two of them ever having been exactly alike in mental organization. Therefore if Jesus had not been made with this same mental characteristic of a different mind, he would not have been "made like unto his brethren in all things." The difference between Jesus and his brethren did not consist in a different kind of flesh, nor a different nature, but in the peculiar wonderful and powerful organization of the mental and moral, or spiritual ORGANISM, or mind—the result of his Spirit-begettal. Hence herein is no inconsistency. In mind he was a God. "GOD was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself." The Father-Spirit or God in him was veiled by "his flesh." Heb. x. 20. His Godly character was the result of the action or workings of that mental organism which was supernaturally produced by Holy Spirit impregnation of the ovum or seed of Mary. His sinlessness was therefore the result of his superior powerful organism by which he was enabled to live without sin from his birth. It was the flesh of Jesus that was called "sinful" and under condemnation; not the person Jesus. Although he was made of the same flesh, in all things like unto his brethren; yet at the same time, in origin, in his begettal, in mind, in character, and in power, he was far superior; and he is "the head of the body, the first born from the dead among many brethren, that in all things he might have the pre-eminence," Col. i. 18; Rom. viii. 20.

The condemnation of sin and sinful flesh, or human nature, to death and everlasting destruction, was the penalty that immediately followed Adam's transgression. The carrying out of that condemnation, evidently required that Jesus should come as a true representative of the race, as to the sinful-flesh-nature, and yet so highly organized mentally and morally as to enable him to live all his life, from his very birth without sin, "without fault;" so that both by his origin and his sinless life, he should be entitled to a resurrection from the dead to a Spirit birth from the grave—after passing through the terrible ordeal of laying down his life on the behalf of his brethren. Thus by both his life and death the condemnation of sin was accomplished. No son of Joseph could have lived from his birth personally and perfectly sinless. Only in the person of Jesus "the only begotten Son" of the "living Father" could this requirement be fulfilled. Therefore it was only by him that sin could be condemned to the flesh in such a way as to remove it. By its being thus "put away," the gates of the grave have been opened and left ajar for the resurrection of his brethren. By the "taking away of the sin of the world," its consequence—death,—has been prospectively removed, so that it can now be said, "Jesus Christ hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel." 2 Tim. x. "And this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." John xvii. 3. "And we know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us understanding, that we may know him that is true, and we are in him that is true, even in his Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God and eternal life." 1 John v. 20. This teaches us that the "true GOD,"—the Father is made known by his Son Jesus Christ, who is the Father's perfect representative—"the image or likeness of the invisible God, the first born of every creature of the new creation," (Col. i. 15,)—the beginning of the God-family of mighty ones. I understand that the great truth of which Peter had a clear conception, through the revelation of the Father who was in heaven, and at the same time in Jesus by his Spirit; and which truth Peter so distinctly uttered in response to our Savior's question, viz.: "Thou art the Christ the Son of the living God," is the foundation, the "ROCK" upon which the entire superstructure of the Church of God is built—the pivot upon which turns everything connected with the "great salvation" provided for man. Jesus replied to Peter, "upon this ROCK I will build my CHURCH," meaning upon himself as "the WORD"—the embodiment of the Truth—the great truth that he was truly and literally the real Son of the living God—the only begotten Son, supernaturally begotten by Holy Spirit and Power of the Highest—that in the sense of this great truth uttered by Peter, he was the Rock, the foundation of his Church. "But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon. For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." 1 Cor. iii. 10, 11. "Jesus Christ himself being a chief corner stone," or as worded by the Diaglott, "Christ Jesus being the Foundation corner-stone of it; on which all the building being fitly compacted together, increases into a holy Temple for the Lord." Eph. ii. 20, 21.

If this great truth is the foundation as above shown, does it not follow that whoever does not believe it, does not believe in Christ, nor belong to his church? Does it not follow that such persons are stumbling over the "stumbling stone," as did the Jews? Does it not follow that those who do not believe this great truth, are (unconsciously though it may be) rejecting Jesus the Anointed, and being caught in a gin and a snare and taken? Does it not follow that Jesus Anointed is to them "a stone of stumbling, a rock of offence," "a living stone, disallowed indeed of men and spoken against?" Does it not follow that they "stumble at the WORD," whereunto they were appointed because of not believing the word? 1 Peter ii. 4, 8. Does it not follow that such persons reject the chief of "the things concerning the name"—concerning the Lord Jesus Christ, which constitute "the gospel" Acts viii. 12; Luke xxiv. 27, 44; Acts xxviii. 23, 31. Is not faith in the gospel the condition of salvation? "Whosoever shall confess that Jesus is the Son of God, God dwelleth in him, and he in God." John iv. 14, 15. "Every spirit that confesseth JESUS Anointed to have come in the flesh, is from God." 1 John iv. 2. "If ye believe not that I AM, ye shall die in your sins." John viii. 24.

Or, shall "the things concerning the Name"—JESUS—our greatest blessing—our greatest gift—"He gave his only begotten Son,"—"the chief corner stone," shall HE become a stone of stumbling, a rock of offence to us? Shall the things concerning HIM be a gin, and a snare, and a trap that we may be snared and taken because of our unbelief. In HIM—in what the word has so plainly and harmoniously declared concerning him?

THE COVENANT WITH DAVID.* "Go and tell my servant David, Thus saith the Lord." * I took thee from the sheepcote, from following the sheep, to be ruler over my people, Israel: * * and have made thee a great name, like unto the name of the great men that are in the earth. Moreover I will appoint a place for my people Israel, that they may dwell in a place of their own, and move no more. Also the Lord telleth thee that he will make thee an house [household, family, or line of descendants with royal authority from me, beginning with Solomon] and when thy days be fulfilled, and thou shalt sleep with thy fathers, I will set up, raise up thy seed after thee, [This "SEED" included both Solomon and Christ; for Peter says that "David being a prophet and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him, that of the fruit of his loins according to the flesh, he would raise up CHRIST to sit on his throne." David's throne and GOD'S THRONE] WHICH SHALL PROCEED OUT OF THY BOWELS, which shall be of thy sons [plural; this seed was to be two-fold, Solomon and Jesus, applying to Solomon first, then to Jesus] and I will establish his kingdom. He shall build an house for my name, [Solomon did build the house, Solomon's Temple, and it was hallowed by the special presence and visible glory of God, and consecrated to his worship: but it was only a type of the Temple Jesus is to build when he returns, according to the measurements and pattern made known to Ezekiel] and I will establish the throne of his kingdom forever. I will be his Father, and he shall be my Son. [Paul and Peter tells us that this Son was Jesus. Heb. i. 5; Acts ii. 30. "The Lord hath sworn in truth unto David: He will not turn from it; of the fruit of thy body will I set upon thy throne." Psa. cxxxii. 11. "Of this man's (David's) seed hath God according to his promise raised unto Israel a Savior, Jesus." Acts xiii. 23.] If he commit iniquity, I will chasten him with the rod of men, and with the stripes of the children of men; [Dr. Adam Clarke and others, say this should be translated as follows:—"Even in his suffering for iniquity, (not his own, but "our iniquities;" Isa. liii. 5;) I will chasten him with the rod of men, and with the stripes of the children of men." By this rendering, it would apply to both Solomon and Jesus—to Solomon for his own iniquities, and to Jesus for "our iniquities;" for his Father "hath laid on him the iniquity of us all." Isa. liii. 6;] but my mercy shall not depart away from him, as I took it from Saul whom I put away before thee. And thine [David's] house and thy kingdom, and mine [God's] house and my kingdom, shall be established forevermore before thee. [David's family and kingdom,—God's family and kingdom. David's son—God's Son]. According to all these words, and according to all this vision, so did Nathan speak unto David. * * Behold a son shall be born to thee, who shall be a man of rest; * * for his name shall be Solomon: * * he shall be my son, and I will be his father." 2 Sam. vii. 5–17; 1 Chron. xvii. 7–17; xxii. 9, 19. This shows that in one sense, even Solomon had his origin in God's word of promise made to David: for this covenant was made with David nine years before his promised son Solomon was born; see 2 Sam. xii. 24; God foretelling David that he should have a son, and that this promised son, when born, should be named Solomon; that is peaceable, or peace; (See margin and Dr. Young); Jesus also being called the "Prince of Peace," and his gospel, the gospel of peace, who said, "that in me ye might have peace; my peace I give unto you." Solomon was evidently raised up for a type of Christ, being filled from his childhood with wisdom and understanding—"I have given thee a wise and understanding heart"—1 Kings iii. 7–12: and when he took the throne, "the Lord magnified Solomon [made him very great] exceedingly in the sight of all Israel, and bestowed upon him such royal majesty as had not been on any king before him in Israel." 1 Chron. xxix. 25. Thus he was a remarkable type. Solomon the type, Jesus the antitypo—Solomon the beginning, Jesus the ending, or culmination of the promised son of David and Son of God.

Let it ever be borne in mind, that this "SON" or "seed," distinctly includes both Solomon and Jesus, just in the same way as in the great covenant with Abraham, made over eight hundred years before this, (and of which, this with David as a part—an additional development) in which "thy seed" includes both Isaac and Christ, and all in Christ—Isaac the beginning or incipiency as to the flesh, of that "Seed" which Paul says "is Christ." "All the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed forever." Gen. xiii. 15. He that shall come forth out of thine own bowels, shall be thine heir. Gen. xv. 14. And Abraham called the name of his son that was born unto him, Isaac. Gen. xxi. 3. In blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore, and thy seed shall possess the gate of HIS enemies. Gen. xxii. 17. Now Paul says this seed this son of Abraham is Christ, as follows: "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, and to seeds, as of many, but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ." Gal. iii. 16. Hence Jesus is called the son of Abraham, as well as the son of David. It will be seen therefore that here in this covenant with David, this SON or "seed of David according to the flesh" includes both Solomon and Jesus. In fact, this son Solomon, was incipiently Jesus, as to the flesh. The covenant-promise to Abraham fifteen years previous to the conception of Isaac, was, "he that shall come forth out of thine own bowels shall be thine heir." So also nine years previous to the conception of Solomon, the covenant-promise to David was, "I will set up thy seed after thee, which shall proceed out of thy bowels, and I will establish his kingdom." In both cases the promised son or seed included both a fleshly or flesh-begotten seed which was to be "the fruit of the body"—Isaac and Solomon—and also a spiritual or Spirit-begotten seed, "which is Christ"—the one the beginning of the other's flesh. The covenant-promise in both cases commenced to be fulfilled by the birth of the fleshly son. It followed therefore, that the Son of God, and Son of David according to the flesh, began to be produced by the birth of Solomon, David's tenth son. His birth was the beginning of the fulfilment of that wonderful covenant-promise, "I will be his Father, and he shall be my Son;" which Paul quotes and distinctly applies to Jesus; Heb. i. 5; just as I have shown he did in the case of the covenant with Abraham. It follows therefore, that Solomon was not only the type, but the actual literal inception or beginning of that Son of David, as to the flesh, which ultimately culminated in the birth of "His [God's] Son Jesus Christ our Lord which was made of the seed of David according to the flesh." Rom. i. 3. In other words, Solomon was the beginning of the Son of David which ultimately culminated in the constitution and organism of Jesus the Son of God through the action of the Holy Spirit, the Power of the Highest: or in other words again, the flesh of David, which, according to the covenant, was to "proceed out of his bowels," the beginning of the flesh of him "who was made of the seed of David according to the flesh; and declared to be the Son of God with Power [the power of an endless life] according to the Spirit of holiness [or Holy Spirit] by the resurrection from the dead." Hence David speaking prophetically of his Son and Lord, said his flesh [that is, David's flesh as constituting the flesh of Jesus] should rest in hope and not see corruption. This shows how it was that the promised son included both Solomon and Jesus; and how it was that Paul could make Jesus to be this promised Son, or seed, when it was said of him, that he shall proceed out of the bowels of Abraham and David; and how it was that David could say "MY flesh shall rest in hope," and not see corruption in the grave, when speaking prophetically of the death and resurrection of Jesus, "God's Holy One." Acts ii. 26, 27. It also shows clearly that Jesus the Son of David was a descendant of his through the Solomon line; of which however, I shall adduce positive proof.

*The covenants are discussed at length, in my book. The Law, The Covenant, etc."

Oh! the blessing it is to have a friend to whom one can speak fearlessly on any subject; with whom one's deepest as well as one's most foolish thoughts come out simply and safely. Oh! the comfort—the inexpressible comfort of feeling safe with a person—having neither to weigh thoughts nor measure words, but pouring them all right out, chaff and grain together, certain that a faithful hand will take and sift them, keep what is worth keeping, and them with the breath of kindness blow the rest away.—Life for a Life.

We should be instant in prayer for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, for unto them that look for him shall he appear without sin unto salvation. Let us watch and pray lest that day come upon us unawares.

When the cross of Christ is deeply felt as our glory and hope, as an inevitable consequence we become crucified to the world, for the two are not agreed, and therefore cannot go together.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXVI. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, APRIL 27, 1887. NO. 16.

THE RESTITUTION,

Terms—TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

Payable in advance. Three and Six Months Discontinued.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the doctrine of "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with Him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

ATTENDING to calls in our ministry, and to some of the necessary cares of life has prevented writing much editorially for this number.

ON Thursday evening of last week fearful cyclones, tornadoes, and hail-storms swept over parts of Western and Southwestern Missouri, Southeastern Kansas, and Northeastern Arkansas, causing great loss of life and destruction of property, as well as injuring a large number of people. Kentucky and Texas also suffered from tornados, while parts of Illinois, about Centralia, were visited by a destructive hailstorm. Heavy hail also fell in parts of Mississippi, killing stock and doing injury to many of the colored population. The town of Prescott, in Kansas, was nearly swept out of existence. Among the injured there, if reports be correct, is our beloved brother, J. C. Kimsey. It has been a terrible visitation and we anxiously await further details.

IN writing upon some particulars about a change of address to the Publishor, Brother Spence, of South India, gives some interesting notes as to the work he is doing in Madras, and of the assistance he is receiving from various sources in America. Like most believers in the soon-coming of the Messiah in Europe and Asia, Brother Spence holds to the return of Judah and Israel to the Land of Promise, or, in other words, both himself and the majority in the Old World are Millennarians. We rejoice, however, to know that some, not in agreement with us on questions pertaining to the coming age, are laboring to enlighten the dwellers in far distant Hindostan concerning the Lord's coming and some kindred truths. When the "Gospel of the Kingdom" shall have been fully proclaimed throughout the world, the end of this age will come.

MUSINGS.

They come to us all, sad, wistful hours, hours when our heart-throbs echo the words of David of old. "Oh, that I had wings like a dove! for then would I fly away, and be at rest. I would hasten my escape from the windy storm and tempest."

We are so tired of the perplexities of life, so tired of the mysteries, the struggles and the pain. So weary of waiting for the rest and wisdom of the other life.

'Tis so hard not to "know" in full rather than "in part," to "live by faith" instead of sight. 'Tis so hard to do unpleasant duties, with love, as we ought. So hard to love those who oppose in thought, word, and deed, who give no stimulus toward nobility of heart and life. Who seem but clogs to progress, dragging one down.

And then, how easy to love the opposite, those who inspire noble thoughts, engendering and cultivating new ideas and impulses, to the refreshing of the thirsty heart and mind. How easy to grow, to blossom and bear fruit under the pure, healthful, life-giving influence of the harmonious twin souls, the true, honest Christian souls, who "are like diamonds, hard to find."

How much of nature must we crush out? How much retain? which part? How much of duty must we substitute for nature, our better nature? Must we sacrifice all the hungry cravings to be lifted higher into the realms of beauty, truth and holiness, sacrifice them simply to a stern sense of conventional duty? Must we, when that duty keeps us down to the empty common-place frivolities of the world?

Hard questions these, and we each must answer them for ourselves. This we know: Thought needs thought, healthful thought is conducive to health of body. We cannot be healthy in body and discharge manual duties devolving upon us, with cheerfulness and vigor, if we are starved for the want of mental food, either intellectual or spiritual.

God does not expect us to accomplish ends. He does not require us to work without implements. He provides strength and power, uses individuals, circumstances, trials to supply us with the needful equipments.

Can we not therefore perform our unpleasant duties with a readier, freer heart and hand, when the buoyancy, resulting from a draught of inspiring thoughts and words brings cheerfulness and lightness to the task?

Let us cast ourselves upon God, believing that we are his children and that every circumstance in our lives is controlled by him and is intended for our good. He knows us altogether, through and through, and we thank him that he does. He knows all the whys and the wherefores of deeds, all the trials and struggles and tears, the hopes and the longings for rest. He will forgive and correct the wrong, and withhold no good thing from our lives. We shall trust him. He is our Father. EMILY C. RENSEN.

To the Church of God in Christ Jesus, greeting.

"God having anciently spoken in many portions and by various methods, to the fathers by the prophets, in the last of these days spoke to us by a Son whom he appointed heir of all things, on account of whom also he constituted the Ages." Heb. 1. 12, Wigglot.

I have been unavoidably hindered for more than a year in getting out a book which I sincerely hope will prove a help to those who are earnestly seeking the way of life.

However, I have now so far completed my work that—D. V.—I will have it in the printer's hands about the first of May, and hope it will be ready soon after that date. In this little work, as in all I write, I have endeavored to be governed by the teaching of the written Word. If I have presented new thoughts on any of the subjects treated, I ask the patience and forbearance of the children of God, while they carefully compare, with the Word of truth.

The title of the book will be:—"The Heir of All Things."

The subjects separately treated are,—1st Heirship. 2nd Whose Son is he? 3d Why did he die? 4th What did his death accomplish?—Appendix 1st Objections considered. 2nd Historic proof of the genuineness of the gospels as we now have them.

It will contain 130 to 150 pages, on good paper, clear type, paper-cover. Price twenty-five cents, or five for one dollar. I shall be pleased to hear from all who feel an interest in Bible truths. You need not send money till you get the book, but you may send names at any time, I will note your address and forward as soon as it is ready. To those who cannot afford to pay for it, I will send it free of all charge if they only send in their address plainly stating name, post office, county and state. In hope of a joint heirship. CARRIE WILLIAMS.

April 18, 1887.

Dear Restitution:

I have often been requested to make a report of my travel in Kansas. I will make a brief report and submit it to you to dispose of as you may think proper. I arrived in Arkansas City August 6, 1886. The day was very hot, the mercury registering from 100 to 110 deg. in the shade. This would seem to us almost unbearable, but the cool, refreshing breeze that was blowing seemed to invigorate and strengthen, for men would go out and work in the hayfield without any seeming inconvenience. The severe drouth of last summer together with the chinch bugs caused almost an entire failure in crops. They say they have never had as hard a time since the grasshopper year; nevertheless there is enough for home consumption.

Now I have traveled eight or ten hundred miles in Southern Kansas, west, north and south. My travel has all been by private conveyance, affording me the best opportunity of seeing the country. There is the greatest variety of scenery, soil and lay of land. The streams are generally narrow and deep, fringed with timber growing down to the waters edge, affording no chance for marshes and frog ponds; hence there is no malaria and the country is healthy. There is also plenty of coal to supply the deficiency of wood, and the finest building stone that any country affords. The people of Kansas are the most generous-hearted and hospitable people that I ever traveled among.

I drove through from Douglas County to Sumner Co., a distance of about 250 miles; one would have thought Kansas was in the most prosperous condition. From Emporia to Arkansas City every town is booming, especially Wichita and Arkansas City. Wichita is a city of some 30,000 inhabitants with street cars running in all directions through the city. It is also lighted with electric lights. I passed through many large towns and cities on my way, of which time nor space will not allow me to describe, but all are booming. It would be astonishing to any eastern person who had never travelled in Kansas to see the numerous large towns and cities, the fine architecture of the buildings, and the amount of business done. I think the man that could not suit himself with a home in Kansas, would have to take an upward train for a sky kingdom. In conclusion I will say, if I had my family here it would be a long time before I would go to Indiana. Your brother in Christ, H. R. CARTER.

A Private Letter from J. Spence to A. R. Underwood.

PERAMBUR, Madras, }
March 23, 1887. }

My Dear Brother:

Your letter of the 18th ultimo just to hand. Thanks very much for your kind sentiment. I am sorry now that I did not write about the non-receipt of the papers in the past, but as I was receiving the paper as a gift I felt diffident about complaining. THE RESTITUTION is prized by me very much and I shall deem it a favor if you can let me have a few copies for free circulation. I believe that it is possible that some may be led to subscribe for it, anyway I am sure I shall be able to get willing readers for all you send me. The sentiments of the paper are mine, with very few exceptions. The "Jew Question" is put in just my way of thinking. In fact the majority of Englishmen see with you on this point. Nothing that I have seen has yet shaken my belief that the Jew will yet be restored.

The liberal platform (regarding what is to take place during the thousand years) of THE RESTITUTION, has my entire sympathy. I do believe our loving God has a great purpose in store for his creature man. You are aware I believe that I have been doing what I could towards the propagation of the truth for some years past, and a spirit of inquiry has been aroused that must tell soon. But I am not able to do more than supervise. Yet I have caused some million pages of truth regarding the nature of man to be circulated. * * * My chief work is to supervise expenditure and see that all monies are well laid out and full value received for the same.

I shall be glad to receive and scatter all you can send. You can depend on nothing being wasted you send to me. I cannot get a fraction of what I could use. Any standard work for lending purposes will be most useful here. Again thanking you for your letter and promise of tracts, I remain yours affectionately in the Lord Jesus.

J. SPENCE.

[Any one wishing to assist in sending papers, tracts and books to the above mentioned mission field may forward a few cents or dollars to this office, and every month we will try and send a package of reading matter to Brother Spence, who gives his assurance that none will be wasted.]

Dear Restitution:

Let me say to the many brethren that are anxious to know about my whereabouts, and how my health is, and how I am getting along, that through the kind care of our Heavenly Father, I am still in the land of the living and my name recorded in the Lamb's book of Life, the only church record I know anything about. And if our names are not recorded there, we may have them on all the books kept by human organizations, from the North Pole to the South Pole, and we will not be chosen.

Well my health is not good at all, but is better than it has been, so much so that on April 9th I want to a place called Modoc, in the State of Missouri. Here I preached in a church house that was built by a Catholic doctor, and is open for all denominations, and last of all we got in there too. Preached some six sermons, baptized two persons, ages 58 and 59 years, man and his wife. The gospel still is the power of God unto salvation unto every one that believes, to the Jew first and also to the Greek. There I met Brothers Finn, Morrow, Burr and Lewellen. Had a good old-fashioned meeting and left them with the promise to return some time in the future, if health will permit.

I also will say to the brethren that I also met with the brethren at our anniversary or yearly meeting, advertised in THE RESTITUTION for April 7th. Not quite a number of brethren; Dr. J. S. Trobridge, of Parsons, was there. He came some twenty-four miles. Had a very good time in singing, praying and exhorting one another. Brethren, that may be the last meeting of the kind that we may ever have. The next one may be in our Father's kingdom.

I will say to the brethren scattered abroad that the latter part of May I expect to make my visit to Indiana to see my aged mother once more, and as money is a scarce article with Kansas preachers, at least with me, and quite a number have written to me last fall when I had contemplated going to Indiana, all that would like to hear the gospel of the kingdom preached, the blessing of all nations, and help me to bear some of the burdens, write to me immediately, so that I can make my arrangements in that direction.

Well, brother, a few more sermons, a few more days, a few more years, will end this age. May God wake us up to a sense of our duty. May we all live, so whether awake or asleep we may be one of that number that will be chosen to help judge and bless the nations, is my prayer, for Christ's sake, amen. Yours in hope of eternal life when Jesus comes.

JOHN FOSEE.

PHARISBURG, O.

Dear Restitution:

On the evening of April 7, 1887, Brother Skeels and family, myself and family, met at Brother Bell's and had prayer and conference meeting, after which we commemorated the Lord's Supper. We are but few, nevertheless we feel like doing our duty as we understand it. Though there were three less of us than there were on that memorable evening, yet as we sat at table it looked as if we were ready and willing and waiting for the return of the Master when we looked at the head of the table and saw the vacant chair. I will say that we are located six miles south of Richwood (N. Y. P. R. R.) and eight miles north of Marysville (C. C. C. R. R.), and if any of the preaching brethren passing this way feel like giving us a call they will be thankfully received.

A REMARKABLE "FIND."

We received a letter from Mrs. Charlotte F. Brown, of Sidon, Syria, giving an account of a remarkable discovery near there of sarcophagi. We quote from her letter, adding some passages from a letter since received from the Rev. W. K. Eddy.

A poor man, a Protestant, stumbled on a sort of cave; and now the place has been opened, soldiers are on guard, and only those having permission can go down into it. The law is, that the finder of antiquities has a third of the proceeds, the owner of the land a third, and the Government the remaining third. The man came to Mr. Eddy for advice, saying that he had been offered £500 for his share. Mr. Eddy advised him by all means to take what he could get, and not trust to getting a third from a tricky government.

Ira Harris, M. D., of Tripoli and Mr. Eddy went to the place today, as they had permission to see what there was to be seen. There is a large opening out in the solid rock about a mile northeast of the city, in an open field above the line of gardens, thirty feet square, and perhaps thirty-five deep, that has been cleared out. They were let down into the hole by a rope. In each of the four walls was found a door leading to a chamber. In the south room, about fifteen feet square, were two sarcophagi, one of black marble, beautifully polished, and severely plain, with no carving. The other was of pure white marble, eleven feet long, five wide, and twelve high, dazzlingly bright in the light of the candles they carried. The top was a grand arch of shining marble, the front of which was divided by a line into two panels, and so the back. At the four sides were four projections with noble lions' heads. On each panel was a symbolical figure—body of animal, head of eagle, with uplifted wings, facing each other. Below on the front of the tomb, beneath a very elaborate cornice, were two Centaurs facing each other and trampling on a warrior who strove to defend himself by a shield. On the sides, which were alike, were first two human figures with four spirited horses ahead of them; some of the horses have their heads turned back; and beneath the horses' feet, a lion on the one side, and a boar or hyæna on the other; then two more figures with four more horses.

At the back, in the upper part, were also figures—bodies of birds, heads of men, with beautifully extended wings. Below, two Centaurs carrying a captured stag between them. The cloaks falling from the shoulders of the Centaurs had lions' heads in the corners. One Centaur carries the branch of a tree like a gigantic arrow upon his shoulders. Below these figures all around was a band of figures quite small and exquisitely cut, representing hunting scenes, etc. This was partly covered with stones, so that we could not see it. The workmanship of this was good, but not remarkable. A hole had been broken in the front through which the contents had been rifled, but in general it was in a fine state of preservation. Three skeletons and five dogs' heads. From the long noses of the latter, it is easy to infer they were hunting dogs.

Dr. Harris said that human skeletons were plentiful around. They could see into the other sarcophagus too, and they said it was filled to the brim with water that trickled down, drop by drop, from the roof above. The air became so bad that the candles starved to death and went out, and Dr. Harris turned faint from the foul air. So they ascended and sat under a tree while another place that had been covered for safety had been reopened. In this second room, toward the east, was a most beautiful tomb or mausoleum of white marble, in the form of a Greek temple, perhaps seven feet high from base to apex. The cover was the roof, which was carved to represent flat tiles, and even the lead between the rows of tiles was shown. A funeral procession was carved on the sides, showing a horse led by attendants in short Greek tunics, mourners, bier, with urn, etc. There was a frieze running all around filled with little figures. Ionic columns seemed to support the roof. But the most beautiful part of all was a row of figures standing all around the sarcophagus, with backs touching it, each one seven spans high, according to Dr. Harris, and beautifully and delicately carved. One figure had a rail thrown over the head, and even the knuckles seemed to be visible underneath. Mr Eddy said their eyes were touched with black in the center, giving them a very lifelike appearance. A row of dogs' heads projected from what might be called the eaves. I asked Mr. Eddy how what he saw, and especially the statues, compared with what he had seen in museums, and he said he had never seen anything equalling it. Of course one has to allow for natural enthusiasm, resulting from a first sight, and that, too, by delusive candle-light. Evidently, though, the whole thing is beautiful and valuable, and fortunately is but little mutilated. The story is going around that the equivalent of $10,000 has been offered for the various sarcophagi. They will probably not go out of the country, as the Government will not allow it, but will have them conveyed to Constantinople. The north room has a plain sarcophagus. The west room has four sarcophagi which Mr. Eddy has not yet seen. It is said to be the finest of all.

The western door led into a small room from which we passed by a southwest door where there were four sarcophagi, three of white marble with gable roofs and more or less ornamented with vines, etc. The fourth sarcophagus was the largest, being about twelve feet long, five feet wide and four feet high to the eaves, with two feet more to the ridge.

Competent authority says that there is nothing equal to it in the collection at Athens, and very little in sculpture that is finer in any museum.

The excellence consists in richness of ornament, force of the passions expressed, the variety of costumes depicted, the freshness of the painted costumes, the fineness of the polish, and the great variety of subjects represented. The main features are battles. Two classes of warriors are represented: soldiers with casques, helmets, tunics, greaves and short swords. Some had on flowing cloaks painted red, but their tunics were blue, as were also their eyes. These were mostly mounted on horses. The other class of soldiers had a peculiar headdress, a peaked cap with tassels, and a cloth wrapped around the sides of the head and also across the face below the nose. The rest of the costume was scanty. The upper part of the sarcophagus was loaded with ornamental work. Four beautiful lions were sculptured at the corners. The tiles were not flat but curved, and also hollowed somewhat like leaves. Had the tiles been flat they would have suggested the scales of fish. The line of the base of the slope had on it at intervals human heads with a surrounding of leaves out of which they seemed to peer. Below this line on the edge of the cases was a row of stags' heads with horns.

On the main body of the sarcophagus there was a row filled with geometrical figures forming a curious modification of the Greek fret. Below this a receding cornice with figures representing cups and almonds, or fruit of some other kind, then a strip of exquisite vine tracery with the background painted, and below this represented a fierce battle, with the dead and dying, and horses rearing and plunging—a very vigorous and spirited representation.

On the other side was a hunting scene. A barbarian hunter stands up with outstretched arms, having just discharged an arrow from his bow. A man on horseback appears as if thrusting with a spear. Then in front another horseman on the neck of whose horse a lion has fastened. The nostrils of the horse are dilated and the skin is wrinkled above the nose. These are but a few of the many scenes depicted. The Government has now forbidden all further access to the tombs. —N. Y. Independent.

"The Man in the Office Knows."

Some visitors were passing through a Colorado smelter. Men were wheeling ores of different kinds and colors into the large furnace-sheds. Yellow lead-carbonate, rich glittering galena, green malachite, blue azurite, and dark iron ores, all combined in different proportions with silver and gold, were crowded in one upon another. The minerals were from all parts of the Rocky Mountains, now brought together in a variegated heap weighing hundreds of tons.

The visitors went on to see the furnaces. There the mixed ores were being cast into the yawning mouths of the fire-pits. Limestone and fuel were also thrown in to feed the fire, and to aid in separating the metals from the dross. A laborer was asked the question, "Why do you mix everything in this way?" The reply came, "That we may have the best results. We can do better with mixed ores than we can by smelting them separately." "By what method do you get the best results?" He answered, "The easiest and cheapest way of separating the metal from the slag." "What will the metal be worth? What will be the real result of the work?" "We cannot tell. The man in the office knows."

The visitors passed on. They saw the precious metals drawn from the furnace and placed in the molds. They went into the room where the bullion bricks were taked from the molds and piled up for shipping to a refinery. The men in the bullion-room were asked the question, "How much is the bullion worth?" The answer came with a smile: "We sometimes tell the visitors what we think it is worth; but the man in the office knows."

Here is a large smelter, employing many men who carry on their work by faith, not knowing the results any more than those who have served God "not having received the promise [the results], but have seen them afar off." Men are ordered to wheel the ore and dump it on the floor. They unquestioningly obey, not knowing the value of what they handle. Men stand at the mouths of the furnaces, and throw in fuel and flux and material, as they are directed, without asking a question about the worth of the metal that is drawn off in the room beneath them. Other men handle so many bars of pig-iron, simply because they are ordered to do that part of the work. The full knowledge of the processes and results is not among the workmen. "The man in the office knows."

It is easy to see the absolute necessity of faith and obedience among the laborers in every machine-shop and foundry, as well as in every smelter of our land; and yet, now and then, one of these same laborers will question about rendering faith and obedience in the Christian life. It seems strange that any person should find difficulty in accepting this common-sense lesson of the Colorado smelter. The steady perseverance in trusting and serving God must be infinitely more reasonable than the faith and obedience of "smelting-men."

The Sphinx and New Discoveries.

The Sphinx occupies a position where the encroachment of the desert is most conspicuous. At the present day nothing is to be seen of the animal except its head and its neck; but the old Egyptian monuments on which it is figured show not only the entire body down to the paws, but also a large square plinth beneath, covered with ornaments. Since the time of the Greeks, perhaps ever since the reign of Thotmes IV., this plinth has disappeared beneath the sand, and its very existence had been forgotten. It is generally supposed that the Sphinx was hewn out of a large isolated rock, which overlooked the plain. But M. Maspero's researches suggest that it is a work yet more stupendous. He has proved that the Sphinx occupies the centre of an amphitheatre, forming a kind of rocky basin, the upper rim of which is about on a level with the head of the animal. The walls of the amphitheatre, wherever visible, are cut by the hand of man. It seems probable, therefore, that in the beginning there was a uniform surface of rock, in which an artificial valley has been excavated, so as to leave in the middle a block out of which the Sphinx was finally hewn. The excavations now being carried on will doubtless verify the existence of the plinth, shown on the old paintings, and also furnish evidence, by the ornamentation of the plinth, of the true age of the monument. M. Maspero is inclined to assign to it a very great antiquity—possibly higher than the early dynasties, i. e., than the first period of Egyptian history. As the result of last winter's work, the sand round the Sphinx has already been lowered by about thirty metres.—Jewish Herald.

Individual Responsibility.

One of the most solemn thoughts that the mind of man or angel ever entertained is the thought of our individual responsibility to God. I am a distinct, conscious personality, yet indissolubly related to God—as distinct from all other intelligences as if I were the only creature in the world, yet linked in nature and life, and duty and destiny, with myriads of others, as free to think and act as if there were no Power above me; a responsible moral agent, directly accountable to the Judge of all for every thought and act of life, both in its relations to myself and to society at large. Tremendous thought!

Publisher's Notes.

Elder H. R. Carter writes that his address for the present is, Millerton, Sumner Co., Kansas.

Any one who can tell us the present address of C. S. Adams, formerly of Galesburg, Mich., will confer a favor by sending it to this office.

Brother J. R. Willett, of Sunset, Texas, wishes to correspond with any brethren living near Oakland, Oregon. Any brother near there please address Brother Willet as above.

Can any one give us the present address of L. C. Goodrich, formerly of Marvin, Kansas? We will be much obliged for any information as to his whereabouts.

Fathers and mothers, read the advertisements in another part of this paper of new books for the young. Remember, your child will read something, and in this day of trash in the literary world, designed specially for the young, it is the positive duty of every parent to place good books in the hands of his child.

A few to whom we sent letters, notifying them that their subscription has expired, and requesting a few lines of instruction as to their wishes in the matter, have not favored us with a reply. To do business honorably we must have a definite understanding with each other, so we ask all who have not yet answered, to do so at once. Even if you cannot send the money now, you should send us word to that effect, stating the probable time you can remit, and we will try and accommodate you. Any one who cannot pay for our paper will be furnished free, by asking for it.

Read our book list—The Emphatic Diaglott reduced from $4.00 to $3.00, Cruden's Complete Concordance to the Bible, for $1.50. Smith's Bible Dictionary only $1.50. Views and Reviews in Eschatology—the last work of J. H. Pettingell—for $1.00. Do not fail to secure this book, it is good, and worth double the price asked for it. Tracts for distribution by the pound for 60 cents.

"The Unspeakable Gift," by J. H. Pettingell, is now offered at one-half price. We have 500 copies of this work and should like to have them all taken in the next three months. This book contains absolutely conclusive proof of Life only in Christ, and as a missionary is ahead of anything published. If you do not need it yourself, don't you know a friend who could read it to good advantage? It will only cost a few cents to place it in his hands, and who can tell the good that may come of such a little effort on your part. We want to place a quantity of these books in the hands of missionary workers in this and other lands, and for this purpose will open a fund of free will gifts. Those of our friends who wish to take part in this missionary work may do so. The door is open, and though we do not urge this upon our brethren (for it should need no urging) we will just say, the privilege is yours.

THE UNSPEAKABLE GIFT.

A fund of free will contributions to send the above named work to mission workers in this and other lands.

"BE KIND TO ONE ANOTHER."

"Be kind to one another;" 'tis only a little while,
The moments hurry by, and of the hours beguile,
We will not cause the pain in other hearts to ache,
But rather leave the sunshine a brighter path to make.

"Be kind to one another;" let it be our daily prayer
To cheer the sad and weary,—we find them everywhere.
They grope in darkness now, no light upon the way,
But words of truth and love will banish sin away.

"Be kind to one another;" let not one gracious word,
Stir up the bursts of anger, or cause the sad discord.
The flowery paths of peace are on the sunny side,
For 'tis in darkening shadows that dangers do abide.

"Be kind to one another;" the Savior when before,
He sought to give the light that loving words restore,
The smile on the pure ware beaming on his brow,
He now looks down upon us,—his words are with us now.

"Be kind to one another;" there is magic in the sound,
To soothe the little sorrows that everywhere abound;
It comes as comes the brightness, when from the morning sun,
We grasp the beaming lustres that linger as they come.

"Be kind to one another;" for deep within the heart,
There lie the tender echoes—tears will unbidden start,
For with the chains of love, the pearls we gather here,
Are subjects for the kingdom—the time is very near. HATTIE.

THE TARES AND THE WHEAT.

"The kingdom of heaven is likened unto a man that sowed good seed in his field; but while men slept, his enemy came and sowed tares also among the wheat, and went away.....He that soweth the good seed is the Son of man; and the field is the world; and the good seed, these are the sons of the kingdom; and the tares are the sons of the evil one; and the enemy that sowed them is the devil; and the harvest is the end of the world; and the reapers are angels. As therefore the tares are gathered up and burned with fire; so shall it be in the end of the world." Matt. xiii, 24, 25, 37-40.

The parables of Jesus Christ were intended to throw light on the kingdom of God, especially in its preparatory stages; and to show the necessity of an acceptance of the truth, and a constant walk in the truth, in order to become heirs to it. Krummacher says, "The parables of Jesus have not primarily a moral but a politico-religious, or Theocratic purpose." They show what are the conditions of inheriting the kingdom. Now what does this parable of the tares and the wheat represent, or teach? Where does this sowing take place, and when is the time of the harvest? Some think this parable represents the state of the church; because many get into the church from various motives who are not saved. It is thought that these are the tares sown among the wheat, and that they shall be gathered out of the kingdom at the harvest, and burned with fire.

But the field should not be interpreted of the Church, though there are good and bad in the Church, but of the world, as the Savior says, "The field is the world." The fact of any tares being found in the Church, must not alter the Savior's explanation; for, if in the church, they have no business there; they are of the world, and rank with the children of the wicked one. This representation, so far as it has a reference to the Church, we regard as erroneous. Then the good seed, the sons of the kingdom, have become such by faith in Christ. As many as receive him, to them he gives the right to become children of God. By adoption, therefore, they become heirs to the kingdom. And this sowing in its wide application, has been going on from the beginning, and will continue unto the end. But in its restricted application—the application intended by our Lord—it refers to the sowing during the gospel age; for the good seed is sown by the Son of man.

Further, the harvest is the end of the world, or, as the margin reads, the consummation of the age. On this point we think a great error is committed by many believers in the second advent. They teach "that the righteous and the unrighteous, indesively, will be separated and disposed of at the time of the harvest," and that "it will not do to limit the application of this parable to those of the two classes who shall be living at the time of the harvest, for that would involve another and a subsequent harvesting of the righteous as well as a second destruction of the wicked." They teach that this harvest, that this separation, follows the general resurrection. Now the whole truth on this subject cannot be gathered from any one passage. To get a correct view, it is absolutely necessary to compare together many passages. In no other way can the truth be discovered. On a careful comparison then of numerous passages both from the Old and the New Testament, one judgment is, that, the Scriptures do teach another and a subsequent harvesting, which is to take place at the end of the thousand years, when the dead, the great and the small, shall stand before the great white throne. This will be at the general resurrection. The harvest of the parable, therefore, does not follow, but precedes by at least the thousand years, the general resurrection. We believe that this harvest does not include all the righteous and all the unrighteous; that it must be limited in its application to the living, and that it does not apply to all even of the living; for a multitude of passages show that the millennial age follows the consummation of this age, and that in the times of restoration there shall be living nations who shall receive great blessings.

Those passages, therefore, compel us to make [Scripture] consistent with itself, to interpret this harvesting of the sons of the kingdom of those who at that hour are ready to be garnered; and the harvest of the sons of the evil one of those who at that hour have rejected Christ and proved themselves unworthy of life. For in this parable there is not a word about the tares and the wheat of past ages, not a word about the judgment of the dead; it is not, therefore, a judgment of all, both living and dead, but of the living only. This harvest is the same as that referred to in Joel iii. 13, "Put ye in the sickle, for the harvest is ripe; come, tread ye, for the winepress is full, the fats overflow, for their wickedness is great." And here is further evidence that these tares refer to the living wicked—not the dead—to those who are incorrigibly wicked, who have sinned beyond all hope of repentance. It is also the same as that referred to in Rev. xiv. 15, "And another angel came out from the temple, crying with a great voice to him that sat on the cloud, Send forth thy sickle, and reap: for the hour to reap is come; for the harvest of the earth is over-ripe." From the context of this passage it will be found, if examined, that the reference is not to the dead, raised at the general resurrection, but to the living, to those on the earth just previous to the beginning of the millennial age.

JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH.

The doctrine stated by this heading is closely interwoven with the whole history of God's dealings with man in every dispensation, and forms a most important and absolutely necessary element in the plan of redemption. To a world lying under condemnation by reason of transgression, justification by faith ought to be regarded the sweetest message that heavenly messengers ever bore to men.

The condition of the heathen world at the date of Paul's Roman letter as portrayed in the first chapter, was terribly dark. From their inexcusable ignorance of God's claims upon them of reverence and obedience their progress was downward through all the varied forms of idolatry, reaching the most degrading form, styled in modern language, fetichism. Added to this was their vile affections and shameful practices which from the 27th verse onward the Apostle describes with such inimitable truthfulness, and yet with such delicacy as to call forth our admiration of his skill.

Viewed in the light of superior advantages—a revelation of God's will in the Law and the Prophets, the Jew is put by Paul in the same hopeless condition, guilty of the same things, 2 chap. 1 v.—all under sin 2 chap. 9 v. Turning our attention to the world of mankind of today, we are forced to the conclusion that the charges which the Apostle lays with such force against Jew and Gentile, of his time, may be laid with equal force against the world of unbelievers of today. Some writers plead in mitigation of the charges that the world—the civilized—has descended to no such depths of moral depravity, abysses of filthiness as the old heathen world. But in the light of the revelations every day being made in our great cities, of moral corruption, of disgusting lawlessness, the present in comparison, gains little or nothing over the ancient past.

But suppose the present not quite so bad as barbaric times. Will this fact, if fact it is, exempt man and woman from the wrath of God revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men? Romans i. 18. All are guilty. No human being with rational and moral powers in exercise can claim exemption from the sentence of condemnation. What a sad condition! And no way out of it except such as the Great Lawgiver shall prescribe. No human device will avail. The theory of self-sufficiency passes for nothing here. Natural goodness is but the thinnest tinsel spread over the deformity of sin. To deal honestly with even part of all our poor farthing of the debt of sin.

The decencies, humanities, and sweet little amenities of life, will not atone for the transgressions of the past, or recommend the sinner to the favor of the Judge whose mercy has been spurned, whose claims and rights have been disregarded, whose blessings and benefits have been enjoyed without thanks or a feeling of gratitude to the Giver. The best moralist that ever lived, whose many virtues and good qualities of head and heart called down upon him the praises of men, is put on the same side of the line with the most profligate and debauched sinner. He is a sinner. This is the Scripture cognomen of him as well as that adulterer beside him on whom he looks down with so much of contempt. The law shuts the mouth of the moralist and of every man. All doors of escape are closed except one, faith in Jesus Christ. Through him the sinner must come to God as a humble supplicant pleading for mercy. This mode of approach excludes all boasting in self. He comes burdened with sin. He is in debt, and is unable to pay one cent. What can he do but ask for pardon? If he can not pay off the old score incurred by sin what can he do towards paying for eternal life and the glories of the future kingdom? Nothing! ah nothing!

The value of these is far above all human computation. If the sinner could pay his indebtedness and purchase what the future holds in reserve for the faithful he might then boast, but not in the Christ who in this view of his case had nothing to do with his salvation.

All therefore that the penitent believer hopes for on the ground of his faith in Christ are matters of grace, mercy, and love. Tears and prayers and penance and good works pay for nothing, purchase nothing in the plan of redemption. The prescribed obedience of the gospel covering the whole of Christian life has no purchasing quality, neither has faith a commercial value. If they had these, mercy could have no part in reference to our past life of sin, nor gift any thing to do touching our eternal future.

By grace are ye saved through faith, and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God, not of works, lest any man should boast. Eph. ii. 8. A gift is not something paid for. The salvation is the gift of God. The sinner can not approach the Lord as a man approaches a fellowman in the marts of trade, with commodities in hand bearing equal value with those in the hands of the seller, but as a beggar empty handed and sadly in need, a wicked beggar who has again and again violated laws of the most awful sanction, laws coming too, from that very Being before whom he petitions. In this terrible condition of wretchedness, poverty, and condemnation, will not all that he gets be matters of mercy, grace, and love? He approaches God through faith, and every thing that he does is done in faith, the repentance, the baptism, and the whole after-life of obedience to the requirements of the gospel are results of faith, and this active, loving, working, suffering faith justifies a man, or in other words, the Great Judge against whom he has sinned declares him right and just. This kind of faith (not faith in the abstract) is Bible faith, that on which God has set the seal of approval.

JOHN L. WINCH.

"The Church of God is the Kingdom of God in the State of Suffering."

The above is the heading of an article by Wm. Ellis, in THE RESTITUTION, of Jan. 12. This is followed by a quotation of Rev. v. 3, 10 according to the Revised Version. The chief variations, from the Common Version are—them and they in place of us and we; the word Kingdom in place of Kings; and the present in place of the future in the last clause, making it read "they reign on the earth."

W. E. lays special stress on a notion that this song was actually sung by certain persons at the time the vision was seen by John. He says, "Those now living sing the new song today as well as those who sang it in John's day." Thus by quotation and tacit implication W. E. appears to adopt the Revised translation here which being in the present tense, makes the reigning on the earth take place at the time of singing the new song, that is, about the close of the first century. But as this song is held by W. E. to have been sung in the days of John, it follows that the church of God, as represented by the singers, must be the kingdom of God, not, however, in the state of suffering as W. E. affirms, but in the state of reigning.

W. E., however, gives no ground for his assumption that this song was actually sung by any one at the time when the Revelation was seen by John. Nor indeed is there any ground that could be given. On the contrary John was distinctly told that this part of the Revelation was concerning "things which must be hereafter" (iv. 1) or literally "after these," that is, after the things revealed in the first three chapters of this book. These chapters contain promises to those who should "OVERCOME" in certain persecuting times which were coming. These times at least were in the future, whether far or near. And if we include the fulfilment of the promises to be prior to the singing of the new song, the singing of that song must be still in the future. One of the promises is that the overcomer shall "receive power over the nations," and another is that he shall "sit with Christ on his throne." If W. E's contention is right as to the rendering given by the Revisers, namely, "made them to be unto our God a kingdom and priests, and THEY REIGN upon the earth," the promises referred to must have had their fulfilment when the new song was sung! That is according to W. E., "in John's day." In judging of this conclusion we must not overlook the fact that while John was privileged to listen by anticipation to the strains of the song, he was still a prisoner in the isle of Patmos, and was consequently, although an Apostle of Christ, deprived of any share in the glory of "reigning on the earth," supposed to be enjoyed by those who "had then been made unto God a Kingdom and priests."

Possibly W. E. did not intend that such a conclusion should be deduced from his statements, and I have here given him the opportunity to explain more fully what he does mean, and shall be glad to know that I have to any extent misapprehended the matter.

"Go, Build Tyre."

"And I will make thee like the top of a rock; thou shalt be a place to spread nets upon; thou shalt be built no more, for I, the Lord, have spoken it."

Ye who carp at the Bible, who say it is false, who hold it up to ridicule before applauding thousands, go build Tyre! Put your strength against the strength of Jehovah. Prove that the Lord hath not spoken. Form a mighty combination, get together your wealth, buy the ancient site of the Phœnician capital; bring the dust that Alexander scraped from her streets, up from the midst of the sea; take her stones and her timber from the water; build her mighty walls and lay up the strong towers; fetch her building stones from Acre and Joppa and Beirut, and cover her with pleasant houses as of old. Set her princes on the throne and clothe them in broidered garments; fill her with riches and with sea-faring men. Let her be a merchant of the people; set her borders in the sea and make her perfect in beauty; send for the inhabitants of Zidon and Arvad to be her mariners, and the ancients of Gebal to calk her ships, put the men of Persia and Lud and Phut in her army, the soldiers of Arvad on her walls, and Gammadims in her towns. Let Tarshish trade in her fairs with silver and iron and tin and lead; the merchants of Javan, Tubal and Meshech, sell men and vessels of brass in her markets, Togarmah, trade with horses, and horsemen and mules; the men of Dedan send her presents of horns of ivory and ebony. Let Syria come to her fairs with emeralds, purple and broidered work and fine linen and coral and agate. Judah and Israel with wheat of the Minnith and Pannag, and honey and oil and balm; Damascus with wine of Helbon and white wool; Dan and Javan with bright iron and cassia; Dedan with precious cloths for chariots; Arabia with her flocks; Sheba and Raamah with spices and precious stones and gold; Haran and Canneh and Eden with all sorts of things in blue cloths, and chests of rich apparel. Bring back her artificers and merchants and mariners, her pilots and calkers and men of war; clear her harbor, dig up her burial places from the pits into which the sand hath thrown them, or own that the Bible is true!

Let the sound of the harp resound in her again, make every precious stone her covering, bring back from the ashes that which the fire hath devoured. God hath said, "I will make thee a terror, and thou shalt be no more."

Thirty or more years ago, Rosehild Pasha purchased the site of continental Tyre, and "planted fifty thousand mulberry trees, besides olive and fruit trees, determined to revive the place again," but although the fruit trees flourished, the neighborhood proved to be so unhealthy that the peasants refused to reside there. God has made it a terror, "it shall be no more." Nor can the island Tyre ever be made to assume its former splendor; it is a mere village, a place whereon fishers spread their nets.

"Though thou be sought for yet shalt thou never be found again, saith the Lord God." Tyre cannot be found; that which made it a city, its grand buildings and columns and walls are in ashes. Buried in the sand; buried in the sea; scattered in adjacent cities or broken into fragments.

The Wonders of Hebrew History.

Not of past ages only, but what we have seen in our day. The financial position of families in Europe called the Money Kings of Europe. The doors of Parliament thrown open to the Hebrew people and one of their number rising to be Prime Minister of the Kingdom, a position as high as Joseph in Egypt, Daniel in Babylon or at the court of Persia, placing the diadem on Victoria's head, Empress of all the Indies. And now the President of the United States commissions one of the Hebrew people to represent our Government at the court of the Sultan, a power that has trodden down their Holy City for more than a thousand years. The Hebrew nation crucified their own Messiah, who, in his dying agony prayed, "Father forgive them, for they know not what they do." And now thousands of Christian people are listening to the voice of the Hebrew prophet, echoing down the long centuries of suffering and humiliation, "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God, speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her that her iniquity is pardoned, for she hath received of the Lord double for all her sins." How long shall it be to the end of these wonders? Unto twenty-three hundred days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed. When he shall end the dispensation all these things shall be understood.

C. BOARDMAN.

Dear Brethren and Sisters:

With gladness did I receive permission from THE RESTITUTION to write short practical articles needed in every-day life. It seems more home like than long doctrinal sermons. And then, again, I am at home a great deal caring for a sick husband, and as duty never calls two ways at one time, I will spend leisure moments in writing, though what a joy it will be when I am permitted again to labor in the vineyard of my blessed Lord.

The words of Jesus on a certain occasion are of the utmost importance to us just now, "Lest coming suddenly he find you sleeping; and what I say unto you, I say unto all, watch." Was he looking down the future years when he said at another time, "Take heed lest your hearts be overcharged with the cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares, for as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth." Notice the language, "dwellers on the earth." Let us be sojourners and pilgrims, merely passing through the usurper's domain, but after a little while to return when it shall revert to its rightful owner. Abraham "looked for a city whose builder and maker is God." If we are pilgrims, what right have we to become entangled with the trash of earth, setting our affections upon the perishing things of this world? Why the time is at hand when the Redeemer will send his angels everywhere to gather his servants, "those that have made a covenant with him by sacrifice." Let each one ask himself, am I ready to go with the messengers whenever they shall come? We are not only to be ready, but waiting, anxiously looking with loyal hearts for the return of the King.

The disciples said, at a certain time, "Lo, we have left all and followed thee, what shall we have therefore?" Are any of us asking the same question today? If so, the answer comes ringing down the ages, "Eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man, the things that God hath prepared for them that love him." Yes the world, or age to come, will be tearless, painless, sorrowless, graveless, as well as sinless; and the now death-bound saints, then liberated by Almighty power, will all be there, as real intelligences, alive and happy for ever. The meetings, the greetings, the rejoicings, to be experienced on that radiant shore of immortality will surpass human imagination. It will be a scene of perfection and absolute satisfaction.

CHRIST THE CENTRE OF SCRIPTURE.

Christ, the Son of God, is the centre of Scripture; and the Book—whatever be the historical facts about its origin, its authorship, and the date of the several portions of which it is composed—the Book is a unity, because there is driven right through it, like a core of gold, either in the way of prophecy and onward-looking anticipation, or in the way of history and grateful retrospect, the reference to the one "Name that is above every name," the name of Christ, the Son of God.

And all its incompleteness, its fragmentariness, its carelessness about persons, are intended, as are the slight parts in skillful artist's handiwork, to emphasize the beauty and the sovereignty of that one central figure on which all lights are concentrated, and on which the painter has lavished all the resources of his art. So God—for God is the Author of the Bible—on this great canvas has painted much in sketchy outline, and left much unfilled in, that every eye may be fixed on the central figure, the Christ of God, on whose head comes down the dove, and round whom echoes the Divine declaration; "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased."

But it is not merely in order to represent Jesus as the Christ of God that these things are written, but it is that that representation may become the object of our faith. If the intention of Scripture had been simply to establish the fact that Jesus was the Christ and the Son of God, it might have been done in a very different fashion. A theological treatise would have been enough to do that. But, if the object be that men should not only accept with their understandings the truth concerning Christ's office and nature, but that their hearts should go out to him, and that they should rest their sinful souls upon him as the Son of God and the Christ, then there is no other way to accomplish that but by the history of his life and the manifestation of his heart. If the object were simply to make us know about Christ, we do not need a Book like this; but if the object is to lead us to put our faith in him, then we must have what we have here, the infinitely touching and tender figure of Jesus Christ himself, set before us in all its sweetness and beauty as he lived and moved and died for us.....

If this be the purpose of God [illegible] that let us learn, on the one hand, the wretched insufficiency of a mere orthodox creed, and let us learn, on the other hand, the equal insufficiency of a mere orocdless emotion.

If the purpose of Scripture in these Gospels, and all its parts, is that we should believe "that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God," that purpose is not accomplished when we simply yield our understanding to that truth, and accept it as a great many people do. That was much more the fault of the last generation than of this, though many of us may still make the mistake of supposing that we are Christians because we idly assent to—or, at least, do not deny, and so fancy that we accept—Christian truth. But, as Luther says in one of his rough figures, "Human nature is like a drunken peasant; if you put him up on the horse on the one side, he is sure to tumble down on the other." And so the reaction from the heartless, unpractical orthodoxy of half a century ago has come with a vengeance today, when everybody is saying, "Oh! give me a Christianity without a dogma!" Well, I say that too about a great many of the metaphysical subtleties which have been called Doctrinal Christianity. But this doctrine of the nature and office of Jesus Christ cannot be given up and the Christianity which Christ and his apostles taught retained. Do you believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God? Do you trust your soul to him in these characters? If you do, I think we can shake hands. If you do not, Scripture has failed to do its work on you, and you have not reached the point which all God's lavish revelation has been expended on the world that you and all men might attain.—Alexander Maclaren, D. D.

EXPLANATION OF LABEL MARKS.

Some having complained that they do not know what the marks on labels mean, we will just say, "Jay" means January, and when it is followed by a figure "3" and reads "Jay3" it means your subscription expired the first day of January, 1883. "Feb" February, "Mar" March, "Apr" April, and "May" are well understood, but "Jun" meaning June seems to confuse some, and to be taken to mean January. "Jun" means June. "Jul" is July, "Aug" August, "Sep" September, "Oct" October, "Nov" November, and "Dec" December. The figure following the month stands for the year, "1" means 1881, "2" means 1882, etc. A postal card of inquiry will bring you any information you wish.

OBITUARIES.

CHAMBERLIN.—At Byron Center, Mich., April 7, 1887, Dr. Norman Chamberlin, aged 66 years.

The cause of his death was pneumonia. Dr. Chamberlin, with many others in his township, almost thirty years ago, embraced the "blessed hope" of the glorious coming and kingdom of Christ. For many years he and his excellent wife seemed to rejoice in hope of the glory of God at the resurrection of the just. During his extensive practice for some years past, he is said to have been very kind and charitable to the poor. Sister Chamberlin and several of the children are looking with strong faith for the return of the Nobleman bringing his reward with him. There was a large congregation at the funeral in the Methodist Church, who gave good attention to the gospel of the resurrection, immortality and glory of the celestial and spiritual bodies that are to live forever while they inherit the everlasting kingdom, having gained a final victory over the last enemy, death. 1 Cor. xv. The last look of the children on the face of a kind father was very affecting.

E. HOYT.

ANDERSON.—At Dixon, Ill., April 14, 1887, Sister Addie Anderson, daughter of Brother and Sister Anderson.

The cause of her death was heart disease. The funeral services were conducted at the home of her parents, by Brother G. M. Myers, of Lanark, Ill. Sister Addie was immersed into the all-saving name of Jesus Christ, one year ago last December. Previous to her baptism she was an earnest and diligent student of the word of God, and when sufficiently instructed in the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ, she became obedient. During the last two years of her illness the Bible was her constant companion and its sweet promises her consolation, so that when she became too weak physically to hold the sacred volume, she divided it into fragments so that its blessed words might still greet her eye. I would like to write something expressive of the lovely attributes of her Christian character, if perhaps I can look do so by penning a few of the gentle words of counsel which fell from her lips. Her prominent theme was the love of Jesus, how he [illegible] and the great promises of his coming to establish his kingdom and rule and reign in righteousness. Of what is earthly ambition in comparison. When receiving gifts from friends she would say, "Yes, it is very pleasant to receive them, but I would rather some one would sit down by my bedside and tell me of Jesus, and talk of all the good things he has promised."

Many were the admonitions expressed for the dear ones of the household of faith. Such as this: "Dear ones, heed Paul's reminder, 'Be not conformed to the world,' keep yourselves from idols; idols of riches, pleasure seeking, pride, and whatever your hearts are too fondly set upon. We can't be too strict; there is the straight and narrow way, no turning to the right or left, our eyes must be fixed on Christ, our hearts so full of him that there won't be room for earthly desires. Oh, let us so cherish the desire for the return of our Lord, that we may glory out in our longing, Oh, that thou wouldst rend the heavens and come down, whom my soul loveth. Finally, dear brothers and sisters may it be said of you, that your faith groweth exceedingly, and may the love of every one of you all toward each other abound, Be kindly affectionate one to each other." Such were the lessons of love sent to all the members of Christ's body by the dear sister we have recently laid to rest. They linger around us like the sweet perfume of a flower, we need not forget them for they are all found in that precious book of God, which should be the daily companion of each and every one of us.

The most precious promise of all the sweet promises in his word we claim for you, dear Sister Addie, as well as for all the rest who sleep in Jesus. It is this: "But I would not have you to be ignorant brethren concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not even as others which have no hope, for if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. "Asleep in Jesus, most beautiful and fitting words to express the final rest of the believer. Thus we leave you, dear Sister Addie, asleep in Jesus. Oh, how joyous will be the awakening.

THE POOR MAN'S HEAP.

He saw the wheat fields waiting
All golden in the sun,
And strong and stalwart reapers
Went by him one by one.
"O could I reap in harvest!"
His heart made bitter cry.
"I can do nothing, nothing,
So weak, alas, am I."

At eve, a fainting traveller
Sank down beside his door.
A cup of cool, sweet water
To quench his thirst he bore.
And when refreshed and strengthened,
The traveller went his way,
Upon the poor man's threshold
A golden wheat sheaf lay.

When came the Lord of harvest,
He cried, "Oh Master kind,
One sheaf have I to offer
But that I did not bind.
I gave a cup of water
To one athirst, and he
Left at my door, in going,
This sheaf I offer Thee."

Then said the Master softly,
"Well pleased with this am I.
One of my angels left it
With thee as he passed by.
Thou mayest not join the reapers
Upon the harvest plain,
But he who helps a brother,
Binds sheaves of richest grain.

The Belief of the Gospel and the "Good Confession" of Christ an Essential Condition of Salvation.

"The word is nigh thee, in thy mouth and in thy heart, that is the word of faith, which we preach: that if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation." Rom. x. 8, 10.

The word which Paul preached, and which must be believed in order to the future salvation, is, that God had raised Jesus from the dead as a pledge that he would literally raise his body, the church, at his second advent. Not only did the apostle preach the gospel of salvation at the coming of the Lord, but also the gospel of the reign of Christ on David's throne on Mount Zion. He quotes Isa. lii. 7, "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace, that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation, that saith unto Zion, thy God reigneth!" Paul then declares that faith in this gospel of salvation and kingdom, must come by hearing the word of God. How important then that this "word of the kingdom," and "eternal salvation," be preached correctly in the hearing of all who "have ears to hear." God's order is, first, hear and believe the "good tidings," unto a righteous life, and then make confession of Christ unto the "better resurrection" or salvation at the second appearing. Heb. ix. 28. Jesus said, Matt. x. 32, "Whosoever therefore shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven." Again, "Also I say unto you, whosoever shall confess me before men, him shall the Son of man also confess before the angels of God." Luke xii. 8.

We find that those who became disciples under the personal teaching of Christ and the apostles, in confessing Jesus, confessed two great cardinal truths. First, that he was the Son of God; second, that he was the King of Israel. Let us note a few examples. John the Baptist says, when he saw a certain sign which had been given him, "he bare record" that Jesus was the Son of God. Andrew, one of John's disciples, heard his testimony, and finding his brother Simon, he saith unto him, we have found the Messias, which is, being interpreted, the Christ, or Anointed. As David was anointed to be king of Israel by Samuel, some time before he became king, so Jesus has been anointed of God to be king on David's throne over the house of Jacob when the tribes of Israel shall be gathered out of their long captivity among all nations into their own land, and there recognise in Jesus their great Deliverer from their last greatest trouble, the true Messiah.

The next day, Philip, of the same city, became a disciple and finds his brother Nathaniel and says to him, "We have found him of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets did write, Jesus of Nazareth the son of Joseph." In view of the evidence that satisfied him, Nathaniel exclaims, "Thou art the Son of God, thou art the king of Israel." Here is a very strong confession of faith in the Sonship and Kingdom of Jesus, and a promise to him, "Ye shall see the heavens opened and the angels of God ascending from and descending to the Son of man." Diagloti.

Why did these men confess the Sonship? "Because the birth of Jesus fulfilled the prophecy, "Behold a virgin shall be with child and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Immanuel. Isa. vii. 14." Because, also, "the angel Gabriel was sent from God into a city of Galilee, named Nazareth, to a virgin espoused to Joseph and the virgin's name was Mary." This message, that Gabriel was sent to deliver to Mary was the most important that was ever brought to earth. It proves true beyond all reasonable doubt, that the confession of Nathaniel was true, "Rabbi, thou art the Son of God, thou art the King of Israel." "And the angel answered and said unto her, the Holy Spirit shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee; therefore also, that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God." "And the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David; and he shall reign over the house of Jacob (nation of Israel) forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end."

The Eunuch said to Philip before his baptism, "I believe Jesus Christ is the Son of God." Acts viii. 37. "And straightway he (Saul) preached Christ in the synagogues that he is the Son of God." Acts ix. 20. Peter's confession was the same, Acts xvi. 16, "Thou art the Christ (anointed King) the Son of the living God." Jesus calls him blessed, because his Father in heaven had revealed this fundamental truth to him, and "on this rock I will build my church and the gates of hades (grave) shall not prevail against it." Why will not the ponderous gates of death and the grave prevail against his church forever? Because he said to John after his ascension, "I am he that liveth and was dead; and behold I am alive forevermore, amen, and have the keys of hades and death." Rev. i. 18. Hezekiah, the king, uses the same phrase, "I said in the cutting off my days, I shall go to the gates of the grave." Isa. xxxviii. 10. These are the gates that shall be swung ajar. Jesus has procured the keys and he will shortly use them and unlock with the right hand of almighty power the massive gates of death. Then death will be swallowed up in victory. Then the redeemed church will shout, "O grave, where is thy victory?" "Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

Paul writes to Timothy (1 Tim. vi. 12) that "Christ Jesus witnessed a good confession before Pontius Pilate." This was the same confession that Jesus requires of all his disciples, which is "unto salvation." And Jesus stood before the Governor, and the Governor asked him saying, "Art thou the King of the Jews? And Jesus said unto him, thou sayest." Matt. xxvii. 11. At another time Pilate saith unto the Jews, Behold your King! But they cried out, away with him, crucify him. Pilate said, shall I crucify your king? The chief priests said, we have no king but Cæsar. "And Pilate wrote a title and put it on the cross. And it was this, Jesus of Nazareth, the king of the Jews." This was his confession. The chief priests were just as much opposed to his claim of being the Son of God. "And the high priest answered and said unto him, I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ, the Son of the living God." Jesus saith unto him, "Thou hast said," as much as to say, I am. He adds, "Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." Matt. xxvi. 63, 64. The high priest professed to be greatly shocked—rent his clothes and charged him with blasphemy, and they all said, "He is worthy of death." Thus we see that our Savior was crucified for his "good confession" that he was the Son of God, king of the Jews, and the second advent in the clouds of heaven. Shall we not make the same confession, cost what it may? "For whosoever shall be ashamed of me and of my words, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed when he shall come in his own glory and in his Father's, and of his holy angels." Luke ix. 26.

Utility and Goodness; Righteousness as Related to Both. Prayer as an Instrumentality. Why it Should Be Intelligent.

"That is a good thing." Good for what, is the immediate thought if not inquiry. There has been a tendency to ignore this principle universally recognized as applicable to everything secular, when common sense has attempted to apply it to things spiritual, and the result has been a grevious separation if not a complete divorce of religious good from religious utility in very much of the Christian teaching since the apostolic era of the church. The reawakening of the nineteenth century from the philosophical absurdities and foolish reasoning of the middle ages in secular affairs with the glorious results already so quickly achieved has stimulated inquiry as to whether the same principle does not obtain in the moral or spiritual science. To be explicit, if a leader has come forward since Bacon's time in any intellectual field portaining to secular affairs with his assertion of any preconceived good, he has been required to show the "why" and "what for" or, in other words, the specific utility inhering in the asserted good at least so far as "the temporalities" are concerned. But when the attempt has been made to invade the realm of the so-called "spiritualities" with the same test or law of admeasurement, "holy hands" have been raised and the warning cry of "sacrilege," "infidelity," "rationalistic speculation" has been too often heard, and not infrequently carnal weapons in the way of persecution and annoyance have been resorted to to repel these invaders "having zeal it is true, but without knowledge" their superstitious opponents say. Nevertheless it is just these utilitarian arguments that Paul says are the spiritual weapons in our warfare. This is exactly what he does say, namely, "For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but enabled by God to tear down strongholds, while we are tearing down thoughts (reasoning processes) and every high thing that lifteth itself up against one's comprehension of God, and while we are leading away captive every concept into obedience to the Christ, and while we hold ourselves in readiness to exact a reason for all one-sided obedience whenever your obedience hath been made full."

The "enabling" of these "spiritual weapons" it is plain to see is in the exact ratio of our own fulness in the way of obedience. In other words, if we have God's truth and it has subjected us to its requirements, there will come with this subjection and self-abrogation an enabling power from on high to effectually use it against any and all opposing error. Therefore the necessity, the absolute need of humanity as a first promise of effort, "Not I, but Christ in me." "Not my will but thine be done." Man is as it were a harp that good purpose tunes to the symphonic touch of the Almighty and he alone knows the compass of its harmonic powers. But he has said, this one condition of attunement (atonement) being fulfilled and "all things are yours;" "all things are possible." What a statement and what an assurance! How reasonable too, the requirement! How simple too the way. Give ear! Yield to the attending hand. Respond to the tentative touch of trial when God strikes the responsive chords of your heart. "Be willing in the day of his power" to be made a factor in the new notation of all things. To have this desire and to express it intelligently and with sincerity though very simply is the true utility in prayer. For you may be sure that that prayer will be answered. The fire will descend on that sacrificial as certainly as it did of old in another contest with Baal. But there must be "no halting betwixt two opinions" any more than there was then. There are priests of Baal now as there were then who cry all day long with laborious frenzy to the gods of their false concepts—gone, gone forever on their heathen journey to oblivion, and the question today addressed to you and me is just as pertinent as it was then, "Whom do you serve?" and the command just as imperative, "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve, God or Baal." And moreover, confess your choice and service, not profess it. Confess it in all humility. Confess it intelligently and without hypocrisy. Confess as Paul did that in you that is in the flesh, the human, the natural, there is nothing good when compared with the good spiritual. Confess that God as your Creator has a right to use you and that you are willing he should use you as an instrumentality to work out his beneficent end in a utility the scope of which you are wholly ignorant perhaps or at any rate only partially conscious of.

This is faith and the language of faith, and this is true prayer in all its different keys. Confess that you are God's others and let him play you when attuned to "the music of the spheres." Don't forget that your regeneration begins with "a renewing of your mind" either. For there can be no subjection of "the inordinate desires of the heart" except through a captivity of the will; and there is no will without choice; nor can there be any choice of "the two ways" except as God's word becomes "the lamp for your feet and the light for your eyes," and this too the eyes of your understanding. See to it that you see. Watch to keep the path when you have found it too. Fulfil the esoteric and exoteric watch. Watch within and without. Abjure your old self and with it all negations. For in Christ there are no negations. All things are possible. The dynamic power (or the dunamis) of God is yet available in Jesus the Christ. This was the significance of his anointing. It was with this dynamic power from on high that he was enabled to save, and that too to the uttermost. Moreover he was commissioned and enabled to distribute it to whom he will, and every one who has been truly regenerated or "begotten from above" has received an allotment in this distribution. This is God's sunousia, not "fellowship" or "communion" with persons but "partnership" with him and his Son, and all true saints in this conferment from on high, in this enabling power which comes when God's almighty will lays hold of your feeble good purpose with the tentative grasp of sanctified Spirit or spiritual means and agencies, not apart to thus accomplish his beneficent purpose in each particular case.

To man therefore in his finite nature and capacity abstract good brings no utility. He can no more know the graces of the Spirit through abstract reasoning about them than he can know natural life and its graces and glory without living. "Taste and see that God is good" embodies the first principle of the Christian philosophy. "The Just One will live on account of faith in me," not through or by means of this faith, but because this state of faith fulfills the conditions of life, any kind of life, whether it be natural or spiritual. How long will any one live unless he fulfils these conditions? He must at least yield to the instinctive desires and appetites which feed the life and sustain it, or he dies. Just so must he yield to the instinctive desires and appetites spiritual of his now regenerated nature if he would live, and if he is doing it he is in a condition of faith. Is God's word the bread of his daily life, then is he feeding on God. For the word of God is God in the sense of a dispensing power. For God himself is a Disposer and his word is an expression of himself as a living God beneficently disposed to impart life "and that too abundantly." But God will no more feed you or me the bread of life with a spoon than he does the natural bread. We can starve ourselves naturally or spiritually, and we can become lean or fat according as we fulfil the conditions of a life of faith. We can forever satisfy ourselves with the milk of the word or we can exercise our perceptive faculties so as to be able to discriminate between good and bad and so have an appetite for the strong food of the word which we are told is for spiritual adults.

God's word is good in the abstract; but it is good for nothing to you or me except so far as we assimilate it and make it our food. It is then no longer good in the abstract merely but it becomes a useful or utilitarian good, because it subserves a good purpose, and promotes man's righteousness—not righteousness in the abstract either but right-living and being.

God's word is not a fetich as too many still seem to suppose, but the embodiment of God's most useful thought in regard to man. In Genesis vi. 6, it does not say as we all have been taught to believe it to say that "God repented of having made man to be on earth." What it does say is as follows: "And God pondered deeply because he had made man to be on the earth and he thought it through." And we are told elsewhere that "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive what God hath purposed for those who love him." This then is the result of God's having thought the problem of man's destiny through to the end. He did first what he tells us as well as our common sense admonishes us as wise architects and builders we should do, and the object of the statement is to teach us by example as well as precept the most important lesson of life. Make your concept of good then a practical utility, my reader, and thus evolve righteousness or right-action. "Draw nigh unto God and he will draw nigh unto you." "Ask aright." Don't think of him or address him as a "ghost," but a real person and a real presence. Realize your comparative weakness in the flesh, and ask to be "Enabled" with "Sanctified spirit" from on high, not ghost-power from the world of the dead, and you will speedily realize a utility in religion which you have not before dreamed of in your philosophical theology.

THE COMING AGE,

—IS—

Nature and Proximity.

—BY J. P. WESTRUP.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern invention, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, politics, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $3.00. Send to this office for this work.

Paternity, Genealogy, Nature and Character of Jesus, in the Light of the Covenants; being two Lectures, with some Additions, Delivered at Wyoming, Delaware, by Dr. I. G. THOMAS.—No. 10.

"What think ye of Christ? Whose Son is he?" Matt. xxii. 42.

It has been supposed by some that Solomon by his disobedience and great sins, so forfeited the promise that the kingdom should be established forever in his line; and that the promised king and kingdom was therefore transferred to the Nathan line: and hence that Jesus was a descendant from David in the Nathan line and not of the Solomon line. Then again; others suppose it cannot be shown that Jesus descended from David in the Solomon line, according to the covenant with David, unless he was begotten by Joseph. But I shall, I think, set these matters all right; and hence the necessity of a careful and critical consideration of the covenants.

It is a great mistake to suppose and assume that the throne and kingdom of David was not to be established forever in the line of Solomon, if he was disobedient—or in other words; it is a great mistake that the establishment of the kingdom forever in the line of Solomon was promised on condition of his obedience. It was this way: If Solomon and his sons should be obedient and not turn away from the Lord and forsake him, then there should be no break, no suspension for the time being, no overturning and being no more until he come whose right it is. Had they been obedient, they would, one after another have been king on the throne of David, clear down to Christ. This is what was promised them on condition of obedience, and this privilege is what was forfeited. But the covenant that the throne of David should be established for ever in the line of Solomon—that a son or descendant of David through his covenanted son Solomon, should ultimately reign on his throne forever, still stands as sure as the throne of God. The fiat of the Almighty has gone forth to that effect,—the unconditional fiat—and the disobedience of puny man, cannot make it void or affect it. "And king Solomon shall be blessed, and the throne of David shall be established before the Lord forever..... And the kingdom was established in the hands of Solomon." 1 Kings ii. 44, 46. "My mercy SHALL NOT depart away from him as I took it away from Saul whom I put away before thee." 2 Sam. vii. 15. How did God take away his mercy and the kingdom, from Saul? As follows: "Samuel said to Saul, thou hast done foolishly: thou hast not kept the commandments of the Lord thy God, which he commanded thee; for now would the Lord have established thy kingdom upon Israel forever. But now thy kingdom shall not continue; the Lord hath sought him a man after his own heart, and David 1 Sam. xiii. 13. "Solomon, my Son, know thou the God of thy father and serve him with a perfect heart..... If thou seek him he will be found of thee, and if thou forsake him he will cast thee off forever." But not the promised, covenanted Son and Heir through him.

God said to David, "If thy children take heed to their way, to walk before me in the truth with all their heart, and with all their soul, there shall not fail thee (said he) a man on the throne of Israel." 1 Kings ii. 4. But Solomon, David's son, turned away from the Lord and Solomon's sons also, and the result followed just as God said; that is, there has been a failure of a man on the throne of Israel but not an utter failure. It is only for the time being. For God said, "Nevertheless my loving kindness will I not utterly take from him, nor suffer my faithfulness to fail. My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips." Psa. lxxxix. 33. What was it? Why it was, "Thou shalt have a son—Solomon." It was, "of all my sons he hath chosen Solomon," and his descendants, to sit upon the throne of the kingdom of the Lord over Israel. 1 Chron. xxviii. 5 "I will not alter it." But still "If his children forsake my law, then I will visit their transgressions with a rod, and their iniquity with stripes." Psa. lxxxix. 30. David's children did forsake his law and turned away from him, and he has been as good as his word, and has rent away the whole kingdom from both lines—from all of David's children (for they as a whole forsook God's law) and overturned it, and destroyed it until it is "no more." But it is not an utter destruction of it. No. No. That Son of David through Solomon—just according to the covenant—no "alteration of the thing."—"Once have I sworn, by my holiness that I will not lie unto David," that Son I say, has been begotten by Holy Spirit, the Power of the Highest, and born of the Virgin Mary, a descendant of David through Solomon just according to the covenant; has been crucified, dead, and buried, been raised incorruptible, and is gone to his Father, and is soon to return as he whose right it is to reign on the throne of David. All other descendants of David, except this royal Son, have had their right to the throne—all the right they had—forfeited and cut off by Solomon's disobedience of Jehoiakim (who cut out the leaves of the roll and burnt them, Jer. iii. 6,) and Coniah and Zedekiah. But all the right those descendants of David, children of Solomon, had to the throne, and all the right that was thus forfeited by Solomon and the others, was simply the right of occupying David's throne in the mean time, until the promised—the covenanted—Royal Heir should come.

The "writing Coniah childless," (Jer. xxii. 30,) was not that he should have no children, for he had; but it was that no son of his should occupy, or have the right to occupy the throne in the mean time, or during the interregnum, between that time and the coming of the rightful overlording heir of God. It said, "no man of his seed should prosper sitting on the throne of David ruling any more in Judah." Jer. xxii. 30. Accordingly he was taken at once, when he had reigned only three months, and carried to Babylon, where he remained a captive 36 years, and Mattaniah his uncle, instead of his Son, was made king in his stead, whose name was changed to Zedekiah; 2 Kings xxiv. 17–20; Jer. lii. 31; who was the last king of Israel. The Solomon line was the only line of heirs or kings which had the right to occupy the throne by virtue of the covenant, during the interregnum, as the line in which, by virtue of the same covenant, the royal neverdying Heir—Jesus—was to come. The first or temporary right, was forfeited; but that did not invalidate, or affect in the least, the latter—the unconditional right, the chief feature and object of the covenant.

"Remove the diadem, and take off the crown; this shall not be the same; (No more kings like this. The diadem, crown, and kingdom, when restored, shall not be the same in character, as this); exalt him that is low, and abase him that is high." Exalt Jesus, the one "despised and rejected of men," who said of himself, "I am meek and lowly;" Isa. liii. 3; Ezek. xvii. 24; Matt. xi. 29, and abase Zedekiah, then occupying the "high" position of king on the throne of David. Exalt Jesus. Not Jesus of "immaculate conception" (too much Catholic assumption, and ignorant superstition about this) but Jesus of "miraculous conception"—a very different thing, "Jehovah our righteousness,"—the "righteous Branch." (Jer. xxiii. 5-6. Isa. xl. 1.) "Jesus Christ of the seed of David," "the root and the offspring (or Branch) of David." Rev. xxii. 16.

Against as before said; it is understood by some that the throne and kingdom of David was, by the terms of the covenant, established with him forever, that is without end, unconditionally: but not so with Solomon: that with him it was conditional, and the condition was obedience. "That Solomon, as the head and representative of his line, was on probation for the throne and kingdom of David,..... for its everlasting continuance in his line.

But right here is the mistake, the misapprehension. The throne and kingdom of David, and that of Solomon, and of Israel, are one and the same. As one is established, so is the other. The unending establishment and continuance of the throne and kingdom, was forever secured by the unconditional terms of the covenant with David. We shall find by the careful examination of the Scriptures, which we shall soon make, that the conditional feature or part of the covenant, setting forth that for which Solomon and David's children (David's children) were on probation, was not the "everlasting continuance in his line," but the uninterrupted continuance. We shall find that it was not whether the rightful heir should be brought through the line of Solomon, or through the Nathan line; nothing of the kind. That was settled by the unconditional terms of the covenant. But we shall find it was whether there should be a "failure of a man on the throne of Israel"—a temporary failure, a break, or interruption. We shall find it was this that depended upon the obedience or disobedience of David's children—or Solomon and his children. We shall find it was whether or not God's chosen Nation—the children of Israel, should continue their uninterrupted occupancy of the chosen land—the territory of the kingdom, or whether they should be driven out, "cast off," "the sceptre depart," and their throne and kingdom be "overturned and become no more until he come whose right it is." It was this calamity that could have been averted by the obedience of David's children—Solomon and his children, and the people.

As before said, this covenant with David was simply an addition or development of the Abrahamic "everlasting covenant," (See Gen. xvii 7 and xxii. 16–18; Deut. iv. 23–31,) which contained the same two features—the unconditional and the conditional—corresponding exactly with the same features, as they appear in its further development when made with David. The unconditional promise made with Abraham is as follows. "I will establish my covenant between me and thee, and thy seed after thee in their generations for an everlasting covenant;.....and I will give unto thee and to thy seed after thee,.....all the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession;".....and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies." That is: all "the kingdoms of this world are to become his." Gen. xvi. 7, 8; xxii. 17. This is the unconditional part of the covenant. The conditional part of the covenant with Abraham is as follows. "Every man child shall be circumcised, and the uncircumcised man child shall be cut off from his people; he hath broken my covenant." "Take heed unto yourselves, lest ye forget the covenant,.....and shall do evil in the sight of the Lord thy God, to provoke him to anger. I call heaven and earth to witness against you this day, that ye shall soon utterly perish from off the land whereunto ye go over Jordan to possess it; ye shall not prolong your days upon it; but shall utterly be destroyed; and the Lord shall scatter you among the nations, and ye shall be left few in number," etc. ("Utterly perish" and "utterly destroyed" doubtless applied to individuals and not to the nation. That is, it applied to the "overmuch wicked." Eccl. vii. 16; among them, like "Korah and his company" and the fourteen thousand others who were destroyed at the same time, Num. xvi. 29–40.) "If thine heart turn away, so thou wilt not hear,.....I denounce unto you this day, that ye shall surely perish, ye shall not prolong your days upon the land whither thou passest over Jordan to go and possess it." Gen. xvii. 10–14; Deut. iv. 30–40; xvii. 18. "When thou (the children of Israel) art come into the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee and shalt possess it,.....thou (the people), shalt in any wise set him king over thee, whom the Lord thy God shall choose: (David Psa. lxxxix. 19) one from among thy brethren shalt thou set king over thee.....And it it shall be, when he (David) sitteth upon the throne of his kingdom, that he shall write him a copy of this law in a book,.....and it shall be with him, (David did as here required, as foretold by Moses over 300 years before; for he said thy law, thy commandments, "they are ever with me." Psa. cxix. 97, 98) and he shall read therein all the days of his life; that he may learn to fear the Lord his God, to keep all the words of this law and these statutes, to do them.....that he (David) turn not aside from the commandment, to the right hand, or to the left; to the end that he may prolong his days in his kingdom, he (David) and his children, in the midst of Israel." Deut. xvii. 14–20. Here we learn that David's uninterrupted continuance of his occupancy of his kingdom over Israel in his land, and the continuation of the people—(the conquests of the kingdom—in that land, depended upon the obedience of David and his children, and the people. He was obedient, his kingdom prospered and the Lord gave him rest round about from all his enemies; 2 Sam. vii. 1; and then made a covenant with him establishing the throne and kingdom with him and his sons, Solomon and Jesus, forever—without end—"The kingdom of the Lord in the hand of the sons of David." 2 Chron. xiii. 8.

It was thus permanently and endlessly established by the following unconditional clauses and terms of the covenant, and the like.

"I have exalted one chosen out of the people." Deut. xvii. 15. "The Lord God of Israel chose me (David) before all the house of my father to be king over Israel forever." 1 Chron. xxviii. 4. "I have made a covenant with my chosen, I have sworn unto David my servant: Thy seed will I establish forever, and build up thy throne to all generations.....His seed shall endure for ever, and his throne as the sun before me. It shall be established for ever as the moon." Psa. lxxxix. "Also the Lord telleth thee that he will make thee a house..... The Lord will build thee an house..... thine house (family—"house of David") and thy kingdom shall be established for ever before thee: (that is, in his presence, ultimately,) thy throne shall be established for ever"—and literally. 2 Sam. vii. 11, 16; 1 Chron. xvii. 10, 14, 16, 19, 25. "Behold a son shall be born to thee.....his name shall be called Solomon, (This being one of the unconditional clauses of the covenant; David's terrible sin in killing Uriah to get his wife, could not make it void, defeat it, or interfere with it; even though the sin was so horrible as to "give great occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme" —such enemies as Ingersoll). "And I will give peace and quietness unto Israel in his days. He shall build an house for my name; and he shall be my son and I will establish the throne of his kingdom." 2 Sam. vii. 12. "I will raise up thy seed after thee, which shall be of thy sons (Solomon or Jesus) and I will establish his kingdom. He shall build me an house, and I will establish his throne for ever. 1 Chron. xvii. 11–13. "And king Solomon shall be blessed and the throne of David shall be established before the Lord for ever.....And the kingdom was established in the hand of Solomon." 1 Kings ii. 44, 45. The Lord God of Israel gave the kingdom over Israel to David for ever, even to him and his Sons"—Solomon and Jesus. 2 Chron. xiii. 5. "My covenant will I not break nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips." Psa. lxxxix. 34.

I think the above clauses quite sufficient. It will be observed that they are all absolutely unconditional; and that they establish the throne and kingdom with David and Solomon and Jesus for ever—without end, without a single condition, and without any alteration. But although the kingdom is thus established to continue without an end; it does not necessarily follow that it was to continue without an interruption—without a temporary failure of "a man on the throne of Israel." Instead of that, the terms of the covenant, as expressed in various clauses distinctly show, that its unbroken continuance without "a failure of a man on the throne of Israel," from its occupancy by Solomon clear down to Christ's return, and occupancy as the never-dying Heir—depended entirely upon the obedience of David's children—Solomon and his children. Their obedience would secure, not the coming of the Royal Heir—David's spiritual Son in the line of Solomon instead of Nathan, not the neverending continuance of the throne and kingdom: these were secured by the unconditional terms of the covenant. (These were "the sure mercies of David." Isa. lv. 3; Acts xiii. 34.) It was their obedience would secure such continuance of the kingdom perpetually, that is, without an interruption or temporary failure, while their disobedience would result in a failure for the time being of "a man on the throne of Israel," a temporary vacancy, an interregnum, a "removing of the people out of the land, a temporary "casting off," "wasting away his (God's) people," and "house, out of his sight." See Rom. xi. 1, 15, 23; 1 Kings ix. 7, 1 Chron. xxviii. 9; Psa. lxxxix. 1; lxxvii. 7; lxxxix. 38; but not one word in the covenant, about "bringing the death less heir through another line"!! as has been said. Such an idea is all imagination resulting from a misapprehension and misunderstanding of the covenants. (The covenants are discussed in my book—"The law" etc. Pages 15–19, 86–147).

An Open Letter to Silas Henn.

Dear Brother:

In the article over your signature in THE RESTITUTION of April, 13th inst., I observe some statements to which I wish respectfully and in brotherly love, to call your earnest attention, since, it seems to me, they fall short of the fulness of the gospel. We are personally strangers, yet, by God's grace, old acquaintances and brethren, so that I hope you will pardon this intrusion. One statement referred to is this:

"In the Millennial age there will be at least two great companies of the saved, who while they stand closely related to each other will be in some respects entirely distinct. There will be the glorified Church, the elect race, the royal priesthood, the Lamb's wife, who will be co-heirs, co-rulers with Christ. These will be composed of the translated and resurrected saints, and they shall dwell in the holy city Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God, having the glory of God.

Then there will be the restored nation of Israel, dwelling in Palestine, the land of their fathers, and promised to them by solemn covenant, all righteous and holy under the restored theocracy, with prosperity and blessedness abounding all around," etc.

That there will be four grand divisions (classes) of the saved ones in the Millennial Period (Judgment era) and through the interminable Post-Millennial age succeeding it, instead of two as is is claimed, appears to me clearly set forth in the Word.

1st Class. The reconstructed (saved) nations, exclusive of Judah and Israel, scattering over the face of the earth, outside of the limits of Palestine and the Holy Land.

Proofs. "In the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people; but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever." Dan. ii. 44. "Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee; ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth, for thy possession." Psa. ii. 8. "And it shall come to pass that every one that is left of all the nations which came against Jerusalem, shall even go up from year to year to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, and to keep the feast of tabernacles," etc. Zech. xiv. 16. "And the seventh angel sounded; and there were great voices in heaven, saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ; and he shall reign forever and ever." Rev. xi. 15. "All the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord; and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee. For the kingdom is the Lord's; and he is the governor among the nations." Psa. xxii. 27, 28. "And in that day there shall be a root of Jesse, which shall stand for an ensign of the people; to it shall the Gentiles seek; and his rest shall be glorious." Isa. xi. 10.

2nd Class. Israel and Judah nationally restored to their own land, (Palestine)—the lot of their inheritance, never more to be removed.

Proofs. "For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits, that blindness (hardness in part is happened to Israel until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved." Rom. xi. 25, 26. "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord of hosts, that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a King shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved and Israel shall dwell safely: and this is the name whereby he shall be called, THE LORD OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS." Jer. xxiii. 5, 6. See also Jer. xxxiii. 14–26.

"Therefore thus saith the Lord God; Now will I bring again the captivity of Jacob, and have mercy upon the whole house of Israel, and I will be jealous for my holy name; after that they have borne their shame, and all their trespasses whereby they have trespassed against me, when they dwelt safely in their land, and none made them afraid. When I have brought them again from the people, and gathered them out of their enemy's lands, and am sanctified in them in the sight of many nations; then shall they know that I am the Lord their God, which caused them to be led into captivity among the heathen: but I have gathered them unto their own land, and have left none of them any more there. Neither will I hide my face any more from them: for I have poured out my Spirit upon the house of Israel, saith the Lord God." Ezek. xxxix. 25–29.

3d Class. The Disciples of our Lord and Savior, and probably also, those from among the Israelites who believe on him through their word: co-rulers under the Christ over redeemed Israel.

Proofs. "Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations. And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me: that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Luke xxii. 28–30.

"Then answered Peter and said unto him, Behold, we have left all and followed thee; what shall we have therefore? And Jesus said unto them, Verily I say unto you, That ye which have followed me, in the regeneration, when the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Matt. xix. 22, 28.

4th Class. The overcomers, taken out of the Gentile nations during the present dispensation; co-rulers, under the Anointed One, over the nations exclusive of Israel and Judah.

Proofs. "He that overcometh and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations: and he shall rule them with a rod of iron; as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers; even as I received of my Father." Rev. ii. 27. "And the kingdom and the dominion and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him." Dan. vii. 27. "And they sung a new song, saying; Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof: for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood out of every kindred and tongue, and people, and nation; and hast made us unto our God kings and priests: and we shall reign on the earth." Rev. v. 9, 10.

The brother will please notice the difference between the song of the saved,—of the ten thousand times ten thousand and thousands of thousands, and the rhapsody of the world inheritors. While the former sang with a loud voice, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing," and while every creature which is in heaven and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them were heard saying, "Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever," the latter in a grander, nobler, loftier strain rehearsed redemption's scheme, saying; "Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof," closing with the blest assurance of our not priests only, but "kings and priests unto God, and we shall reign on the earth."

I would call the brother's attention to that in relation to the "Millennial Age" as he terms it. He says, "It seems impossible even to conceive of any earthly blessing that is not promised in the Millennial Age. Every blessing that Adam and Eve enjoyed before the fall, will be enjoyed then, and there will be one blessing in the Millennial Age that our first parents did not have, that is, freedom from the power of Satan's temptations."

The Millennium, as I understand it, is not an Age, but a period, John informs us, of one thousand years' duration, for the last part of the present age, near the close of which "Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, and shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle: the number of whom is as the sand of the sea. And they went upon the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camps of the saints about and the beloved city: and fire came down from God out of heaven, and devoured them." (See Ezek. xxxix. for the full description of the slaughter.) An era of judgment in which all rule, and all authority, and power" must succumb to him that "sat upon the white horse, who was called Faithful and True,—The Word of God,—King of kings and Lord of lords,—who in judgment doth judge and make war,—followed by the armies which were in heaven, and out of whose mouth goeth a sharp sword, that with it he should smite the nations; treading the wine-press of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God. The judgment labors of that period are summed up in the 19th and 20th chapters of the Revelation, and close with the destruction of the devil that deceived, and of every form of evil and evil-doer. This period does not convey to my mind the enjoyment of every blessing granted to our first parents before the fall, but rather, elemental, social, moral, political and religious strife, culminating in the supremacy of righteousness, peace and love at the end of the judgment, when the last enemy to God and man shall have been destroyed. It, surely, will not be the period of earth-blessing to its fullest expectation, for the ages to come, with all their attendant splendors of universal peace, longevity, holiness, incorruptibility, perfection, and god-likeness, have been set apart, and with life's pellucid stream forever flowing, and life's fair tree shedding monthly an exuberance of immortalizing fruit and healing leaves, to ward off sickness and sorrow and pain and death from the earth-dwellers through the age of ages; as the full fruition of our firmest faith and fondest hope.

Hoping the foregoing may be received in the same spirit with which it is submitted, I am your brother in the faith and hope of the gospel.

Prejudice.

Prejudice is pre-judgment. It is forming an opinion without examining the facts; it is hastily accepting a conclusion without investigating the evidence upon which it rests; it is allowing ourselves to be hoodwinked and deceived, when the slightest reflection would keep us from such a mistake; it is being satisfied with hearsay, when we should demand the proof; it is rejecting everything at first sight, which does not confirm our former convictions or suit our former tastes or agree with our preconceived ideas; it is a revolt against the unpalatable and distasteful; it is a deep-seated reluctance to part with that to which we have been accustomed—a persistent hesitation to accept as true what we have not hitherto believed; a wicked unwillingness to admit that we can be wrong and others right. It favors or condemns upon the slightest pretext; it results or embraces as it is moved by caprice. It is not limited to persons—has to do with places, and creeds, and parties, and systems; hence its influence is extensive, and its evils manifold. Prejudice does not hold opinions; it is held by them. Its views are like plants that grow upon the rocks, that stick fast, though they have no rooting. It looks through jaundiced eyes; it listens with itching ears; it speaks in partial and biased accents. It clings to that which it should relinquish and relinquishes that to which it should cling. When beaten, it remains defiant; when disproved and vanquished, it is sullen and obstinate. There is nothing too low for its love, or too noble for its hatred; nothing is too sacred for its attacks, or too depraving for its aspersions. It is as old as it is universal, as unjust as it is unrelenting, as disheartening as it is [illegible]

EDITORIAL BREVITIES.

"The ointment of the right hand, which bewrayeth itself." Prov. xxvii. 16.

The perfume from the ointment attests its presence; the incense floating on the morning air demonstrates the existence of the queen of flowers—the summer rose. The swelling bud of spring-time bespeaks the life of the tree, the shrub, and the vine. So if there be an inwrought life of Christ in the human heart, it will manifest itself in the outward life. Of a tree, that shows no expanding bud under vernal influences, we say, "It is dead." Equally true may it be said of that faith that never shows itself in outward manifestation, "it is dead." To talk about a secret Christian is as great an absurdity as to talk about a live fossil. The inward life, in the natural world, always displays itself outwardly; and the same is true of the supernatural, divine life.

NEW LIGHT ON A DIFFICULT PASSAGE.

"For thus saith the Lord God, my people went down aforetime into Egypt to sojourn there; and the Assyrian oppressed them without cause." Isa. lii. 4.

Barnes, in commentating on this text, says: "A considerable variety has existed in the interpretation of this passage. The LXX. render it, 'and to the Assyrians they were carried by force.' Some have supposed that this refers to the oppression that they experienced in Egypt, and that the name 'Assyrian' is here given to Pharaoh. So Forerius and Cajetan understand it. They suppose that the name 'the Assyrian' became in the apprehension of the Jews, the common name of that which was proud, oppressive, and haughty, and might therefore be used to designate Pharaoh.

But there are insuperable objections to this. For the name 'the Assyrian' is not elsewhere given to Pharaoh in the Scriptures, nor can it be supposed to be given to him but with great impropriety. It is not true that Pharaoh was an Assyrian; nor is it true that the Israelites were oppressed by the Assyrians while they remained in Egypt." In the light now shed upon Egyptian History from inscriptions on the monuments, and from other sources of proof, it appears that Rameses II, whose mummified body was discovered in the summer of 1881 at Dayr-el-Bahara, in Egypt, and which was unrolled last summer in the Bulaq Museum at Cairo, was of Semitic descent on his father's side, and on that of his mother, directly of Assyrian descent. There is no doubt existing at the present time as to Rameses II. being the Pharaoh of the oppression—the "King that knew not Joseph." The countenance, facial angles, and the shape of the dead Monarch's head are in perfect agreement with the sculptured statuary that was so accurately made of him more than 3300 years ago. The latest evidence in proving that this Pharaoh was an ASSYRIAN, and that Isaiah's language is literally true. Floods of light have been thrown upon questions of old antiquity since Barnes wrote his Commentaries.

PAUL'S MINISTRY.

"For I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God." Acts xx. 27.

Although we have clearly enough shown, in our preceding articles, that Paul, as an apostle of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles, taught them explicitly that they were under no obligation whatever to observe the Jewish, or seventh-day Sabbath, there are still other considerations to be weighed by those who so persistently urge the observance of this sign of the old covenant between God and Israel upon those who are in that new relation to God that the new covenant confers on all who obey the gospel of the Son of God.

ministry, has faithfully declared all the counsel of God, and teach, as we, in our preceding articles, have shown that he did teach regarding the Sabbath, if it be an institution as binding upon those under the new covenant as it was upon those under the old. Paul claims, however, to have been faithful, both in his instructions and warnings to the churches. His own declarations are, "I kept back nothing that was profitable unto you, but have showed you, and have taught you publicly, and from house to house. Therefore watch and remember, that by the space of three years I ceased not to warn every one night and day with tears." Acts xx. 20, 31.

Now if failing to keep the Sabbath of the ancient covenant be a sin, Paul certainly would never have used the language that we have already called attention to in our foregoing numbers. We have shown that Paul, so far from charging the disciples of Christ to strictly observe the Sabbath, has taken the directly contrary course, and taught them that its observance was a matter of no consequence, that no one had any right to judge them concerning its observance, and, in fact, that a superstitious regard for the day was detrimental to perfect faith in Christ. It is for us now to show that Paul has not failed to particularly specify what is sinful under the arrangements of the new covenant. We have looked over his fearful catalogues of crimes and sins till we have found something like sixty distinct Greek terms employed in enumerating transgressions, and, although the list be so large and specific, there is not the remotest hint to anything like Sabbath-breaking. That our readers may see that Paul was not remiss in pointing out what was sinful, we give his warning lists of what constitutes crime under the New Covenant.

"Being filled with all unrighteousness, fornication, wickedness, covetousness, maliciousness; full of envy, murder, debate, deceit, malignity; whisperers, backbiters, haters of God, despiteful, proud, boasters, inventors of evil things, disobedient to parents, without understanding, covenant-breakers, without natural affection, implacable, unmerciful; who, knowing the judgment of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them." Rom. i. 29-32.

"But now I have written unto you not to keep company, if any man that is called a brother be a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolator, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner; with such a one no not to eat." 1 Cor. v. 11.

"Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? Be not deceived; neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind, nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God." 1 Cor. vi. 9, 10.

"Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these; adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, envyings, murders, drunkenness, revellings, and such like; of the which I tell you before, as I have also told you in time past, that they that do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God." Gal. v. 19-21.

"For this ye know, that no whoremonger, nor unclean person, nor covetous man, who is an idolator, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God." Eph. v. 5.

"Mortify therefore your members which are upon earth: fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affection, evil concupiscence, and covetousness, which is idolatry; for which things sake the wrath of God cometh on the children of disobedience. In the which ye also walked sometime, when ye lived in them. But now ye also put off all these; anger, wrath, malice, blasphemy, filthy communication out of your mouth. Lie not one to another, seeing ye have put off the old man with his deeds." Col. iii. 5-9.

"Knowing this, that the law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly and for sinners, for unholy and profane, for murderers of fathers and murderers of mothers, for manslayers, for whoremongers, for them that defile themselves with mankind, for menstealers, for liars, for perjured persons, and if there be any other thing that is contrary to sound doctrine." 1 Tim. i. 9-10.

"This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God; having a form of godliness but denying the power thereof; from such turn away." 2 Tim. iii. 1-5.

Our readers cannot fail to observe, that, with barely one exception, all acts of transgression enumerated in the ten commandments, and made sinful by the Sinaitic Covenant, are enumerated in the above lists, and by the apostle declared to be crimes that will exclude from the kingdom of God. Indeed, the ten commandments specify but comparatively few of the sins contained in Paul's dark catalogues of crime. In carefully defining and warning against scores of crimes he has studiously omitted saying anything about any such transgression of law as Sabbath-breaking.

If then the fourth commandment, on the tables of testimony, "outshines" all the other precepts of the decalogue, if observing the Sabbath at the present time constitutes such a badge of distinction as to place the "seal of the living God" upon its votaries, and if to neglect its observance and keep the first day of the week in honor of the resurrection of the world's Redeemer, constitutes the "mark of the beast," Paul, to say the least, has made a signal failure in his efforts "to declare all the counsel of God." It is plain enough that Paul and modern Sabbatarians are in diametrical antagonism; and in choosing the alternative, as to whom we should follow, we decide to take the apostle for our guide. We are so mentally constituted, that we must say, that it is of no use to tell us that the keeping of the seventh day, as a Sabbath, is just as obligatory under the New Covenant as it was under the Old, with the fact before our minds that Paul is so careful to define all transgressions, as to employ more than three-score distinct Greek words in pointing out everything contrary to Divine Law, and omit from the list the crime of Sabbath breaking. It is easy enough for us to see that this very course was designedly taken, when speaking of the Old Covenant, as he did, having been "done away in Christ."

It will be seen that our obligations to moral law are by no means set aside by placing us "under law to Christ" in the arrangements of the New Covenant.

My Experience in a Cyclone.

I was in the city of Prescott, Kan., on April 21, 1887. Having a contract to plant shade trees for the city, I was caught in this terrible visitation. Had finished the day's work and eaten supper at the Prescott House, intending to go home that night, but on looking out we saw the monster approaching a little to the north of west. For some little time no one could tell whether it would take in the town or not, as it would seem to veer to the north, then to the south. But in this suspense we were not long held. When the first blast struck the northwest of the city we rushed into the hotel, and Mr. Ford, the landlord, shut the door and called to all to go to the south end of the house. They started and I followed in the rear, but before we reached the south end it was hurled out by a suction in a flash. I saw Mrs. Ford and the Editor of the Prescott Eagle go as if shot out of a cannon. Just then I was lifted from the floor and hurled end over end, or, in other words, twisted into a heap, and I remembered passing out of the house without any effort on my part.

Then there was a short time, perhaps twenty or thirty seconds, that I was unconscious of what was going on. When I recovered consciousness I was lying in the back yard on some lumber, my coat blown over my head and my hat gone. Just then there was a lull and it was as still as death. I was breathing as if the air was from the mouth of a furnace. But this lull was of short duration. I got up as best I could and got into a box shanty used for a coal house, some eight paces from where I found myself. But before I reached the coal house, lumber and missiles were whizzing past me thick as hail. But from this frail shanty I took in the scene as best I could. The monster in the heavens from which the work of destruction proceeded, was then, as it appeared to me, over or a little west of the line of the railroad. Shots seemed to be fired in front, in the rear, and on either hand, as if the moving monster was bent on doing its work effectually. Buildings were being crushed as easily as you would crush an egg with a ten-pound weight. Roofs and sides and ends of frame houses were flying in the heavens in all directions, and the space from ten to one hundred feet seemed literally filled with the wreck.

But who can describe the indescribable? It was destruction intensified. But I set out to give my experience. When the storm abated my flesh and nerves were tingling with electricity. I felt no pain and knew not that I was hurt until I approached a prostrate man and stooped over him to feel his pulse, when a sharp pain was felt in my right side, and before I had made the round to learn as to the loss of life, I was in great pain and very weak. No bones were broken, but the muscles of my chest, back and shoulders seemed to have been twisted out of shape, and I am still very sore.

But some of the faith may wish to know how it went with the brethren here. I will state that old Brother Deming's house was wrecked. (This is the blind brother.) He and Sister Deming were badly bruised. Their son's wife and children were with the old people at the time and were all bruised more or less. Brother D. B. Blocch's barn and orchard were destroyed and his stone house badly damaged. Brother Miller's store house was almost a wreck. Brother G. T. Kenson's barn was a bad wreck, and the roof and one side of his dwelling was destroyed. The writer lost his hat and fifty dollars; this was money that I had gotten together to pay a debt, but was taken from a side pocket, probably when I was fired out of the hotel.

The brethren here had secured by lease the use of the Baptist church house for the first half of each month for four years. It was taken from the foundation, moved some two rods, and badly damaged. But as we expect Brother Foore tomorrow (May 1st) we yesterday cleaned it up as best we could, and hope to meet tomorrow. And now having heard so many expressions from religious persons as to the why's and wherefores, I would write of pending judgments, but my hand-writing is so poor it is too much to ask of an editor or printer to get it in shape for the press. Believing that the kingdom of God is at hand let us calmly do our every duty, trust in God and abide the issue.

To the Church of God in Christ Jesus Greeting.

"Let the righteous smite me, it shall be a kindness; let him reprove me, it shall be as oil upon my head; let not my head refuse it." Psa. cxli. 5.

In RESTITUTION of Feb. 9, 1886, I expressed some thoughts on 1 Cor. xv. 22, which were criticised in that paper of March 23d, under the caption, "Explanation of a Misunderstood Text." I now write, not for the sake of argument, but because the explanation given is not satisfactory; and I speak for others as well as myself. It is not satisfactory because not sustained by Scripture proof, nor does it accord with the accepted use of language. We all know that the word race, as used in the Scripture, has no reference to the human family, but to the act of running, etc. One of our best standard authorities defines the word race, "The descendants of a common ancestor, a family, tribe, people or nation, presumed to belong to the same stock." Under this authority I said there were two races mentioned in the text referred to, and defined them as, first, those coming from the first Adam as his natural descendants or stock; and second, those who entered into Christ by faith, and were his spiritual stock or family.

The apostle's great argument in 1 Cor. xv. is to prove the re-surrection of those who are in Christ, by the resurrection of Christ himself; and there is not in the entire chapter one word said of the resurrection of any but those who are in Christ. This fact is very clearly set forth in verse 23, "But each in his own order, afterward (or next) they that are his at his coming." This is too plain and positive to need comment. The phrase "in Christ," as used in the word, always expressed the thought of union with him by living faith. There is no other way of entering into the Christ. Faith is the only possible means of becoming related to the Christ; and hence through the exercise of faith in him our life is hid with Christ in God, and when he who is our life shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory.

The ungodly are not in Christ, either by generation or by faith, and hence they cannot be included in the all, as used in verse 23. It will not do to twist the entire range of God's purpose in redemption, to accommodate it to our peculiar views of the little word all, which throughout the Scriptures is used indefinitely, and always circumscribed by the context where it is used. See Luke iii. 16-21; John iv. 39, etc. There is no other life spoken of in 1 Cor. xv. than that which is incorruptible, glorious, powerful and spiritual, verses 42-45, and this is the life which is hidden with Christ, and which will be manifested when he appears, but, in this life, none have a part only those who have become united to Christ by a living faith. The death is circumscribed by the first Adam; the life is circumscribed by the second Adam. As all that are in the first Adam through natural generation, die, because they inherit a mortal, dying nature, so all that are in the Christ, by regeneration, shall be made alive, for he himself has said, "Because I live, ye shall live also," John xiv. 19; and he did not speak this to the world, but to "his own," and again he says to the opposite party, "Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life." John v. 40.

Here we see that life is made dependent, entirely dependent, on coming to Christ, and none can deny that the only way to come to him is by faith. Very true Paul is here talking of the resurrection, of the waking out of the sleep of death, into the life to come, as represented in 1 Thes. iv. 16. "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first. Then we, the living, who are left over, shall at the same time with them, be caught away in clouds, that I had gotten together to pay a debt, but was taken from a side pocket, probably when I was fired out of the hotel.

There is no mention made in the book of any change of life after the resurrection. The resurrection is merely the act of standing up. But the condition of those who are called forth to stand up, is very clearly set forth by Paul as already quoted, and by the Master himself in Luke xx. 35, 36. "But those deemed worthy to obtain that age and that resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage, for they can die no more; because they are like angels, and are sons of God, being sons of resurrection." Nothing can be more clearly expressed than is the grand, leading truth of Revelation as given here by our Divine Lord. It completely silenced the cavilling Sadducees. It is simply this, first, the resurrected ones die no more; second, the fact of resurrection constitutes them the sons of God.

Let us take the Master at his word in preference to any commentator, whether ancient or modern. Commentators are not inspired, and those given as authority on 1 Cor. xv. 22 are very unreliable in their deductions of Scripture on fundamental points of doctrine. For example, Albert Barnes, in his "Notes on Rev. xx. 14," "And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire, which is the second death," says, * * * "The idea is that death considered as the separation of soul and body, will exist no more. The righteous will live forever, and the wicked will linger on in a state never to be terminated by death. * * There would be death still, but a second death differs from a first, in the fact that it is not a separation of soul and body, but a state of continual agony like that which the first death inflicts—like that in intensity, but not in kind. * * * "There is no evidence that John meant to affirm that the second death would imply an extinction of existence. Death never does mean that. The word does not naturally and properly convey that idea" We should like to know if existence does not cease at death why it is that we are told in the word that "the dead know not anything."

I leave this comment on Rev. xx. 14 for the consideration of the readers of THE RESTITUTION. I might add many, many equally absurd comments from the authorities quoted in the article under consideration, but I deem it a waste of time and space. Let us have the word of life and let us have it in its purity, remembering that it is written, "The wisdom of this world is foolishness with God;" and, too, it is written, "Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise." There is no wound given that this oil might be required to heal. Therefore let us apply it to lubricate the machinery by which we extract the precious truths contained in the exhaustless mine of revealed truth.

CARRIE WILLIAMS.

WHY REJECT THE BIBLE?

In our daily intercourse with people, we find many with strange, contradictory and inconsistent notions. They do not care for the Bible, there is nothing of hope in it for them; its gracious promises are all trampled under foot. They do not want to be talked to about it, and yet,—they cling to its precepts of morality and of decency; they are, in uprightness of life, just what the Bible has made them. They cannot tolerate swearing; lying is an abomination; dishonesty abhorred; vice in all its awful shades is looked upon with horror, their children are brought up with the same feelings of disgust for the wrong, and why?

Because it is but honorable even among worldly people, to throw the restraining chains of virtue aside. They would be respected, they would have their children stand high in the opinion of men, and for this and just so far, they can come under Bible precepts. But when the future is to be attained, when a world of happiness and of exceedingly beauty is at stake, when a life of never-ending duration hangs in the balance, they don't want to hear about it! They will do nothing, they make a mock of it all! They want to be let alone. But God will not let them alone. His long-suffering may endure for a time, he may be patient, waiting for them to repent, but by and by the thrones will be set and judgment will come, and they will be called upon to answer for the deeds done in the body. Why reject the Bible? Why throw away the glorious gifts it proffers to you? Why persistently close your eyes and shut your ears to the blessed message of salvation? Oh, I thank God every day that he has shown me the truth, and given me a heart to accept it. I thank him for "the glorious gift of his love," that he is going to save me, unworthy as I am, through the blood and righteousness of his dear Son.

The respect and esteem of men are as nothing to the honors that will be given to God's redeemed children. You are upright in the eyes of men, that you may be honored of men. Why not be upright in God's eyes that you may be honored of him and of the holy angels in the world to come?

WHAT ISRAEL MIGHT HAVE BEEN.

"For all sad words of pen or tongue
The sad as are these, it might have been."

This expressive thought of the poet was suggested to me this morning on reading the 28th chapter of Deuteronomy. In this significant chapter blessings and curses are set in sharp array against each other.

How beautifully is God's loving intention toward his people expressed in the first verse! "It shall come to pass," reminded me of a bridge over which God meant to send a heavenly caravan, laden with his choicest blessings for the people he had chosen for his own. Beloved though they were, they were apprised of the fearful fact that they should forfeit these blessings, if they disobeyed God's commandments, and instead of blessings curses would follow thick and fast upon their devoted heads. Alas, that sacred historians were compelled to record Israel's failure to measure up to the divine requirement.

It seems as if angel hands were just outstretched to draw aside a curtain that would permit us to gaze upon such a scene as never ravished human gaze before.

It was as if the beneficent Creator would even remove the taint of sin and its dreadful consequences from a chosen race and setting his favored ones "on high above all nations of the earth," he would make them an example to the world of happiness, prosperity and perfection.

"And all these blessings shall come on thee and overtake thee if thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God," is suggestive of an overflowing abundance of blessings, such as no race nor nation has ever enjoyed, for God honored Israel as he never honored any other nation; but this wayward people said by their actions that they would not accept of heaven's choicest gifts on the condition of obedience to God's laws. His promises are conditional, for how utterly unfit are we to receive showers of heavenly blessings, if we give nothing in the way of loving service and obedience to the Lord in return for his matchless gifts!

In reading the verses beginning with the magic words, "blessed" and "the Lord shall" the sad history of the world, since the Adamic curse rested upon it, seems just about to be rolled back like a scroll, that everybody might see what "might have been" if Israel had not been "weighed in the balance and found wanting."

Since the grandest possibilities of the Jews were not realized, their golden opportunity of being the royal nation of the world was sacrificed, for the people bent on sinning, resolved to worship strange gods and degenerated into wretched captives to a heathen power; by this most unfortunate choice, what a valuable lesson has been lost to the world, and how it has suffered ever since by Israel's fall! The church, intended ever to be in the ascending scale and to seek to carry the world with her, is not to-day where she would have been, if Israel had not spurned the offer of the kingship or supremacy, tendered by the King of kings to the Jewish nation. For the sake of this chosen nation, and that the divine glory might be signally manifest, curses entailed by the sin of our first parents would have been removed and the prosperity of liberated Israel would have become the wonder and the talk of the whole world; our imaginations can but very faintly picture what this unparalleled prosperity might now be, for heaven has not yet been transferred to earth and never will be till we reign with Christ in millennial glory.

The thoughts soar to such wondrous heights, when we think of God's loving kindness in trying to elevate the Hebrew nation so high above all others, that it is painful to let our minds dwell upon the curses described to the latter part of the chapter referred to. Oh, what a great gulf lies between the blessings and the curses! God grant that the latter may be speedily abolished.

It is comforting to remember that he has not utterly cast away the people whom he foreknew, though like broken branches they are scattered over the earth. Praise God for the precious promise that these "natural branches will be grafted into their own olive tree" for a Deliverer has come out of Zion and "shall turn ungodliness from Jacob." The branches that were broken off because of unbelief are "beloved for the father's sake," and the sun will restore them, making "the olive tree" to which they belong the joy and crowning beauty of the whole earth. Oh, how Christian hopes and efforts should converge toward this grand consummation! It is our privilege and duty to "pray for the peace of Jerusalem" and in doing so, we will promote our own spiritual prosperity. A blessed incentive is set before us, for little by little the veil over Israel's heart is being lifted, and by and by it will be entirely removed. Our faith joined to fervent piety can help to remove it.

Let us be true to God's ancient people, and earnestly, lovingly, seek to woo them to our dear Savior—the long promised Messiah of whom their Prophets spake and sang.—Mrs. Mary Grant Cramer, in Hebrew-Christian.

Brother J. R. Willett, of Sunset, Texas, wishes to correspond with any brethren living near Oakland, Oregon. Any brother near there please address Brother Willet as above.

Read our book list—The Emphatic Diaglott reduced from $4.00 to $2.50. Cruden's Complete Concordance to the Bible, for $1.50. Smith's Bible Dictionary only $1.50. Views and Reviews in Eschatology—the last work of J. H. Pettingell—for $1.00. Do not fail to secure this book, it is good, and worth double the price asked for it. Tracts for distribution by the pound for 60 cents.

"The Unpeasable Gift," by J. H. Pettingell, is now offered at one-half price. We have 500 copies of this work and should like to have them all taken in the next three months. This book contains absolutely conclusive proof of Life only in Christ, and as a missionary is ahead of anything published. If you do not need it yourself, don't you know a friend who could read it to good advantage? It will only cost a few cents to place it in his hands, and who can tell the good that may come of such a little effort on your part. We want to place a quantity of these books in the hands of missionary workers in this and other lands, and for this purpose will open a fund of free will gifts. Those of our friends who wish to take part in this missionary work may do so. The door is open, and though we do not urge this upon our brethren (for it should need no urging) we will just say, the privilege is yours.

THE UNPEASABLE GIFT.

A fund of free will donations to send the above named work to mission workers in this and other lands.

ALL THAT ARE IN THEIR GRAVES.

"All that are in their graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth."

The day, the hour comes on apace,
When all the sleeping human race,
From sea and land, from height and plain,
At Jesus' voice shall wake again,
All shall come forth as he hath said,
The good, the ill, the mighty dead.

The good, a glorious, shining band,
To live the life of Eden land;
To take the thrones of earthly sway,
When all the nations shall obey,
And make fair Eden's fruits and flowers
Abound through all this world of ours.

And yet the judgment speedeth on,
Another day, and hour, to come!
Ungodly men must hear their doom,
Must stand before the awful throne!
Condemned! condemned! they now give ear
To voice they once refused to hear!

No tomb so deep, but trumpet there
To sinful one that voice will bear;
None can the awful summons flee,
For scattered dust shall gathered be;
And all ye wicked, cruel men,
Shall ye come forth to die again!

None can escape the arm of him
Who sits between the cherubim,
You work for sin, life's little day,
And on the morrow, take your pay!
And yet you knew the wage for sin
When first its path you entered in!

Two resurrections set before
The eyes of men, an open door;
The one to life and joy makes room,
The other leads to hopeless tomb.
'Tis death or life, as good or ill,
We keep or break the Father's will.

Then come to Jesus while you may,
And all the words of life obey,
That he the Living and the True,
May give the endless life to you,
May with that first and shining band
Give place in Resurrection Land!

THE TEN COMMANDMENTS, THE COVENANT.

Dear Restitution:

As it is evident that we are living at the very near approach of the end of this dispensation, and also among so many creeds and different beliefs, I deem it my duty to give to the readers of the dear RESTITUTION a few thoughts on the fourth command, or Jewish Sabbath under the old covenant, as it is a point of Scripture that is agitated here almost as much as the immortality of the soul. The question arises in my mind first, is the fourth command binding on mankind in this dispensation, under the new Mediator (which is Christ)? Can we prove beyond a doubt that the ten commandments, or law of God, or covenant (as the advocates of that doctrine hands us, two separate laws for convenience sake, which we will notice in their respective places) are done away? We can find the ten commandments in Exodus 20th chapter handed down from God, through Moses, the first Mediator, to the children of Israel. What part of the plan of God do the ten commandments comprise? This is very essential to know before going any further. Let us turn to Exo. xxxiv. 27, 28, "And the Lord said unto Moses, Write thou these words; for after the tenor of these words I have made a covenant with thee and with Israel, and he was there with the Lord forty days and forty nights. He did neither eat bread nor drink water: and he wrote upon the tables the words of the covenant. The ten commandments."

The ten commandments! Could language be made any plainer than this? Well this is just what we want to know, whether the ten commandments is the covenant, or the law of God, or both, given to the children of Israel in the Old Testament Scriptures. Let us examine carefully a little further. See Deut. iv. 13. "And he declared unto you his covenant which he commanded you to perform; even ten commandments. And he wrote them on two tables of stone." Here we have the same commandments, written on two tables of stone, and also the very same covenant. Can we yet be mistaken as regarding to what the ten commandments are? Let us seek diligently God's word and see if it will not lead us to the true light. Deut. iv. 9, 11, "When I was gone up into the mount to receive the tables of stone even the tables of the covenant which the Lord made with you, then I abode in the mount forty days and forty nights. I neither did eat bread nor drink water; and it came to pass at the end of forty days and forty nights, That the Lord gave me the two tables of stone, even the tables of the covenant." Once more, ch. v. 2, 3. "The Lord our God made a covenant with us in Horeb. The Lord made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us even us, who are all of us here alive this day." Dear reader, remember this is the Lord that was speaking to the children of Israel through Moses. Have we not established a fact here, in the foregoing Scripture, that is impregnable; that the ten commandments are the covenant?

Please bear in mind this covenant was not made with their fathers; consequently their fathers were not subject to that covenant. Will the reader please turn with me to Exodus xxiv. 12, and we can readily see that covenant, and all the duties involved in that covenant. It reads, "and the Lord said unto Moses; come up to me into the mount, and be there, and I will give thee tables of stone and a law and commandments which I have written, that thou mayest teach them." Who here is the covenant that the children of Israel should remember and obey throughout their generation, and if they did not, they were subject to the penalties of that covenant. I am not appealing to the law, but will notice it hereafter. Could language be fitted more appropriate to point us to the ten commandments than this? I think our readers can understand the foundation upon which we have located the first covenant. We will see if we cannot find another one. If not we will have to adopt the first. Let us see. "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah; not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day that I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt. Which, my covenant they break, although I was a husband unto them, saith the Lord." Jer. xxxi. 32, 33. Dear brethren, here it looks as though we have a second covenant. Please notice the addition to this one. There is the house of Judah mentioned in the second one. This looks to me to come closer to home than the first one. Let us learn more about this one. Heb. viii. 6, 8. "But now he hath obtained a more excellent ministry, by how much also he is the Mediator of a better covenant, which is established upon better promises." This seems to be in perfect harmony with the preceding verse; and surely it is an improvement on the first. Let us hear all about the second covenant it is so interesting to the house of Judah, we cannot wait. "For if that first covenant had been faultless there should no place been sought for the second. In that he saith, a new covenant, he hath made the first old. Now that which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away. This is the covenant that I will make with them after those days, saith the Lord. I will put my laws into their hearts, and in their minds will I write them." vii. 13, 16.

This is enough to convince me of a second covenant. We will see that the house of Judah was left out in the first, the second takes in the house of Judah and is based on faith and is perfect. Even as Abraham believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness, "Know ye therefore that they which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham. That the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ. That we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith." Gal. vi. 7, 14.

Right here we have found out who is the Mediator of the new covenant. Our dear Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. It covers the whole ground, Jews and Gentiles, and all races included under the whole heaven; all one in Christ Jesus who gave his life for the sins of the whole world, that he might be Mediator of the new and perfect covenant. "I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me, and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God." Gal. xxvi. 20. Brethren are not these words strong enough for us who are living and trying to serve God at the present? For my part I prefer to live under the new covenant. It surely is broad enough to meet all of our requirements in this age. See Gal. iv. 22 to 31. I commend it to a careful reading, Jesus is the author and finisher of my faith. How could this be if I were under both old and new covenants? also one Lord, one faith, one baptism. Just as soon as we own Christ, as the Alwise Father has doclared him, to have all power in heaven and earth, then all is plain. We can discover to a certainty in the following language, that Christ is in no way concerned in the old covenant. We will read 2 Cor. iii, 7, 8. "But if the ministration of death, written and engraven in stones, was glorious, so that the children of Israel could not steadfastly behold the face of Moses for the glory of his countenance, which glory was to be done away, how shall not the ministration of the Spirit be rather glorious?" Here we have a better and more perfect explanation than we can give. Whatever the first was, gives way to the second, and if the second is the present covenant, of which Christ is the Mediator, just so surely Moses was the Mediator of the first. There is no evading this conclusion to my mind. I think it will be proper at this point to learn which commandments in the new covenant correspond and harmonize with the old. We will find them in Romans xiii. 9. For this "Thou shalt not commit adultery. Thou shalt not kill. Thou shalt not steal. Thou shalt not bear false witness. Thou shalt not covet. And if there be any other commandment it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Where is the fourth command? I am not questioning the law. Paul certainly knew what he was saying in regard to the commandments or covenant, if the fourth command is so essential unto salvation, should not Paul have given the fourth commond here? It seems to me this would have been a very good place to have made it known. Not here nor anywhere else in the New Testament, just simply because it does not belong to the new covenant. "For if that which is done away, was glorious, much more that which remaineth is glorious."

We are told that Christ kept the Sabbath when here and that he went to the Jewish assemblies to preach. I read it very differently. You will hardly find a time when they meet together, but what the Jews upbraided the Savior for breaking their Sabbath, healing the sick, plucking the wheat, etc. Why brethren, this is one of the main reasons that led to the crucifixion of our Lord and Savior. "Seeing then that we have such hope and use great plainness of speech, and not as Moses which put a vail over his face that the ceildren of Israel could not steadfastly look to the end of that which was abolished. But their minds were blinded, for until this day remaineth the same vail untaken away, in the reading of the Old Testament, which vail is done away in Christ, but even unto this day when Moses is read the vail is upon their heart." Having noticed some of the main points in the old covenant, and failing to find a shadow of it binding on this dispensation, I will endeavor to say something about the law in my next. My love to all of the brethren, may we all be prepared and have formed such a character that will entitle us to an everlasting inheritance in God's kingdom, is my humble prayer.

[Though this article came just as we had commenced writing our series on Paul's Ministry, we laid it by without reading until we had written what has appeared in THE RESTITUTION so far. Bro. V. had not seen our articles when he wrote. Hence both his article and our own are independently written. So, before writing further just now, we give his a place. When the old covenant of the ten commandments was given, Judah had not been separated from Israel. As to our Lord, "he was made of a woman and made under the law," Gal. iv. 4. Hence, though Lord of the Sabbath he gave it a sort of legal observance.—ED. RESTITUTION.]

"The Sure Word of Prophecy," Reduced to a Question; Its Promise Argued Out.

"We can do nothing against the truth," said St. Paul; but this applies where "the truth" is allowed to follow and correct error.

Brother W. S. in the Christ of April 13th, has an editorial on Isa. ii. 1–5 and Micah iii. 8 to iv. 8. Both prophets proclaim the sin and punishment of God's ancient people, and then they preach "the promise" and so open "the door of hope" on the line of the oath confirmed, and "everlasting covenant." Gen. xvii.; Jer. xxxi.; Heb. viii. It enters into precise particulars of time and place—the actors and sufferers,—with the order and succession of events, Gentile times of supremacy and Israel's wondrous captivity, all as distinct as Jew and Gentile, Babylon and Jerusalem, earth and heaven. Truth, "aletheia," is an "apocalypse," a disclosure, not a puzzle, not yea and nay to bewilder.

1. Observe, Brother S., you acquiesce in the terrible line of "Israel's punishment," Lev. xxvi. 28; the treading down of the sanctuary and host, Dan. viii. 9–19; Matt. xxiii. 37 to xxiv. 14; Luke xxi. 24; Rom xi. 25; Heb. x. 25–30.

All that seems daylight to you. Indeed all, even the profane, swear orthodox! They see retribution for wrong doing. It accords with our moral constitution. The righteous God punishes sin; and all classes recognize the principle.

2. But the unity and continuity of God's all-comprehending "purpose," you see not. Eph. i. 1–4; iii. 11–20; Rom. xvi. 25–27; Isa. xl. to lxv.; 17–25. Hence you misapply this doctrine of condition, and dissipate the grand consummation of God's special purpose and promise, as given from Gen. xii. to Rev. xxi. 1–5. (See note.)

3. "The Promise," as here, Micah iv. 1–8, is never located in the Gentile times of treading them down! It is not yea and nay. No, never! The deliverance is always after the desolation; the abounding blessing of Israel must lie beyond their dispersion; the new covenant belongs after "the times of the Gentiles," time, Nimrod to Napoleon, etc., and in "his times, who is the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings," the "last Adam," and everlasting Lord! Amen. He did for that nation as for all the children of God. John xi. 49–52. His title was "the King of the Jews." John xix. 19.

4. This prophecy, Micah iii. 8 to iv. 8, enunciates national, geographical and chronological facts, that sum up the world's history as to "Jew, Gentile and the church of God." Hence it is not subject to forfeiture. Rom. viii. The Restitution follows the oppressed and dispersed condition! Hence the promise must also become a historic reality in its fulfilment. You disjoint, so far, all the elements of history. Hence the elements of your mistake are manifest to all who has a heart to understand. If we must judge let it be in the line of God's oft repeated promise, and "grow in grace."

5. The conditional notion as here applied is altogether a misrepresentation (?). It operates to crowd this range of prophetic truth back out of the line of promise, (chap. iv. 1–8,) into chap iii. and stop in the curse! It takes away the only hope from Israel that St. Paul cherished. Acts xxviii. 20; xxvi. 29), and largely from humanity, after their "seven times punishment." Lev. xxvi. 10–44; Dan. vii. 14, 27.

Daniel is as expanded and exalted as Micah. It announces "the New, everlasting covenant," in its primary terms. Jer. xxxi.; Heb. viii.; Rom. xi. This promise was in that to Abraham and Israel, the twelve tribes under the twelve apostles in the Regeneration! Regeneration! Matt. xix. 28–30. For all like texts stand co-related in the one "purpose" in Christ to Israel and earth.

6. You deny, as if unobserved, the distinctive age, world, kingdom, to come; with throne of David, for which we pray "Thy kingdom come!" For this prayer answered, will bring "The First Dominion" of this text, over sin or death had found entrance. It is Paradise restored. Rev. ii. 7; xxi. 1–5; xxii. 2–14. Please, Brother S., allow God's promise a little place somewhere in his all-time, for the restitution of all things spoken by all the prophets, Acts iii. 21; Rom viii. 1–23; then Micah iv. must be fulfilled to the glory of God.

7. The reign of sin, and death, and devil, must end! This prophecy and promise of good should lead our faith out and up into the coming "glory to God, and good will to men," which many like Scriptures reveal. But the measure of this glory has never been grasped by even the advanced apostle Paul. He says, "We know in part, and prophesy in part." Then it is not less, but more than he himself could tell, or than Micah meant! It remains for the future. For "when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part, shall be done away." 1 Cor. xiii. 9–12.

You are not then qualified to amend the "Eternal Word," nor to "limit the Holy One of Israel." Psa. lxxxviii. 41. We must not "grieve the spirit, or deny prophesyings." 1 Thess. v. 20.

We all need our "heart enlarged," as did David by the entrance of just such truth as you (as if unconsciously) disparage, and cast away! Is there peril in too much promise? No, no. We should rather avoid the peril in presumption, that counts ourselves unworthy of such measures of "God's grace and good will to men;" though given in terms transcending our "knowledge." Eph. iii. 14–20. He has unfailing, unending and almighty resources to perform his promise.

Note 1. The condition you misapply, has had its full scope and application to our race through time, to Adam, and through all ages since, Israel in the wilderness, Aaron and Miriam, David and others, Benjamin and the ten tribes, and to Israel since their dispersion by Rome. Deut. xxviii. God alone has its application, not earthly-minded man. Luke xxi. 24. But the promise, the age to come, etc., stands in "the gift and calling of God, without change," unalterable. Rom. xi. 26–29. It is like the resurrection of the just, the life everlasting, and New Covenant, "The earth as it is in heaven!" "As I live," saith God, "all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord."

Note 2. The central facts of history embrace Israel contemporaneous with "the times of the Gentiles," the oppressed are contemporary with "the oppressor." Psa. lxxii. 4; Luke xxi. 24. Here geography, chronology and the order of events form a group of all the elements of his one time, and they unite to forbid your mere show of argument to suppress the scores of Scripture in harmony with Micah iv. 1–8; Jer. xxxi. 31; Heb. viii. 8–12; Rom. xi. 12–29. He died for "that nation," "salvation is of the Jews," on their line. John iv. 22.

In Jer. xxxiii. 24–26, the stability of creation is invoked to assure this perpetuity to promise! The resurrection subserves it to both "Israel and Judah." Ezek. xxxvii.; Rom. xi. Nay more, the throne of David with Christ, his son, the Son of God, is to be there the Sovereign on it! Amen.

Note 3. Ten times we count the parallel of Gentile and Jew, as the basis for our "abounding in hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost." Surely there is no excess of promise in the provisions of "the glorious gospel of the blessed God." Rom. xv. 8–13; 1 Tim. i. 11.

The Lord bless you, Brother S., with the "enlarged heart." Amen. Lovingly, in the blessed hope of "abundant entrance and full reward."

"RESURRECTION, THE TRUE GATE OF LIFE."—Part I.

The subject, on which it is my privilege to address you, will be found to be of supreme importance, for two reasons. First, because it is the only revealed and Divinely appointed mode of deliverance from the death state to which our entire human race have become subject through our connection with the first Adam, the great father of the human family—"For in Adam all die." Second, because the denial of the doctrine of resurrection invalidates every vital doctrine of the Gospel. "If the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised" (1 Cor. xv. 16). This, I submit, is a point that demands the most careful attention.

There appears to have been those in the Church at Corinth that called in question the resurrection of the dead—"How say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?" In dealing with this matter Paul puts the divinely attested fact of Christ's resurrection—on the broad basis of revealed truth—that the dead shall by resurrection live again. His argument is simply this—If the dead rise not—then is not Christ risen, the one fact stands or falls with the other. The Apostle's argument is a two-edged sword, it cuts both ways; one edge cuts away all theories about only the body dying and the soul living on in conscious being. For if Christ did not really die, go down among the dead ones, come under the power and dominion of death—he could not rise from the dead—or out from among dead ones. And with all reverence we avow that the boasted resurrection of Christ is but a pious fraud. Nay, a sham and delusion. Nay, more, if Christ did not die, there is no redemption, "for without shedding of blood there is no remission of sins." But, thank God, his word is clear and decisive on this vital fact. "Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures." "He poured out his soul unto death," "He made his soul an offering for sin," "He gave his life a ransom for many." The new song is based on the fact of his death, Rev. v. 9, "They sung a new song, saying, Thou art worthy to take the Book, and to open the seals thereof; for Thou was slain, and hast redeemed us to God by Thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation." To this solemn fact, of the real death of the person of Christ, pointed the myriads of animal victims offered as sacrifices to God by the early patriarchs, and under the law as given by Moses, and reverently continued onward till the death of the great Antitype, Jesus Christ.

That Christ should die and rise from the dead on the third day was the unwelcome truth he sought to impress on his Apostles, yet nothing but the fact itself, could convince them of its truth. Friend and foe alike believed that Christ was dead. Heaven, earth, and hell accepted its truth. That Christ rose from the dead was as amply testified by the chosen witnesses, the women, the apostles and disciples, and the 500 brethren at one time. Its grand reality was established by every test the senses could supply. They looked upon him in their midst; they handled him; he ate and drank before them; there was the evidence, from the voice, of his identity, and this often remains when the features are changed; he spoke to one disciple, calling her name,—Mary—and she instantly replied "Rabboni, Master," and fell at his feet to worship him; for 40 days these evidences in varied form were continued by the risen Christ to his disciples, and then from Olivet, he was parted from them, and ascended into heaven. They all stood looking; it was no optical illusion; there was no denying the fact; every sense and faculty of their nature confirmed its reality. And while still they were gazing in rapt attention the two heavenly visitors added their testimony that this same Jesus should so come in like manner as they had seen him go into heaven. This was further demonstrated by the descent of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost, according to the joint promise of the Father and Christ. Paul tells us that Jesus Christ was of the seed of David according to the flesh, and declared to be the Son of God with power according to the Spirit of holiness by the resurrection from the dead, Rom. i. 4. Thus, upon this double fact of the death and the resurrection from among the dead of Jesus Christ, rests the entire Gospel, both of the grace and glory of God. For see the memorable consequences that follow. To deny the resurrection of the dead is to deny Christ's resurrection, to make Apostolic preaching vain, the faith of all Christians vain, to leave us unforgiven, still in our sins. The solemn conclusion of the Apostle is this, that by such denial the most of them being the inspired Apostles of the Christ of God, and thus exponents of the will of God and revealers of his truth, they are found false witnesses of God—teaching a lie in the name of the Lord—and that all who had believed in Christ through their instrumentality and fallen asleep in Christ, or in other words, died in the Lord had absolutely perished. Why? Because without resurrection the dead saints cannot live again. The hypothesis of conscious soul survival is destroyed by the argument of the Apostle. Paul's definition of the Gospel as contrasted with the law as given by Moses is very explicit, "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved," Rom. x. 9.

The caution of Christ to his disciples, Matt. xvi. 6, "Take heed and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees," is very important. These latter denied that there was any resurrection, Luke xx. 27. What we have to deplore today, is not one heresy, but many. The prediction of Christ in the Kingdom Parables, Matt. xiii., is fast fulfilling, "the three measures of meal" are being fast permeated by the leaven, until nearly the entire professing Church is leavened with Platonic philosophy, either in its concentrated form of Immortal Soulism, or in the first dilution (to use an homeopathic phrase) of the survival of the soul in the death of the person. And in candor we must say, the first appears to us the most logical, but both involve a denial of the resurrection of the dead person. For if, as taught by the Platonists, the soul is essentially the man, death cannot touch it, because immortal. And because it survives, according to the second claim, and becomes a houseless tenant evicted from its clay tabernacle, the body, and in living consciousness takes up its abode in the Gracious Hades, on either the bright, or the shady side, according to the character formed while on earth. Brethren, this may be very patriotic and scholarly, but is it Scriptural? Is it what Christ and his Apostles taught? If not, I for one dare not rest upon it, or teach it to others; for I contend if there is no real death, there can be no resurrection: if there is no sleep, there can be no awaking; if no going down into the death state, there can be no rising from it.

There is another, and a large class of our Christian friends who cannot find this subterranean Hades in the Scriptures, but clinging to the Platonic idea of the immortal soul as an entity that can live and not either with or without a human organization; (for with them it is the soul that is converted while in the body) believe that what God calls death is simply a dissolution of the life that temporarily bound the soul to the body, and that when this is severed the redeemed soul rises to heaven itself, to be for ever with the Lord. Now, if such be the case, death is a misnomer, the resurrection, so far as the real question is concerned, an impossibility. But, brethren, are these things so? You tell me the immortality of the soul is the creed of Christendom; sung by our Christian Poets, taught by our Theologians, interwoven with our literature, and preached by the large majority of our ministers. Well, as a sequence of their theory, they must find a place for this immortal entity, either in Hades, or one in heaven, or hell. But the impropriety of a theory is no proof of its truth. The devil's lie in Eden, "Ye shall not surely die" is nearly as old as the first human lie. Let them out to [illegible] and live in the world of life [illegible] is but one standard to which saints and Christians we can appeal, that is the Word of God. We must have "Thus saith the Lord," for our faith to rest upon, and we cannot find from Genesis to Revelation a single statement to prove that God made man an immortal soul, or that there is any gate of life out of death but that of resurrection. Death and the grave are the consequences of sin; Jesus and the resurrection are the portals of Eternal Life. It is on that glorious morning of Christ's return that his saints shall rise out from among the dead, this corruptible put on incorruption, and this mortal put on immortality, deathlessness. Then and not before, shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, "Death is swallowed up in victory."

Such is Christ's teaching, and that of his inspired Apostles. On this foundation alone can our faith and hope rest, and here we watch and wait. Of course the old question recurs, "Have any of the Rulers believed" these things? We are not excited to answer in this matter,—though there are with us men of profound erudition and sterling piety, who would compare favorably with the very elite of "Orthodoxy." But our faith must not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God." It has ever been the plan of God to choose the foolish things of the world to confound the wise;" the weak, the mighty; the despised, or the nobodies, to bring to naught the things that are, that no flesh should glory in his presence. Christ thanked the Father that he had hid certain great truths from the wise and mighty and revealed them unto babes: "even so, Father; for so it seemed good in Thy sight." The Shepherd Moses was chosen to be the Deliverer and Leader of Israel, and to humble the proud Pharaoh; the youngest son of Jesse, David, to be God's king of Israel; the Fisherman of Galilee to revolutionize the world, and plant the standard of the Cross on every shore. But boasting in this matter is excluded entirely and for ever. We simply turn to the grand old Word of Divine truth, and all for which we as an Association are contending, is found there. We proclaim no new truths, we have had no new revelation. Our cry to our Brethren and the world is, "Come back! this is the way." Give up the Heathen Plato, for Christ; leave the Mythology of Greece and Egypt, for "Jesus and the resurrection," as plainly set forth in the Scriptures. Brethren, if we have read our Bible wrongly, show it to us, and we will recant. But if we have found (as we profess) the precious truth of God that has long been buried under the rubbish of Pagan and papal tradition, we entreat you to share with us the treasure, and join the cry "Eureka!" "Eureka!" We have found it! we have found it! To you, Brethren, as well as to us, is the charge given, "contend earnestly for the faith once for all delivered to the saints."

But the objection may be raised: "Why should I give up the faith of my fathers and the mighty dead in the Immortality of the soul, and that death only conquers the body? What proof can you bring and what reasons assign that the resurrection is the true Gate of Life?" To this we modestly suggest that the faith of honored fathers, living or dead, derives no virtue from their holiness, but unless it is the truth of God it will inevitably perish. Abraham had to give up the faith of his fathers, and leave his kindred and country, and trust God, in going out to a strange land. So with the Apostles, and many others since then.—Thomas Tracy, in Bible Standard.

THE FALL OF BABYLON.

Hail the day so long expected,
Hail the year of full release,
Zion's walls are now erected,
And her Watchmen publish peace.
Throughout Shiloh's wide dominion,
Hear the trumpets loudly roar.

CHORUS:
Babylon is fallen, is fallen, is fallen,
Babylon is fallen to rise no more

Hear the people cry with wonder,—
What is this that's come to pass!
Mourning like some distant thunder,
Crying, oh, alas! alas!
Merchants raise their lamentations,
Crying from the distant shore.—Cho.

Where is now her former glory:
Where is now her pride and show?
One brief day reveals the story
Of her final overthrow.
Raise your wailing kings and nobles,
Priests and people, rich and poor.—Cho.

Shout ye saints in exultation,
Now your enemies are slain,
Raise the anthem of salvation,
Sing the grand millennial reign,
Let the universal chorus
Be repeated o'er and o'er.—Cho.

Hark, the sound of many voices
Issuing from the crystal skies:
Heaven's remembered host rejoices,
Swelling hallelujahs rise;
Hallelujah! Hallelujah!
God's almighty power adores.—Cho.

Glory, honor and salvation,
Cry the enraptured throng again;
While each Elder from his station,
Shouts the long and loud Amen.
Hallelujah! Hallelujah!
Sounding still the thunder roar.—Cho.

THE END OF GENTILE TIMES.

If six thousand years of the world's history is now in the past, as we have good reasons for believing, then, according to the hope of many earnest Bible students, we are living in the beginning of a new era, in the dawning of the millennial age, and we are passing through the introductory scenes of the judgment.

Some one may ask, can this be true, and the world know nothing of it? I answer, why not? The antediluvian age ended in judgment, and although the people were warned for one hundred and twenty years, yet "they knew not until the flood came and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." Matt. xxiv. 37–39. So it was with the Egyptians, they were told that if they did not let the Israelites go, they would suffer terrible judgments. Although they were repeatedly warned, yet they took no heed, and the reason why they did not is given by their King, "I know not the Lord." Exo. v. 2.

Again, when the time came for the Jewish age to end, another prophet was sent to warn that people of coming judgments, yet they gave no heed. And why? They knew not the prophet, nor the One who sent him; yet they had a "zeal for God, but not according to knowledge." They thought they were the only favorites of heaven. John vii. 28; viii. 55; Rom. x. 2. The Jewish age did not end suddenly, but there must be a harvest time, and a new dispensation introduced, (or a barn erected to garner the wheat) before the final end of that era. It was carried over forty years into the new dispensation, before the threatened judgments began to be felt by the Jews.

So now as the seventh millenary began many years ago, according to my chronology, may we not expect a harvest to extend from the old age into the new? In fact has not the Master instructed his disciples that there must be a harvest at the end of this world, at the separation of the "tares" from the "wheat?" Matt. xiii. 36–43. And does he not say "to the reapers, gather ye together first the tares?" vs. 30. In the old dispensation the wheat was gathered first, but now the order is reversed.

The opposition to the truth of the nearness of the second advent of Christ, and the establishment of his kingdom on the earth is very strong, and the "tares" those putting on the appearance of, and claiming to be the genuine "wheat," are gathering into "bundles," or communities, social and ecclesiastic, for the final struggle, the crushing out this latter day heresy. May we not learn from the foregoing that while we are witnessing the calamities, and war preparations, that will end Gentile times, yet we may be living in the beginning of a new era, or seventh millenary?

A very few of the teeming millions of earth are looking for the Lord to come and overthrow the present wicked governments, and establish a just one in their place. But have we not overlooked the fact that judgment scenes must precede his advent. Does not the Master teach us that before he comes there will be "distress of nations, with perplexity, * * * men's hearts failing them for fear," etc. * * * "for the powers of heaven will be shaken," which is will be seen "coming." Luke xxi. 26–27. Also in the Apocalypse it is shown that the plagues will come, and the woman, or Babylon of the seventeenth chapter must be destroyed before the advent of the deliverer. The woman sits upon the beast but a short time; his allotted time is only "forty-two months;" during that time he, with his allied forces, the ten kings, turns upon the woman and strips her of her gorgeous apparel, "eats her flesh, and burns her with fire." See Rev. xiii. 5; xvii. entire.

Yes indeed, the judgment scenes are before us, or here in reality, but before they come in much greater severity, I expect "the salt of the earth," and "light of the world," will be removed to a place of safety. See Matt. v. 13; Isa. xxvi. 20, 21; Luke xxi. 36. May the good Lord help all who have an interest in these things to watch.

J. D. SHERIDAN.

The Stream of Time, Where Are We?

If it can be shown from Bible testimony that six thousand years from the creation of our first parents ended long since, what of the theory that Gentile times must end at that time? as so many Bible students affirm.

If my friends will bear with me a little I will present the evidence from the Bible that six thousand years from Adam are now in the past.

Several years ago, after examining the chronology of a number of eminent authors, who disagreed materially in the result of their calculations, I became so much interested in the subject that I commenced its study for my own satisfaction.

From my investigation of the "times and seasons" recorded in the Bible I am settled in the conviction that no one can with divine authority set the time for Gentiles to end, and the kingdom of God established in its place.

In presenting Bible chronology I shall be brief and explain, or give reference only in part, and where I differ with others.

At the Deluge we have 1656 years. From that time to the birth of Terah 222 years. He was aged 130 years when Abraham was born. Gen. xi. 32; xii. 4; Acts vii. 4.

Abraham was 100 years old at the birth of Isaac; 60 years to the birth of Jacob.

At the commencement of Israel's sojourn with his children after they left Padan Aram their native place, he, the father was 100 years old. Thirty years of the sojourn expired at the time he went down into Egypt with his descendants. Gen. xlvii. 9; Exo. xii. 40.

We learn from the above text that Israel's descendants, "Who dwelt in Egypt," at the time of the exodus had been sojourning 430 years.

I will repeat, it was the children of Israel who dwelt in Egypt that had been sojourning that length of time.

In Acts vii. 6, it is stated that Abraham's "seed" should sojourn in a strange land, and they should be brought into bondage, and be evil entreated 400 years. This is a quotation from what was recorded in Gen. xv. 13. In the 16th verse it is recorded that "in the fourth generation," they, Abraham's seed, shall come hither again.

To me the divine statements above alluded to, are sufficient to establish the fact, that it was the descendants of Israel who had been sojourning 430 years, not they and their ancestors together, as so many would have us believe.

Abraham was told that "in the fourth generation, they, his seed, shall come hither again." If we date the commencement of the sojourn with Abraham, we have nine generations to the Exodus instead of four, as Nashon is the ninth in the Messianic line.

This can be readily seen by any one who will take the trouble to count the descendants of Abraham to the Exodus.

If we commence at Hezron, the youngest son in the line of Judah, at the time the Israelites went down into Egypt, for the commencement of 400 years of their sojourn in a strange land, we have the word of the Lord verified to the letter: Hezron, Ram, Aminadab and Nashon.

I will urge one more objection to the theory that the Israelites remained in Egypt only 215 years. At the Exodus they were said to number about six thousand footmen. Exo. xii. 37. And they numbered sometime during the first year after leaving Egypt, by actual count of men, twenty years old and upward, (exclusive of the tribe of Levi) six hundred thousand and five hundred and fifty men.

If women and children were added to this number there must have been not less than three millions of people who descended from Jacob's seventy sons and their wives (140 persons) allowing a wife for each one of them, although some of them must have been very young, as grand-sons and great grand-sons were included in their sojourn in Egypt.

If four hundred years for this increase is allowed, they must double their numbers from 140 once every 28 and 2-7 years.

At the same ratio of increase for 215 years there would have been only about 30,000 persons in all, or about six thousand on foot of men twenty years old and upward, instead of six hundred thousand.

This estimate is a more rapid rate of increase than was Jacob's during his lifetime; he and his four wives had increased during 130 years from five persons to about 32 persons including the sons' wives, or they doubled four times, that is once every thirty and two fifth years.

The above to me are valid reasons why I should reject the theory that the sojourn of the children of Israel, of four hundred and thirty years, must or could date from Abraham's seventy-fifth year, as commonly held. There is abundant evidence that the confirmation of the Abrahamic covenant took place thirty years previous to the time Jacob went down into Egypt with his descendants. Gen. xxxv. 9–12; 1 Chron. xvi. 16–17; Psa. cv. 8–12; Gal. iii. 17.

From the above it can be seen, that the Abrahamic covenant was "confirmed unto Jacob for a law, and to Israel for an everlasting covenant."

Next we come to the wandering in the wilderness, 40 years. Num. xiv. 33; Judges, 450 years, Acts xiii. 20; from Saul to the captivity of Judah, 526 years. This includes an interregnum of thirteen years between the death of Amaziah, which occurred in the fourteenth year of Jeroboam, king of Israel, and his twenty seventh year when Amaziah's son and successor Uzziah began to reign. 2 Kings xiv. 1, 2, 17, 23; xv. 1.

The captivity of Judah 70 years; the 70 years ended in the first year of Cyrus. At the commandment then went forth to restore and to rebuild Jerusalem, from that time to the Messiah was sixty-nine weeks or 483 years.

If anyone has doubts as to who it was that issued the command or proclamation to build Jerusalem, let them read Isa. xliv. 23, xlv. 1–13, which saith of Cyrus: "He is my shepherd, and he shall perform all my pleasure: even saying to Jerusalem, thou shalt be built. * * He shall build my city."

The work having been delayed did not change the case, for the commandment from Cyrus was put in writing, and could not be altered or changed. The work being hindered, it became necessary for his successors to cause it to be finished.

If there be a question whether the Son of God was the Messiah before his baptism, I will answer that, that would not change the language of the Jewish age, or the time when the 483 years must commence, but would only extend it about thirty years into our era, making our A. D. commence thirty years later. But it seems to me that the announcement to the shepherds should settle the question beyond a doubt, "I bring you good tidings. * * For unto you is born this day in the city of David, a Savior which is Christ the Lord." Luke ii. 7–11.

Messiah being cut off in his thirty-fourth year, the sixty-two weeks of 434 years of Dan. ix. 27, must end at his death.

I have made no attempt to reconcile secular records with divine testimony, nor do I claim that my chronology gives the exact time when the Jewish age ended, because there is evidence that there was a generation of thirty years, more or less, left out of the account in Genesis between Arphaxed and Salah. Luke iii. 35–36. Josephus in his genealogies mentions Cainan as the father of Salah, as well as Luke; and there is a question also as to when we should date the commencement of the 450 years of Judges, whether at the time Joshua took command of the army, or after his death.

As we have the evidence before us that we live in the dawning of a better day, even the seventh or day of rest in the world's history and having no new revelation of the "times and seasons," it becometh us like the followers of Christ in the beginning, to be always ready and even on the watch, for the coming Bridegroom.

I will proceed to sum up the account as I have it.

AN ANCIENT RECORD.

A letter from the Rev. C. H. Payson, recently published in the Christian Weekly, speaks of a discovery made at Nablous, the ancient Sychem, by Rev. J. El. Karor, a Samaritan, educated in England, but living now among his own people as a missionary physician. We copy from the Examiner:

He found in the synagogue at Nablous, the ancient Sychem, a record kept by the priests, that reaches back hundreds of years before Christ; and it occurred to him that probably some allusion to Christ might be found in it. On careful research he was rewarded by coming upon this statement:

"In the nineteenth year of my priesthood, and the 1,283d year of the world, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Mary, was crucified at Jerusalem."

Perilous Times.

It is frightful to contemplate the rapid increase of crime in all parts of our country. Scarcely a newspaper can be opened that does not contain the account of the perpetration of some horrible offense against society. The enormity of the crimes keeps pace with the rapid increase of their number. One day a man shoots his wife—the next a son stabs his father, a brother kills his brother for some slight difference of opinion, then a father murders his whole family. Common robberies and murders are of everyday occurrence. Forgery, swindling, and speculation are carried on by the wholesale. Private houses, banks and the government are indiscriminately robbed. Men of established reputation for business integrity, suddenly disappear, taking with them fabulous sums of money, the property of others. By perjury and other means the nation is defrauded of money more than enough to pay the interest upon the national debt.

Licentiousness prevails to an alarming extent. It appears as though Satan was let loose, and was exerting himself to the utmost, knowing that his time is short. What is the meaning of all this? Are the last days in real. ity upon us? Is the world rapidly ripening for destruction? Is the day of doom at hand? Look upon the face of society and see how perfectly its features correspond with the Heaven by the pen of inspiration. "This know also that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, trucebreakers, false-accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God; having a form of godliness but denying the power thereof—from such turn away." Did not modern society sit for this picture? Could the canvas reflect a more accurate resemblance? Can this striking agreement be the result of accident?

It is time for the followers of Jesus to be up and doing. But alas! the perpetrators of these high outrages are generally among those who call upon his name and attend upon his worship. They own pews in magnificent temples, or belonging to a church which boasts of the imposing character of its rites, and the liberality of its terms of communion. Would you not be carried away with the current of ungodliness which appears to be sweeping all before it? You must build upon the rock for the storms are upon us. You must bear an unequivocal testimony against prevailing sins, and like Lot in Sodom, vex your righteous soul from day to day with their unlawful deeds. From a quiet acquiescence to active participation the transition is gradual, easy, imperceptible and well-nigh certain. Above all let us call upon God in mighty prayer, to lift up a standard against the tide of iniquity which is poured out like a flood. Help Lord; for the godly man ceaseth; for the faithful fail from among the children of men.—The Earnest Christian.

EXPLANATION OF LABEL MARKS.

Some having complained that they do not know what the marks on labels mean, we will just say, "Jny" means January, and when it is followed by a figure "8" and reads "Jny8" it means your subscription expired the first day of January, 1886, "Feb" February, "Mar" March, "Apr" April, and "May" are well understood, but "Jun" meaning June seems to confuse some, and is by taken to mean January. "Jun" means June, "Jul" is July, "Aug" August, "Sep" September, "Oct" October, "Nov" November, and "Dec" December. The figure following the month stands for the year, "1" means 1881, "2" means 1882, etc. A postal card of inquiry will bring you any information you wish.

THE COMING AGE,

—1887—

Nature and Proximity.

—By J. P. WARTHEN.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is swelling in the popular mind, among religious people, stronger and constantly growing in interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth developed in commercial enterprises, the introduction of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs, the telephone, by which new discoveries are constantly being added—discoveries being greater than ever before—all point to the fact that we now are in the transition period to a culminating period of the world's history.

This Coming Age is the greatest of literary research, covering a period of more than forty years, and is a careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in public history, showing in a clear and forcible light and remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alone with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of nations in prophecy, and shows that they are now at hand.

In brief it tells us what the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the facts of current events. It is thoroughly wonder-working hand of God in the history of bygone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events, and forcing its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature of the kind, reference and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the will of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 400 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $2.00. Send to this office for this work.

The Law, the Covenants, and the Sabbath. By L. C. Thomas.

This pamphlet contains 96 pages.—The Law, the Covenants, and the Sabbath. Also an Epitome of the Great Salvation; and an Appendix including various other subjects, in brief.

The perfect unchangeable moral law is considered and shown to be the basis and spirit of the old Mosaic law, now dead in its entirety. The law of Moses and law of Christ are compared and contrasted, and the relation of both to the old and new covenants is treated at some length. The Sabbath question is carefully and lengthily examined, and presented and discussed in a somewhat new light.

The work also includes the consideration of Unity, conditional immortality, the gospel, return of the Jews, the resurrection of the kingdom to Israel, punishment of the wicked, the state of the dead, the new birth, the one faith, the one hope, the image of God, nature of Christ, the nature, the religion, morality, Christianity, etc. This work contains 400 pages, cloth bound. Price $1.00.

Paternity, Genealogy, Nature and Character of Jesus, in the Light of the Covenants; being two Lectures, with some Additions, Delivered at Wyoming, Delaware, by Dr. L. C. Thomas.—No. 11.

"What think ye of Christ? Whose Son is he?" Matt. xxii. 42.

We will now examine the conditional terms and clauses of the covenant. I have already quoted the words of the Lord by Moses (Deut. xvii. 14–20) pointing down to David as the "chosen" king, more than 300 years before he was born, which show that the perpetual uninterrupted continuance of his kingdom for the time being—during the forty years of his reign (which began about 13 years before the covenant was made with him)—depended upon his own and his children's obedience. But after the covenant was made with him and his covenanted son, Solomon, who succeeded him on the throne, to whom David's never-to-end divine right to sit upon the throne of the Lord over Israel, had been granted, by virtue of the covenant, as above shown; after that the perpetual, uninterrupted continuance of the throne, from that point down to the coming of him whose right it is, depended upon the obedience of Solomon and his children—David's children—as had been made known to David in the covenant, made with him twenty-seven years before, viz: if his children were not obedient there would be a failure to David of a man on the throne of Israel for the time being. "Now the days of David drew nigh that he should die; and he charged Solomon saying, I go the way of all the earth: be thou strong therefore, and show thyself a man; and keep the charge of the Lord thy God to walk in his ways, to keep his statutes, and commandments, and his judgments and his testimonies, as it is written in the law of Moses;....that the Lord may continue his word which he spake concerning me, saying, if thy children (Solomon and his children) take heed to their way, to walk before me in truth with all their heart and with all their soul, there shall not fail thee (David) a man on the throne of Israel." 1 Kings ii. 1. Nothing here about "bringing the deathless heir through another line." But simply a temporary failure of a man—to David—to sit on his throne, as has been the case ever since Zedekiah was dethroned, and is to continue to be the case until he come whose right it is. The failure is therefore "not utterly," (Psa. lxxxix) but for the time being: for God said "my mercy shall not depart away from him as I took it from Saul, whom I put away before thee," (David). 2 Sam. vii. 14, 15. "The sceptre shall not utterly depart from Judah, nor a law-giver from between his feet, for Shiloh (Messiah, Prince of Peace, Dr. Young) shall come, and unto him shall the gathering of the people be." Gen. xlix. 10. I believe this to be the correct rendering. In Saul's case, it was a refusal to establish his kingdom, and a taking it away from him, his house or family forever—an "utter departure." But in Solomon's case it was established in his hand forever—without end, but not without intermission. It has not therefore utterly departed. It is only a temporary failure. "If his children forsake my law,.... and keep not my commandments, then I will visit their transgressions with the rod and their iniquity with stripes. Nevertheless my loving kindness will I not utterly take from him." Psa. lxxxix. 30–33. It is therefore worse than folly to try to "construe" the language so as to mean that it has utterly departed from Solomon just as from Saul, except in the manner of doing the same thing. It is truly surprising to see what some will resort to, in order to sustain a mere imagination.

Again, about ten years after Solomon came to the throne and had finished the house of the Lord, he was anxious there should be no failure of the kingdom, and he prayed, quoting God's conditional promise to his father David, praying God to keep his promise. He says, "Therefore now Lord God of Israel, keep with thy servant David my father, that thou promisedst him, saying, There shall not fail thee a man in my sight to sit on the throne of Israel; so that thy children take heed to their way, that they walk before me as thou hast walked before me." 1 Kings viii. 25. Who cannot see, that if this failure of a man, through the disobedience of David's children—Solomon, etc.—was an endless eternal failure as to Solomon, it was the very same to David? It was therefore simply a temporary failure to both—to David as well as to Solomon—a vacancy of the throne and kingdom for the time being, and which interregnum we are expecting soon to terminate by the appearance upon the scene of the rightful, never-dying Heir.

Again, (1 Kings ix 3–7; 2 Chron. vii. 12) we are informed that God heard and answered Solomon's prayer. "The Lord said unto him, I have heard thy prayer and thy supplication that thou hast made before me; I have hallowed this house which thou hast built, to put my name there forever; [that is, without end, and without intermission. This "house" would have been standing there yet, and God's name there yet, and so have been perpetuated without break or intermission, "perpetually" as defined a few words below, if Solomon and his children had been obedient] and mine eyes and mine heart shall be there perpetually: and if thou wilt walk before me, as David thy father walked, in integrity of heart and in uprightness, to do according to all I have commanded thee, and wilt keep my statutes and my judgments: then I will establish the throne of thy kingdom upon Israel for ever (that is perpetually without end and without intermission) as I promised to David thy father, saying: There shall not fail thee (David) a man upon the throne of Israel. (This sentence clearly defined what was meant, viz: that there should be no failure of the kingdom of David—no intermission—if Solomon be obedient). But if ye shall at all turn from following me, ye or your children;....then will I cut off Israel [not Solomon merely] out of the land which I have given them; [not, I will bring "the deathless heir through another line," as has been strangely imagined and written] and this house, which I have hallowed for my name ("forever," as in verse 3) will I cast out of my sight; and Israel shall be a proverb and a by word among all people."

This plainly sets forth what should be, and what has been the result of the disobedience of Solomon and his children. It was simply a suspension, an intermission for the time being, a taken away from Solomon and his father David God's "mercy" (the kingdom) until he come whose right it is, and not as it was taken from him that was before them—as corroborated by the following. "I will not take my mercy away from him (Solomon) as I took it from him that was before thee," (David.) 1 Chron. xvii. 13. The same conditional clause is found in these words, viz: "If thy (David's) children—not merely Solomon only—will keep my covenant and my testimony that I shall teach them, their children (that is, David's children's children, not one child, the spiritual immortal one) shall also sit upon the throne for evermore." Psa. cxxxi. 12. That is, continually, without an intermission. Again, the same conditional clause appears, 2 Chron. xxviii. 7, expressed in these words, viz: "Moreover I will establish his kingdom for ever;—that is, without end, and without intermission—if he be constant to do my commandments and my judgments as at this day, [Solomon was obedient at that day]....that ye may possess this land, and leave it for an inheritance for your children after you forever," [continuously, without intermission.)....But if thou forsake him he will cast thee off forever." That is, then and they children and all Israel. 1 Chron. xciii. 7–9. The word "thee" is probably used here in the same sense as in Deut. xvii. 14, 15, viz: "one from thy brethren shall thou set king over thee." That is over the children of Israel, not over one person. If "cast off forever" means any more than David did, when, speaking prophetically, he said, "O God, why hast thou cast us [the children of Israel] off forever?" Psa. lxxiv. 1; or than was meant when God said, "I will cast off this city Jerusalem which I have chosen, and the house of which I said my name shall be there forever;" 2 Kings xxiii. 27, and 1 Kings ix. 3, or it forever, in this case, means any more than in Joash's case, when he said, "I am cast out of thy sight; the earth with her bars was about me forever," that is, continually without any intermission, during the whole time he was in the belly of the fish, three days and nights; or in this, "he shall be thy servant forever," during life, Deut. xv. 17, and in many other cases wherever applied to anything which necessarily has an end; I say, if in Solomon's case, anything more was meant than in those cases, then it was that he was to be cast off like any other person if he persistently to the end of life, forsook God whom he once loved and obeyed. But in neither case would the question of Christ's descent in his line be affected. That was settled by the unconditional clauses of the covenant; besides that Rehoboam his eldest son, and successor to the throne, was born long before Solomon turned away from the Lord and became disobedient. Besides that again, it does not appear that either Solomon or Coniah ever committed a more horrible sin than did David when he "despised the Lord and his commandment" in that matter of Solomon's mother, Bathsheba and her husband Uriah; than which no greater occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme," was ever given by any one. Nevertheless the Lord "put away David's sin that he should not die." It seems to have been absolutely necessary for the Lord to overlook it and spare David's life, in order that his covenant which he had made with him should not be broken, viz: that a son should be born to David, whose name should be Solomon, and in whom the throne of David's kingdom over Israel was to be established forever. Hence, although David's terrible sin displeased the Lord, and its punishment and consequences followed him all the rest of his life, yet it could not be allowed to defeat or interfere with the carrying out of that unconditional feature of the covenant and purpose of Jehovah. Just so was it with the sins of David's children—Solomon and his children. Their sins could only cause an intermission or temporary interruption or suspension of the unconditionally established, never-ending kingdom. A meeting, or the sitting of a court may be unconditionally appointed and established to be held from one o'clock p. m. until ten—nine hours. But it does not follow that there must therefore of necessity be no intermission, dependent upon conditional circumstances.
